attest. Now, does that press? Is there any hurry about it? You are not going to die yet, sir."

"Mr. Bintrey," answered Wilding, gravely, "when I am going to die is within other knowledge than yours or mine. I shall be glad to have this matter off my mind, if you please."

"We are lawyer and client again," rejoined Bintrey, who, for the nonce, had become almost sympathetic. "If this day week,—here, at the same hour,—will suit Mr. Vendale and yourself, I will enter in my Diary that I attend you accordingly."

The appointment was made, and in due sequence kept. The will was formally signed, sealed, delivered, and witnessed, and was carried off by Mr. Bintrey for safe storage among the papers of his clients, ranged in their respective iron boxes, with their respective owners' names outside, on iron tiers in his consulting-room, as if that legal sanctuary were a condensed Family Vault of Clients.

With more heart than he had lately had for former subjects of interest, Wilding then set about completing his patriarchal establishment, being much assisted not only by Mrs. Goldstraw but by Vendale too: who, perhaps, had in his mind the giving of an Obenreizer dinner as soon as possible. Anyhow, the establishment being reported in sound working order, the Obenreizers, Guardian and Ward, were asked to dinner, and Madame Dor was included in the invitation. If Vendale had been over head and ears in love before,—a phrase not to be taken as implying the faintest doubt about it,—this dinner plunged him down in love ten thousand fathoms deep. Yet, for the life of him, he could not get one word alone with charming Marguerite. So surely as a blessed moment seemed to come, Obenreizer, in his filmy state, would stand at Vendale's elbow, or the broad back of Madame Dor would appear before his eyes. That speechless matron was never seen in a front view, from the moment of her arrival to that of her departure,—except at dinner. And from the instant of her retirement to the drawing-room, after a hearty participation in that meal, she turned her face to the wall again.

Yet, through four or five delightful though distracting hours, Marguerite was to be seen, Marguerite was to be heard, Marguerite was to be occasionally touched. When they made the round of the old dark cellars, Vendale led her by the hand, when she sang to him in the lighted room at night, Vendale, standing by her, held her relinquished gloves, and would have bartered against them every drop of the forty-five year old, though it had been forty-five times forty-five years old, and its net price forty-five times forty-five pounds per dozen. And still, when she was gone, and a great gap of an extinguisher was clapped on Cripple Corner, he tormented himself by wondering, Did she think that he admired her! Did she think that he adored her! Did she suspect that she had won him, heart and soul! Did she care to think at all about it! And so, Did she and Didn't she, up and down the gamut, and above the line and below the line, dear, dear! Poor restless heart of humanity! To think that the men who were mummies thousands of years ago; did the same, and ever found the secret how to be quiet after it!

"What do you think, George," Wilding asked him next day, "of Mr. Obenreizer? (I won't ask you what you think of Miss Obenreizer)."

"I don't know," said Vendale, "and I never did know, what to think of him."

"He is well informed and clever," said Wilding.

"Certainly clever."

"A good musician." (He had played very well, and sung very well, overnight.)

"Unquestionably a good musician."

"And talks well."

"Yes," said George Vendale, ruminating, "and talks well. Do you know, Wilding, it oddly occurs to me, as I think about him, that he doesn't keep silence well!"

"How do you mean? He is not obtrusively talkative."

"No, and I don't mean that. But when he is silent, you can hardly help vaguely, though perhaps most unjustly, mistrusting him. Take people whom you know and like. Take any one you know and like."

"Soon done, my good fellow," said Wilding. "I take you."

"I didn't bargain for that, or foresee it," returned Vendale, laughing. "However, take me. Reflect for a moment. Is your approving knowledge of my interesting face, mainly founded (however various the momentary expressions it may include) on my face when I am silent?"

"I think it is," said Wilding.

"I think so too. Now, you see, when Obenreizer speaks,—in other words, when he is allowed to explain himself away,—he comes out right enough; but when he has not the opportunity of explaining himself away, he comes out rather wrong. Therefore it is that I say he does not keep silence well. And passing hastily in review such faces as I know and don't trust, I am inclined to think, now I give my mind to it, that none of them keep silence well."

This proposition in Physiognomy being new to Wilding, he was at first slow to admit it, until asking himself the question whether Mrs. Goldstraw kept silence well, and remembering that her face in repose decidedly invited trustfulness, he was as glad as men usually are to believe what they desire to believe.

But as he was very slow to regain his spirits or his health, his partner, as another means of setting him up,—and perhaps also with contingent Obenreizer views,—reminded him of those musical schemes of his in connection with his family, and how a singing-class was to be formed in the house, and a Choir in a neighboring church. The class was established speedily, and two or three of the people having already some musical knowledge, and singing tolerably, the choir soon followed. The latter was led and chiefly taught by Wilding himself: who had hopes of converting his dependents into so many Foundlings, in respect of their capacity to sing sacred choruses.

THE GREAT

UNITED STATES TEA WAREHOUSE,

T. Y. KELLEY & CO.,

30 Vesey St., New York.

Are now supplying families throughout the country with TEAS warranted, in all cases, perfectly pure as imported, at cargo prices—thus saving to them five or six per cent of middle-men, which average from 50 cents to $1 per pound. Clubs can be formed in any city or town, by any person, male or female; and to such as will take the trouble we will furnish Teas and Coffees, for their own use, free of charge, to the amount of five per cent on each order they send us. On application, we send by mail circulars containing price list of all our Teas and Coffees, also club lists and terms to agents in detail.

We forward all goods (collect on delivery) by the Express Company, and members of the club can divide the express charges equally among themselves.

PRICE LIST.

UNCOLORED JAPAN, 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb. GUNPOWDER, $1 25; best, $1 50 per lb.

Coffees roasted and ground daily. Ground Coffee, 20 cents, 25 cents, 30 cents, 35 cents; best, 40 cents per pound.

Hotels, saloons, boarding-house keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our

FRENCH BREAKFAST AND DINNER COFFEE, which we sell at the low price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 50 cents to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY, Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St., (Post-Office Box 5643), N. Y.

To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea Trade (previous to the establishment of the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,) we will start with the American Houses, leaving out of the account entirely the profits of the Chinese factors.

First. The American House in China or Japan makes large profits on their sales or shipments—and some of the richest retired merchants in this country have made their immense fortunes through their houses in China.

Second. The Banker makes large profits upon the foreign exchange used in the purchase of Teas.

Third. The Importer makes a profit of 30 to 50 per cent. in many cases.

Fourth. On its arrival here it is sold by the cargo, and the Purchaser sells it to the Speculator in invoices of 1000 to 2000 packages, at an average profit of about 10 per cent.

Fifth. The Speculator sells it to the Wholesale Tea Dealer in lines at a profit of 10 to 15 per cent.

Sixth. The Wholesale Tea Dealer sells it to the Wholesale Grocer in lots to suit his trade at a profit of about 10 per cent.

Seventh. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail Dealer at a profit of 15 to 25 per cent.

Eighth. The Retailer sells it to the Consumer for ALL THE PROFIT HE CAN GET.

When you have added to these EIGHT profits as many brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, and add the original cost of the Tea, it will be perceived what the consumer has to pay. And now we propose to show why we can sell so very much lower than small dealers.

We propose to do away with all these various profits and brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, with the exception of a small commission paid for purchasing to our correspondents in China and Japan, one cartage, and a small profit to ourselves—which, on our large sales, will amply pay us.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city. Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a Club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a Club say how much Tea or Coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price-List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete, send it to us by mail. We will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost—so that there need be no confusion in their distribution: each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the Club can divide equally among themselves.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford.

We send no complimentary package for clubs of less than thirty dollars.

COUNTRY CLUBS, Hand and Wagon Peddlers, and small stores (of which class we are supplying many thousands, all of which are doing well), can have their orders promptly and faithfully filled, and, in case of Clubs, can have each party's name marked on their package and directed, by sending their orders to Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey street.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than thirty dollars had better send post-office drafts, or money, with their orders, to save the expense of collecting by express; but larger orders we will send by express, to collect on delivery.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third by sending directly to

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY. Beware of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are

BOGUS OR IMITATIONS. We have no branches, and do not in any case authorize the use of our name.

Post-Office Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY. Direct Letters to

THE THREE HOLIDAY BOOKS.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,

Have just Published:

I. THE LOVERS' DICTIONARY: A Poetical Treasury of Lovers' Thoughts, Fancies, Addresses, and Dilemmas. Indexed with nearly Ten Thousand References as a Dictionary of Compliments and Guide to the Study of the Tender Science. Post 8vo, Cloth, $3 50; Gilt Edges, $4 25.

A very happily-chosen and numerous collection of love poems from all authors, but so arranged that lovers can make it a lexicon of compliments if they wish. In these 700 pages what lover can not find the wherewith to express his passion? Who shall go away unsatisfied, saying there is not enough? It is the treasury of lovers for thoughts, fancies, addresses, and dilemmas, and as such will be eagerly welcomed and much used by them.—Springfield Republican.

The volume has evidently been edited with great care, the comprehensive index alone implying a great deal of intelligent labor.—Boston Transcript.

II.

MACÉ'S FAIRY BOOK. Home Fairy Tales (Contes du Petit-Château). By JEAN MACÉ, Author of "The Servants of the Stomach," &c. Translated by MARY L. BOOTH, Translator of "Martin's History of France," "Laboulaye's Fairy Book," &c. With Engravings. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75; Gilt Edges, $2 25.

The stories are singularly original, and unlike any thing ever before clothed in English dress.—Sunday-School Times.

Each of the stories is unique and interesting, and with a moral that is not hard to take.—Commercial Advertiser.

In these grotesque and unique stories Macé has combined fun, feeling, and wisdom in a manner to make them very charming.—Congregationalist.

III.

LABOULAYE'S FAIRY BOOK. Fairy Tales of All Nations. By EDOUARD LABOULAYE, Member of the Institute of France. Translated by MARY L. BOOTH, Translator of "Macé's Fairy Tales," "Martin's History of France," &c. With Engravings. 12mo, Cloth, Beveled, $2 00; Cloth, Gilt Edges, $2 50.

The grave professor knows better than most men how to amuse, delight, and instruct children. The collection is a charming one, and Miss Booth has prepared a very pleasant gift for children at the approaching holidays. The illustrations are mostly from the French edition, and are as fanciful as though the imagination of a child had run away with the skillful pencil of the artist.—New York Evening Post.

THOUGHTS ON EGGS.

An egg, like Cæsar's wife, should be above suspicion. Is it probable that the old fowls lay stale eggs, and only the young hens fresh ones?

Eggs resemble roses, being propagated by Layers.

A hen cackles when she lays an egg, and so some stranger benefits by her production. Moral: Never cackle.

A fowl and her eggs are soon parted. Eggs are eggs, be they never so eggy.

CONFIDENTIAL EXORDIUMS.

The Pope observed that he had reason to complain—

The Emperor of Austria said that he felt some hesitation—

The King of Italy remarked that he strongly protested—

The Emperor of Russia replied that he saw no objection—

The Queen of Spain observed that she would only be too happy—

The British Lion said he hoped No Popery—

The Sultan of Turkey confessed he really wondered—Count de Bismarck remarked he had watched most anxiously—

And the Emperor of the French said he had quite determined—

"What's the matter, my dear?" said a wife to her husband, who had sat for half an hour with his face buried in his hands, apparently in great tribulation.

"Oh! I don't know," said he; "I have felt like a fool all day."

"Well," returned the wife, consolingly, "I'm afraid you will never get any better; you look the very picture of what you feel."

In a grave-yard in Vermont is said to be found the following inscription upon a tombstone; but as Jenner first experimented with vaccine matter in 1790 there ought to have been some change of the dates:

Hurried him headlong to the grave.

IMPORTANCE OF PUNCTUATION.

A CAT'S LAMENT.

Oh why, pray, was I ever born?

Why was I not drown'd at my birth?

For the life I daily am leading

Is a sort of a hell upon earth.

Poor mother unconsciously laid

Six of us asleep on a bonnet—

A new one; and how missus raved

At finding us fast asleep on it!

Execution was instantly ordered:

And five were selected for slaughter:

A white tip to my nose and my tail

Saved me from a plunge into water.

I envy all cats that have died,

And been buried in coffins of paste;

Satisfaction I know they have given,

If properly season'd to taste.

I'm alone in a house that's to let;

A feeling exceedingly strange,

For master I find's in a mess

From being unlucky on 'Change.

With lawyers and bailiffs to follow

He's got himself into a fix,

So missus she quietly hook'd it

One night with the family sticks.

At first I could hardly believe it,

After living on all that was nice,

To come to sit watching all day

At a hole for a dinner on mice.

The mice getting shy, I'd to fall

On beetles and crickets; but they,

Not liking the treatment I gave,

To some other place mov'd away.

When I, in a house that is strange,

Ever dare to take up my location,

I've a shovel or broom at my head,

As a sort of a slight intimation.

"Nine lives" have been number'd, and I

Am reduced to my bones and my skin;

So I'll crawl, and my ashes deposit

Where I should, in my grave—the dust-bin.

AN OLD LOVE.

It is not that I love you less devotedly than when Your summers were but twenty—and your children were not ten.

You the queen of this poor bosom in my fancy still

I crown,

As when your name was Parker, and before you married Brown.

No! I love you still as fondly as I did in days of yore,

When I used to call at tea-time, or a little bit before;

When I used to bring the kettle, pour the water in the pot;

When I proffered warm affections, and I handed muffins hot.

No! I love you still as fondly as I did in ancient days,

When we used to go out walking in our sentimental ways;

When I handed you politely over stile and over gutter,

And my feet were in a puddle and my heart was in a flutter.

Then there came a separation, and it cost us sighs and tears—

Our paths, they were divided, as you know, for many years.

And when at length we met again, the changes were not few,

I had taken a drysaltery—and Brown had taken you.

But I love you still as fondly as I used to love you then,

And could I only wed you, should be happiest of men.

But the love of age is wiser than the love of youth by far—

It likes its shares at premium, and does not care for par.

Your wedding Brown I pardon—for they say that he died "warm,"

And wealth would gild the ravages of time on that dear form.

Yet an obstacle arises—but one obstacle—and that's

That I'm told that all the money has been settled on the brats!

"When I goes a shoppin'," said an old lady, "I allers ask for what I wants, and if they have it, and it's suitable, and I feel inclined to buy it, and it's cheap, and can't be got for less, I most allers takes it without chattering about it all day, as some people do."

"Well, why the dickens didn't you knock and wake me?"

"Sure, and because I feared you might be fast asleep."

Hair-Dressing.

WE give several new and tasteful styles of arranging the hair, which continues to be worn quite high, with the chignon nearly covering the back of the head.

Figs. 1 and 2.—Crisp the front hair tightly, and comb it upward over a crêpe, and pass it on the right side under, and on the left side over a braid composed of the back hair, divided in two, and forming a diadem. The chignon is formed of several loops, with a cluster of curls of different lengths in the middle. A single short curl falls in the back of the neck from under the braid.

Figs. 3 and 4.—Part the front hair very far backward, and divide it into two parts; comb the top one upward over a crêpe, and brush the lower one backward. Make the chignon of braids, coiled snailwise, as seen in the illustration, and finish with two Marie Antoinette curls behind the ears.

Figs. 5 and 6.—The high chignon here is encircled with a heavy braid, plaited over a crêpe. Another braid passes round the front of the head. The front hair is divided into two parts, the upper one of which is crisped and drawn backward, and passed with the lower one under the braid.

Fig. 7.—The front hair is crisped and arranged as in the preceding; the superfluous hair, however, is formed into a puff, and the ends of the back hair are made into a bow at the top of the chignon.

Fig. 8.—One part of the front hair is seen crisped and rolled over a thick crêpe, while the other forms one large and two small curls; the last fall on the right side, behind the ear. The back hair is tied high and combed upward over a chignon-crêpe; a large curl falls from the top of the chignon.

Figs. 9 and 10.—The front hair here is parted in the middle, crisped, and rolled upward over a thick crêpe. The back hair is tied high, and arranged over two crêpes, so as to form a snail-shaped chignon. A cluster of curls is placed on the parting in front and on the top of the chignon. A lock of crisped hair falls behind the right ear.

Fig. 11.—The chignon here is composed wholly of curls, with a long curl falling behind the left ear. The front hair is slightly crisped and divided into two locks, one of which is carried under the other; the upper one falls naturally, shading the forehead.

FANNY THE FLIRT.

FANNY the Flirt is a dangerous girl,
She dances so lightly, she smiles so divinely,
She can fling such a glance as she tosses a curl
That her partner believes he is getting on finely—
To stagger away at the last, badly hurt,
For she never shows mercy, does Fanny the Flirt.

Fanny the Flirt, she can smile and look down—
Can smile and look up with an air so confiding!
But, ah! she can kill all your hopes with a frown,
And turn you adrift with a smile of deriding:
No fair coral isle by hid reefs all begirt
Is so treachery-fraught as fair Fanny the Flirt.

Fanny the Flirt may be lovely in face,
But woe to the hand that imprisons her fingers;
And woe to the eyes that half fancy they trace
A meaning in hers of a lovelight that lingers.
When it comes to the trial her answer is curt,
No love and no pity has Fanny the Flirt.

Fanny the Flirt! Retribution must come!
Beauty flies fast as the valse's fleet measure:
When the eye shall be dim and the heart shall be numb,
Will the thoughts of the past bring thee sorrow or pleasure?

Old, neglected, and single thou'lt mourn what thou wert,
And sigh, "Would I ne'er had been Fanny the Flirt!"

Fanny the Flirt, even worse may befall!
To mate—for a home—with a mind uncongenial:
A tyrant, severe where offenses are small,
Whose code does not count any folly is venial—
Who'll storm if a button be missed from his shirt—
But she dances and heeds not, does Fanny the Flirt.

DESCRIPTION OF

OUR FIRST COLORED FASHION PLATE,

ACCOMPANYING THIS NUMBER FOR JAN. 4, 1868.

Dinner and Evening Toilettes.

Fig. 1.—Dress of pearl-gray silk, trimmed in front with three rows of application leaves of green satin, extending the whole length of the skirt, from the belt to the bottom of the dress; one of these rows is straight, the others curve a little on each side. Belt of green satin, with very broad sash ends falling behind. High-necked waist, trimmed with green satin buttons. Close sleeves. Epaulets and wristbands of leaves similar to those on the skirt of the dress.

Fig. 2.—Dress of white silk, with a flounce a little way from the bottom, edged with mauve satin, and ornamented by a ruche of mauve ribbon. Low-necked waist. Bertha of mauve satin, with shoulder-knots of the same. Belt of mauve satin, to which is attached a sort of peplum in the form of a fichu, the point of which depends on the right side, while the sash ends are knotted on the left side. This fichu, together with the bertha and shoulder-knots, is trimmed with mauve knotted tassels and fringe. Coiffure formed of a wreath of brown and white foliage.

A CUP OF COFFEE.

SOME one in the hearing of Voltaire remarked that coffee was a poison. "Then," said the hale old philosopher, exulting in his threescore years and ten, "it must be a very slow poison, for I have drunk it, man and boy, for at least sixty years." So far from his daily cup of coffee having acted injuriously upon the health of the shriveled but vigorous Voltaire, it had, no doubt, by its gently stimulating effect, greatly aided in keeping to its work a brain whose labors have been seldom surpassed, if ever equaled. To the intellectual worker coffee, in fact, seems especially adapted. It exhilarates and arouses the brain, when wearied, to increased strength and a more lively disposition to effort, while, if used moderately, these effects are not followed, as in the case of stronger stimulants, by any sense of prostration. Wine, spirits, opium, and Indian hemp in their action upon the brain especially excite and pervert the imagination; but coffee seems only to affect the reasoning powers, which, without deranging, it stimulates to exercise.

The peculiar properties of coffee have been discovered by chemistry to reside in the three ingredients of which it is composed. A volatile oil, which gives it its aroma, acts as a gentle stimulant, favors transpiration, slightly moves the bowels, and checks the waste of the body; a principle termed, when found in coffee, caffeine, which is identical with the theine obtained from tea, and has, like it, the remarkable property of arresting the waste or decay of the living body; and an astringent acid, which has a tonic and constipating effect, which counteracts the laxative tendency of the volatile oil. Coffee, moreover, is said to have a decided remedial effect in gravel and gout. In France and its colonies both these diseases, where they were once so frequent, have greatly diminished since coffee-drinking has become general. A case is recorded of a gentleman, who, having suffered severely from the age of twenty-five to fifty years with the gout, and whose hands and feet had become knotted with chalk-stones, was cured by the use of coffee, which not only removed the disease, but its uncomfortable deposits.

Six hundred millions of pounds of coffee are the estimated amount of the whole product, chiefly obtained from Arabia, South America, and the East and West Indies. Coffee was first introduced into Europe about two hundred years ago, where its annual consumption has reached over two hundred millions of pounds. Germany and France are the chief consumers in Europe, and over the whole world there are supposed to be nearly a hundred million of coffee-drinkers, or one-fifth of those who regale themselves with tea.

We shall venture to suggest to our housekeepers some hints by which they may learn to improve their coffee, which is confessed by all connoisseurs to be more execrably made in the United States than in any other country. In the first place, the coffee grain must be good; that of Mocha is the best, but the less-esteemed product of Brazil and the West Indies may be rendered almost equal to that of the finest quality by keeping it for a sufficient time in its raw state. "The worst coffee produced," says a competent judge, "will in ten to fourteen years become as good and acquire as high a flavor as the best we now have from Turkey."

Coffee, like tea, should be infused and never boiled. By the latter process, so often adopted in this country, the volatile oil is dissipated, and its pleasant aroma and useful effects lost, and the bitterness and constipating properties of the astringent acid retained too abundantly, giving the beverage a disagreeable taste, and rendering it unwholesome. The coffee, to be good, must be roasted, not burned, just before use, and when ground, quickly made. The water on the boil—the coffee-pot having been previously heated, lest it should reduce the temperature—must be poured over the coffee, spread upon cloth or perforated metal, and allowed to percolate slowly into the receptacle below. A frequent error in this country is the use of too little coffee or too much water. The coffee should always be made strong, and diluted only with boiling milk when ready for drinking.

Coffee is often adulterated with beans, peas, rye, and chicory. These substances are not unwholesome, but they make a beverage which with their color may deceive the eye, but never the taste of the connoisseur. Chicory, which is the most common substitute for or ingredient mixed with coffee, is the powdered root of the common endive, cultivated in our gardens for salad, and has when pure no unwholesome qualities. The ground chicory as sold is often mixed with Venetian red to give it a coffee color, and this Venetian red is not seldom adulterated with brick-dust. It is advisable, therefore, for those who wish to drink a cup of coffee, not only in name and appearance but in reality, to procure the bean in its natural state, and to roast and grind it themselves as they may want it.

WHAT THE WINTER HAS DONE FOR US.

AMONG all our victories over nature our mastery of winter, though seldom noticed, is one of the most significant. A winter fifty years ago was a much more serious inconvenience than now, and more fatal too to comfort and health. The old mythology has been rewritten, and Boreas is a terrible god no more.

The spirit of invention that winter has called forth is one of the pleasant signs of the times, a good omen of the progress we are achieving in the adaptation of the globe to the higher uses of human habitation. To make a catalogue of the arts, public and private, which have abated the severity of winter would be as complimentary to our good sense as to our productive genius. Nor is this all, for we have worked manfully on its good side, and enlisted it in the service of health, culture, and refinement. We understand its tonic virtues, its periodic restoration of jaded nerves, its bountiful supplies for exhausted strength. A bath of cold air is always accessible, always safe if you have a good circulation, and always the cheapest of luxuries, while an hour in the Central Park of a clear winter's day is worth a week at Saratoga. Our people see this very clearly, and are making good use of their knowledge. Summer takes care of itself. But the rough, savage winter has to be brought under civilization, and the people who most thoroughly harness it in obedience to their necessities and tastes are sure to lead in the march of the world's progress.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

A Letter to a Young Poet.

MY DEAR ASAPH,—So you have a volume of poetry ready for the printer, and are only hesitating in your selection of a publisher. You are not alone in the situation, dear Asaph. There are many thousands of young men of your age all over the country who are in the same position, and meditating the same choice. Let me advise you to try the very first publisher that offers; and may you find one as friendly, as gentle, and as true as the one Gifted Hopkins found in Dr. Holmes's "Guardian Angel!" When I say the first publisher that offers you must not misunderstand me. I do not mean that when it is known you have a volume of poetry ready all the great publishers will instantly write and make you munificent offers. No; not exactly that. I use the word offers in the general sense. I mean the publisher most convenient to you. You can make the experiment with him as well as with any. You ask me about manners. My dear boy, in your case good sense, reason, and a little reflection, are the best manners you can show.

For, oh my boy! you are going to wince and suffer. I wish I could help you. I wish I could take your punishment, as the pugilists say, vicariously. But it is impossible. Nobody can bear another man's disappointment more than he can shed another's tears; and nobody can prove to another that he is to be disappointed—at least in such a matter as this. You will think me foolish in saying so, because I have not read your verses. No, I have not; and it is not necessary. Dear child, I read my own fifty years ago, and I know all about it. Mine were yours, and yours are mine; except that I used to write Byron and Campbell and Moore, and you write Tennyson and Browning and Longfellow. I know that I should find poetic feeling and sympathy and facility in your verses. They would show a generous, refined, cultivated mind. They would have rhyme and rhythm; and the young ladies to whom you have read them, and the young gentlemen who know of them, and the kind literary friends to whom you have submitted them, asking their perfectly impartial and unbiased opinion, all agree that they are excellent, and touching, and delightful, and full of promise; and with time and riper experience there is no knowing—in fact, if you could only understand it, dear Asaph—no knowing but that you may some day write poetry.

That is what it means. And what else could you expect? If you send a poem to Mr. Longfellow, for instance, and request his unprejudiced judgment, do you suppose, if he takes any notice of your request, that that kind heart will make you suffer? Is it likely, humanly speaking, that he will say to you that you have written a book full of imitative sentimentality, and that there are at least a million young Americans and Englishmen who can do, and are perpetually engaged in doing precisely the same thing? Of course he will not say this. He will not say it, because he knows that you would not believe it. He knows that you would think him hardened by his own fame; and he is quite modest enough not to trust his own impression of your performances as final even if it were what I have suggested. And what right, my dear young poet, have you to put him or any body else in such a position? If he should not answer, you would think him haughty and cold. If he should reply that your poetry was rubbish, you would think him brutal. If he should say that it seems to him very melodious and full of fine feeling, you would swell and puff like any bird you choose to name. My dear young poet, let your first lesson in good manners be not to force a good man into such a false position.

You say that he ought to tell the truth, though the heavens fall. Possibly. But clearly you have no right to coerce men continually into acts of moral heroism. Be as moral and heroic yourself as you can be; but leave the rest of us alone. You have no right to be perpetually knocking a man down in order to furnish him with the opportunity of exercising the virtue of Christian forgiveness. There is also virtue in Christian justice, remember. But when a poor fellow reads, for instance, what the Nation says of his precious little venture of poems in one slight volume, do you suppose he estimates that particular virtue of justice very highly? Does he not rather say in his heart of hearts, "This is a captious, querulous, bitter, mean, sour, and dastardly personal assault?" But is any body bound to admire your poetry, pray? Am I sour and personal because I thrust my pen through you in the Nation? Why, here is your note to me inclosing that very volume in manuscript, and requesting my unbiased opinion. I post that opinion for you and for mankind at large upon the columns of the Nation, and you declare with a livid lip that I am a mean fellow. My dear Parnassian friend, is it not very evident that you might correct your manners in this respect to very great advantage?

I am aware, dear Asaph, that you have not yet provoked public criticism. You are still deciding who shall publish your poetry. But when the ordeal comes, remember that I have advised you that your manners should be based upon reason and reflection. How many poets are there in this country whose poetry repays publishing? I doubt if there are a dozen. The question for you to ponder is whether you are likely to be the thirteenth. Very properly you ask why you should not be? And that is the question which at least ten thousand other young gentlemen and ladies, with a neat manuscript volume of verses ready for the printer, are also asking at this very moment. And don't misunderstand me, I do not advise you not to print if you can find a publisher. I know that there is not only genius, but there is also the modesty of genius; and if a young fellow should suppose I am cynically asserting that poetry is a lost art, and that all the great poets have appeared and disappeared, he is a very foolish young fellow, and I hope he will live to disprove what I certainly neither believe nor declare.

But first, be reasonable with your publisher (when you find him); second, be reasonable with your critics; third, be reasonable with your public; that is my golden rule for a poet's good manners as a poet. Your publisher sees every day very many young men upon the same business which you come to propose. Perhaps he is a scholar, perhaps not. He may be a man of literary taste, or he may not. But remember that you have not called upon him as a scholar or as a man of taste. You have never seen him before. You have no claim upon him of any kind. Your visit is exclusively one of business. You have called to ask him to spend some of his money. He naturally asks you in what way the expense will be of advantage to him—in what way he can get his money back again. You can only reply that it will return to him from the sale of your book of poetry. Now that is a subject which he thoroughly understands, and of which you know nothing whatever. The sale of books is his business. He studies the market. He has immense experience. In his view, and necessarily, your book is a mere commodity of trade. If your reputation—which is also a marketable commodity—or the subject of your work, or any collateral circumstances, promise a good and remunerative sale, he may be willing to make a bargain.

But do you seriously think he ought to do so because you are conscious of the poetic affatus, and because Mr. Bryant thinks very highly of your verses, and because the master of the Academy at Tidwidgeonvilleopolis is of opinion that your muse combines the lyric fire of Samuel Woodworth with the elegiac tenderness of P. Emmons? Dear poet, in the office of the publisher remember that you are a trader, and that you must be able to show the other "party" a quo for the quid which you require.

And so with your critics. They are not bound to be silent because they do not like your book. In publishing you challenge publicity. You say when you go into print that you have done something worth doing. You have occupied the time and consumed the labor of honest workmen, and if you have wasted them you ought to be exposed. My dear Asaph, I sincerely hope that you do not wish to be one of that great company of spoonneys who say: "If he couldn't speak well of my book, he might have said nothing about it." What! do you decry pickpockets, and yet wish to perpetrate a fraud upon the public? Do you wish only the papers that will from any motive praise you to speak of your poetry? Do you insist that criticism shall be merely publishers' puffing? No, Sir, critics have a duty to do which they can not honorably avoid. If I read in my newspaper or my magazine that you have written a volume of delightful verse, and that certain poets had better look to their laurels, I stop at my bookseller's and order your charming volume, and find that it is not charming at all. The critic has swindled me out of the price of the work. What is that to me that he didn't wish to hurt your feelings? He has not undertaken to spare your feelings, but he has undertaken to tell me the honest truth about books, and he has betrayed his trust.

You will probably take it as a personal affront that a man does not think you a poet after you have written and published your volume. At least, my dear fellow, if you do not you will greatly differ from many others whom I shall not name. But remember, if the critics are unjust they will not prevail. Byron and Keats conquered their sharp censors each in his own way. Your true course is to ask yourself, when somebody says that you are no poet, "Isn't the difficulty with this criticism the fact that it is true?" Asaph, I have had some experience of what is called criticism in this country, and I assure you its fault is not severity.

And be reasonable with your public. I know men who are sour and morose—yes, who are "going to the bad"—because they think they are not appreciated. "There is Narr," says one of these, "see how his books sell! Do you suppose that I can't write as well as Narr!" And the poor fellow is green with envy and spleen. Now, I have generally found that this kind of man overestimated himself; and he was very angry because other people did not take him at his own valuation. But the public is generally fair. It is very often immensely good-natured. Look at it. You despise John Smith as an author; his last poem seems to you utter drivel. Well now, I read in this morning's paper that it has gone into the twenty-fifth thousandth in twenty-five days. I say nothing about the poem, for I may happen to like it more than you do; but is it not plain that if the public is so fond of drivel, you ought not to expect it to like your sublime song? You quarrel with people who dote upon Smith, for instance, that they do not buy your poetry. Why should they? Do you suppose that John Milton would be troubled that the worthy public, which buys hundreds of editions of Martin Farquhar Tupper, buys very few editions of the Paradise Lost?

Think of that, dear Asaph. If your poetry is really poetry, what does it matter for you as a great poet whether the public thinks so or not? If it is not poetry, why should the public admire it? Your proper manners as a poet may be expressed in one word—good-humor. Be sure that you have enough of that for all emergencies, and then may you speedily find a publisher! Your sympathetic Friend,
AN OLD BACHELOR.

HOLIDAY TOYS.

CHRISTMAS TREES.

CHRISTMAS trees this winter are made of metal tubes, trunk, branches, and all in one, imitating so accurately the Christmas pines that when placed beside real trees it is difficult to distinguish the metal tree from the natural one. A pipe connected with the chandelier conducts the gas through every limb, and jets every where light up the tree most brilliantly. Reflectors of polished tin and gay-colored paper enhance the bright display. New ornaments in the shape of flame-colored animals in miniature, elephants, tigers, lobsters, etc., are suspended by elastic cords. For the benefit of our juvenile friends we have looked through Santa Claus's treasures to find out what he has in store for them.

DOLLS.

A handsome doll, possessed of a stately and dignified mien, is dressed in the style of a French Marquise of the ancient régime. A trained skirt of cherry-colored satin opens in front and discloses a white silk petticoat, ruffled with blond lace. The waist is made surplice with a blond chemisette. Sleeves tight to the elbow, where they form a ruffle lined with blond fluted lace. Filigee necklaces and bracelets. Cherry satin high-crowned hat with tiny tufts of white ostrich feathers at the side.

Another is a younger lady with a pretty blonde face of wax—arms and limbs ditto—blue eyes of glass, yet not glassy—and golden curls of real hair. When standing—and she preserves her equilibrium admirably—she is quite tall, three feet and a half indeed. In a reclining position her eyes close as if in slumber. Her clothing, made in her native city, Berlin, is exceedingly stylish. A dress of white poplin gored à la princesse is elaborately braided with blue. Her girdle is of blue silk, with reticule attached containing a tiny mouchoir and porte-monnaie. She wears a jaunty little white felt hat and long blue veil, and high Polish boots of bronze, adorned with tassels and gilt buttons.

A happy faced bride wears a white silk trained dress with lace tunic, blond veil and bandeau of tiny white flowers, gloves of white kid, buttoning up to the elbow, bouquet, lace kerchief, and pearl jewelry.

Another young lady is a miniature copy of a New York belle. She has a bisque head, hazel eyes, rosy cheeks, and sunny brown hair arranged with short curls over the forehead, and large braided chignon. Her dress of blue poplin, of Pyne's best Irish, is made and trimmed in the prevailing style—gored tight in front with a long train. A trained petticoat of crinoline supports her when standing, and displays the graceful sweep of her flowing skirt. Gilt ear-rings and pin.

A saucy little body is jauntily attired in a street suit of Bismarck velvet—short skirt, redingote, and toquet, such as are seen every fine afternoon on Broadway.

Still another with baby face, light frizzed hair, and night-dress, says papa and mamma when pressed to do so. Lying down she folds her arms and closes her eyes in slumber. One, very small, is put to sleep in a swinging cradle by pulling a cord at the side. On pulling another string she opens her eyes; at a third pull she cries; a fourth jerk and she throws up her arms; one pull more and she sits bolt upright, screaming at the top of her lungs.

Besides these there are tanned leather dolls warranted to fall without breaking, and to wash, with soap and water, without fading. There are rubber dolls dressed in crocheted suits, and in Scotch costumes. Again, there are Papal Zouaves, gay hussars, Swiss peasants, and Russians clad in furs; Napoleons with fierce eyes and fiercer mustache, beside meek little Red Riding Hoods; angel dolls in cherub array, with a sash about the waist and outspread wings; boot-blacks and contrabands; whole families of paper-dolls, with mamma and daughters displaying the latest Paris fashions; rattle-dolls à la Japanese, with little jingling bells every where, and an ivory handle; patriotic misses draped with the flag; and china-dolls provided with three changes of dress.

MUSICAL TOYS.

The handsomest toy of the season, sold by-the-way at eighty-five dollars, is in a rosewood box about two feet square. The front and top of glass disclose an amphitheatre filled with spectators and gayly-dressed figures on the stage, above which is stretched a tight rope. On turning a crank at the side of the box music is heard—very sweet music too, and played with good effect, for the figures on the stage begin to dance in a frenzied manner, but in excellent time, and a tiny Blondin appears on the tight-rope above, wheeling a barrow back and forth, amidst the fluttering of flags and tossing of caps in the audience.

Another toy, handsome enough for a parlor ornament, represents a fairy with her wand and lyre reclining in a grove under a globe of glass. An outer globe is filled with water in which are tiny gold fish, alive and swimming. Seen through the water the nymph of the sea appears to be a great distance away. When a concealed crank is turned she seizes her lyre, assumes an attitude, and almost deludes one into believing that the fairy-like strains of music on the water proceed from her magic fingers instead of the machinery in the box beneath her.

A miniature ball-room is another musical plaything. Gayly-dressed couples represent the Feszivig festival—"people not to be trifled with, who would dance, and had no notion of walking." When the machinery is wound up the music begins, the fiddlers play in earnest, and away they go: "top couple down the middle and back again, new top couples starting off again as soon as they got there; all top couples at last, and not a bottom one to help them."

Small hand-organs for parlor use are sold for fifteen and twenty dollars. They are enclosed in pretty rosewood boxes, and play four dancing tunes—a waltz, polka, schottish, and quadrilles. A round music-box, scarcely larger than the palm of the hand, is made of tin. It may be thrown about in the roughest manner without injury, and set in operation by a very small child. Turn a screw, and it plays Il Bacio and Somnambula in sweet low tones with perfect accuracy. There are musical sewing-machines and spinning-wheels; whistles of every shape and sound; and drums that are played upon by sticks moved by a crank playing a tattoo—far preferable to the monotonous rub-a-dub-dub heard in the nursery when the sticks are guided by hands unused to the art.

JAPANESE TOYS AND FIRE-WORKS.

Some of the most ingenious toys are of Japanese and Chinese origin. The "All-Right" top-spinning sword is not a novelty; the real Japanese humming-top is newer. When wound up and set in motion half a dozen smaller tops issue from the large one, spinning and humming for several minutes. Two dollars and a half is the price.

The Steam Top and Jig Dancer is made on scientific principles. An alcohol lamp under a saucer of water generates steam. The steam spins the top and makes a merry negro suspended above it dance a jig. Price two dollars. A Chinese plaything represents the steps of a pagoda, on which are athletes on a ladder turning somersaults. The sides of the ladder are tubes in which are balls of mercury that give the proper impetus and turn the figures down each step, never missing one or tumbling over. Others perform wonderful antics while being drawn on a wagon with wheels of watch-springs.

The Automatic Swimming Bird must be placed in a large bath-tub after being wound up by machinery. By means of a screw between the metallic webs the position of the webs and the course is regulated, the duck swimming to the right or left, backward or forward, in the most natural manner.

A Chinese juggler is made to toss plates over his head and catch them again, dancing all the while to music proceeding from a box beneath him. Another leaps through a hoop, and throws balls in the air in the most methodical way. The Zoetrope, or magic wheel, by an optical delusion, produces in a mirror all sorts of amusing scenes.

Hand-grenades that may be used in the parlor send out harmless missiles in every direction. Japanese lightning is an innocent kind of fire-works, the stick, held in the hand, sends out stars of fire through the room. Most curious of all is the Chinese wonder-paper for perfuming a room. Crimp a slip of the paper, set it on a table, and apply fire; instantly green grass an inch high springs up, and a delicious odor is diffused through the apartment.

PUZZLES AND GAMES.

There is an immense variety of puzzles and games. There are gipsy oracles and Yankee fortune-tellers; the games of squalls and parlor lotto; Chinese billiards and croquet for the floor and for the table. There are ruined castles and the Coliseum all to be rebuilt of blocks of wood; Swiss chalets, with peasants' goats and Alpine scenery; the Siege of the Mountain, Zouaves at bivouac, and village school-houses, built of alphabet blocks, with illuminated letters and engravings; scenes in Normandy, fox-hunts, and most terrible shipwrecks. There is a metamorphoscope exhibiting a hundred different figures, groups of children, landscapes, battles, villages, processions, etc. An improved kaleidoscope produces, as if by magic, the most beautiful pictures from common garden-flowers.

COMICALITIES.

There are clowns performing most absurd antics when turned by a crank, nodding and dancing; orators gesticulating and shaking their heads in the wisest manner; caricatures of Napoleon and Bismarck consulting the thermometer of Europe; apes blacking boots; Punch and Judy wrangling as usual; a huge Russian swallowing a Cossack; grotesque figures holding a carnival on wheels—when drawn along they move about in a ludicrous dance; and hosts of other absurdities that make one laugh at the first glance.

GIFTS FOR GIRLS.

A very expensive present for a little girl is a miniature dinner-set of French china, ornamented with a painted wreath. In the same case with the china are cut-glass goblets, silver-ware, cutlery, bronze candelabras, and table linen—everything, indeed, that the most fastidious little folks could desire for a bountifully-spread table—all carefully packed away in an oaken chest.

Another case contains a tiny and complete toilette set, brushes, combs, hand-glass, pomade-jar, etc. Still another is a drawing-room with rosewood and brocatelle furniture; again, there is a dining-room, a kitchen, an old-fashioned cupboard well supplied with crockery, and doll equipments of every kind, carriages, coupés, and sleighs.

A useful present, called the Little Embroiderer, is a work-box furnished with worsteds, patterns, needles, and simple directions for using them. A color-box is supplied with paints, pallet, and brushes. The Moss Rose Surprise-box is a bunch of roses and buds. As you stoop to smell the perfume a concealed spring opens the largest rose with a loud noise and a doll fairy flies at your face.

GIFTS FOR BOYS.

For boys there are leaping-horses arranged on a platform in order not to injure the carpets; goats that bleat, and dogs that bark; menageries with all sorts of wild animals; fire-engines with hose that throw the water across a room; livery stables with vehicles, hostlers, and horses; grocery stores and restaurants; pack-mules with well-filled panniers, driven by Swiss muleteers; express-wagons heavily laden with boxes, barrels, and parcels; ships, steamers, and craft of every nation; locomotive and train; canes, riding-whips, etc.—all exact imitations of those used by the grown folks every day before admiring boyish eyes.

PERSONAL.

It is understood that the Rev. Dr. HENRY S. POTTER, at present Assistant Minister of Trinity Church, Boston (Bishop Eastburn's), has been called to the rectorship of Grace Church in this city. Dr. P. is a gentleman about five-and-thirty years of age, of superior pulpit powers, and very fine-looking. The call is a ten-thousand-per-annum one. The Doctor is a son of the late Bishop of Pennsylvania.

—The Mr. ROEBLING who built the Suspension Bridges at Niagara Falls and Cincinnati, and who is to build the great Suspension Bridge over the East River, has purchased for himself a little farm of 23,000 acres in Iowa, on which he proposes to settle down, and thus chant to himself:

"Poor drudge of the city!
How happy he feels,
With burrs on his legs
And the grass at his heels;
No ladder behind,
His headman to share,
No constable grumbling—
'You can not go there!'"

—Of Mr. MOTLEY's third and fourth volumes of the History of the Netherlands, to be published in three or four weeks by the HARPERS, the London Spectator naively says: "We do not intend, of course, to criticize the history. To do that a critic must possess a knowledge of authorities equal to Mr. MOTLEY's, and we do not possess it."

—The lady readers of the Bazar must not speak too lightly of the night-cap department of our illustrations, for in certain emergencies a want of attention in that regard might prove annoying. Remember, Lady MARGARET HERBERT once asked a friend for a pretty pattern for a night-cap. "Well," said the person, "what signifies the pattern of a night-cap?" "Oh, child," said she, "you know in case of fire!"

—Imitating the examples of THACKERAY and DIKENS, Miss MARY E. BRADDON is coming over to us to say a few things that she thinks will interest that portion of the nation who read her novels.

—ROSSINI, charming old musician, stands upon his dignity with the pecunious ROTHSCHILD, and refuses to visit or dine with him, simply because when Mr. R. was a little "short" one day, some five-and-forty years ago, the Baron refused to discount his paper for fifty francs—say about ten dollars. Rossini's notes in that day, whether musical or "accommodation," were less marketable than now.

—People live to be very old on different sorts of edible and potable. GUIZOT and AUBER are each 80. The former conceals in his person a bottle of claret every day at dinner and eats as doth a laboring man. AUBER, on the other hand, abandons himself to cold water, light food, and much trot a-horseback. Each of the old gentlemen works his eight hours a day, and likes it.

—CARLOTTA PATTI's first week of warbling in the French provinces, this season, brought into her privy purse the consolatory sum of seven thousand dollars in gold. She is a very nice person, and deserves it.

—How old the people are growing! Now, there is Uncle NATHANIEL FULLERTON, who at 92 goes daily to his bank at Bellows Falls, Vermont, and "does" paper just as the Cashier of our Grocers' Bank does; and there, too, is Aunt RACHEL HEATH, who died recently in Brownville, Maine, at 102, leaving an unprotected young daughter of 82!

—HENRY WARD BEECHER's farm near Peekskill is reported to have yielded him $3700 last year from the sale of carrots, currants, celery, cabbages, and such. He disposes of all his surplus roots in exchange for the root of all evil. As a business, however, we reckon it don't pay. Sowing wheat in Plymouth and tares in Peekskill are so utterly at variance!

—One winter, some years gone by, Mr. JOHN HECKER, the great flourist and baker of this city, gave to the poor several thousand loaves of bread. Baron ROTHSCHILD, of Paris, does the same thing yearly, and this year has placed at the office of the Public Assistance Society 30,000 tickets, each entitling the holder to two pounds of bread.

—Since WHITTIER, the poet, lost his sister he has lived a very secluded life at Amesbury. He is a bachelor of 60. Next to LONGFELLOW he sells better than any American poet. His early life was passed on a farm, at hard work, until he was eighteen. He had no education other than what he picked up from a few winters' attendance on the public schools of his native district. At the age of twenty, however, he had managed to secure two years' tuition at a town academy; but then he left school to work his way in the world, and what he has since learned he has gathered from contact with actual life, or by solitary study in his own library. To this lack of classical culture may doubtless be attributed the charming simplicity of his style, and the peculiar American character of all his writings.

—The excellent custom of pensioning clergymen, who have given the best of their lives to a particular congregation or parish, has been followed by the First Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia, that has retired the Rev. ALBERT BARNES on $1000 per annum. Trinity Church, in this city, not only has the same custom, but allows a very liberal pension to the widow of any clergyman who may die in the service of the parish.

—Excellent Mrs. THORNE (SUSAN), who died recently, at Carlisle, Pennsylvania, bequeathed $21,500 to various benevolent societies connected with the Presbyterian, Methodist, and Episcopal churches in her proximity, and directed that whatever might be left should be equally divided among the "five boards" of the Presbyterian Church.

—BRIGHAM YOUNG has issued a Scarlet Letter to the young bucks of Utah, directing every one of them to get married; and, by way of hurrying them up, says that if after a certain day any girls "are left over" he will marry them himself.

—The estate of the late ELIAS HOWE, Jun., foots up six hundred and eighteen thousand dollars, which it is needless to say was made by a needle.

—The youngest brother of the Emperor of Austria, Louis VICTOR, is off to Madrid to be united in the holy bonds, etc., to the youngest daughter of the Queen of all the Spains.

—The Protestant Episcopal Society for the promotion of Evangelical knowledge have published a sketch of the famous LOLA MONTEZ, and her conversion to Christianity. At an early age she eloped with a British officer to India; disagreed with him; separated; returned to England; took to the stage. The King of Bavaria fell in love with her at Munich, created her Countess of Landsfeld, and settled a large estate upon her, with feudal rights over two thousand persons. A change of cabinet in 1848 brought into power those who drove her out of the country. Wonderful and rapid as had been her elevation, her fall was still more sudden—her estates confiscated—like the prodigal, she had "wasted her substance with riotous living," and now reduced to distress and poverty, she went once more upon the stage. In 1852 she came to the United States, but was not a success. remained two or three years, and went to Australia. returned and settled down in New York; lectured in various places with pecuniary success; finally became deeply interested in religious matters; devoted much time to the interests of the Magdalen Asylum. In the latter part of 1860, Dr. HAWKS received a message from LOLA MONTEZ earnestly requesting him to visit her as a clergyman. He has left a statement of his visit, and found her smitten down with a paralysis of her left side, and death seemed to be at hand. He states that in the course of a long experience he never saw deeper penitence or humility, and more contrition of soul than in this poor woman. Nothing could exceed the fervor of her devotion; and never had he a more watchful and attentive hearer when he read the Scriptures. It lay always within reach of her hand; and on his first visit to her he opened her Bible, and of its own accord, as it were, to the touching story of the Saviour's forgiveness of the Magdalen in the house of Simon.

He found her a woman of genius, highly accomplished, and of great natural eloquence. At times he listened to her amidst her streaming tears, as, "with her right hand uplifted, and her singularly-expressive features—especially her keen black eyes—speaking as plainly as her tongue, she would dwell upon her religious enjoyments. She seemed to be the preacher, and not her pious visitor. When near her last moments, unable to speak, she was asked for a sign of her soul's peace, when, fixing her eyes on the Doctor's, she calmly nodded her dying head affirmatively, and departed, we trust, to the land of rest.

—The DUKE OF ARGYLE goes about Scotland lecturing, just as EMERSON and SAXE do here; has been elected an honorary member of the Young Men's Christian Association of Glasgow, takes an interest in it, and lectures before it; is an A 1 lecturer: can tell a good story too, as the following will show. He was traveling with the DUKE OF NORTHUMBERLAND in a first-class carriage on the Northeastern Railway. At one of the stations a little commercial traveler got in. The three chatted familiarly until the train stopped at Alnwick Junction. Here the DUKE OF NORTHUMBERLAND got out, and was met by a train of flunkies and servants. The commercial traveler said to his remaining companion, "That must be some great swell." "Yes," said the DUKE OF ARGYLE: "he is the DUKE OF NORTHUMBERLAND." "Bless me!" exclaimed the bagman; "and to think that he should have been so affable to two little snobs like us!"

—The letter-writers are ubiquitous, penetrating the haunts and homes of noted men and women, and writing of them as though the whole world was athirst for items personal. Here is what a pen-and-ink man of Cambridge writes, after having taken stock of LONGFELLOW: "Since the fearful death of his wife the outward man of the poet has altered much. The step is less buoyant than it was, the bearing less joyous, the look less elate. The florid man has matured into an exceeding mellowness of dignity. Ripe and rich looking he always was—exquisitely neat in dress and exquisitely elegant in person—though always animated by a suspicion of foppiness. But now he has attained a wonderful completeness of expression. His aspect is that of a bard in the full affluence of his years and the full wealth of his genius. His silvored hair is long and wavy. His beard grows white and thick beneath his chin, looking more like a deep lace ruff than any thing else. His voice is melodious as an organ, and his features, handsome as ever, have been touched with new lines by the action of thought and sorrow. His manners are very beautiful to all persons, and he carries about him that indescribable atmosphere that marks the perfectly cultured gentleman."

—Three of the prominent literary men of London—TOM TAYLOR, EDMUND YATES, and ANTHONY TROLLOPE—were clerks in the London Post-office. The writer of this was also at one time clerk in a post-office, where the receipts ran as high as $100 per annum. There are not many book-people in the New York city Post-office, but in the Custom-house there are several—RICHARD GRANT WHITE, R. H. STODARD, BARRY GRAY, and others. It is considered quite reputable for literary people to be "in the Customs."

—SPURGEON has a difficulty with his feet—gout: don't like to say "no" to an invitation where nice people are convened to do the usual thing with nice edibles and potables. He's becoming quite copious in person, and some of his friends think he had better stop for a little.

—GEORGE D. PRENTICE, the Louisville editor, the American poet, takes things in the easiest sort of way in his editorial sanctum: sits in easy-chair: feet in slippers; loose woolen jacket instead of coat: black felt-hat, full of paragraphs written on uneven little strips of paper; gives handful to foreman: goes out to lunch; asks you to go (if you amount to anything); sits at table and sips wine with a newspaper before him; eyes twinkle; takes out pencil and traces illegible scrawl on margin; tears it off and puts into hat; keeps doing it until margin is used up; goes back to office. All around on the floor are scattered exchanges; in his lap he holds book of reference. On opposite side of table sits amanuensis, who jots down words that spring from the busy brain and fall from the thin lips. Book-cases, stored with rare works, monopolize walls of the room, and if it is in the chilly days of autumn a sickly coal-fire smolders in the open grate. Present card and state business, and the man who sits with slippers ease in arm-chair will motion you to a seat with courtly dignity, and then if you chance to touch upon some bright theme of the past you will unlock a rich store-house of incident and learning. The sad face will flush with youth; and as the golden memories come trooping by you will be regaled with descriptions and anecdotes of the great men of the last generation.

—The young KING OF BAVARIA isn't at all nice. He has broken his promise of marriage to the Princess SORHIA, and goes on in a very naughty way. says he has only three wishes: first, not to reign; second, not to reside at Munich; third, not to marry. He is a flighty young fellow, and wouldn't do at all as a family man.

—A notable English banker, long resident in Mexico, Mr. EUSTACIO BARRON, has recently deceased. He was a great friend of ex-Postmaster ISAAC V. FOWLER, who lately returned to Mexico to resume a position of responsibility in one of Mr. BARRON's mining and manufacturing establishments. He was twice a millionaire, and was one of the foremost bankers in Mexico; "and yet," Mr. BARRON was accustomed to observe, "when I come to England not half a dozen people know who I am." In the United States, however, he was celebrated as the plaintiff in a famous lawsuit against the United States Government, which had seized upon the negocio of the New Almaden, and, although victorious in the Supreme Court at Washington, was slain at last to compound the BARRON claim for a million and three quarters of dollars.

—A very "loud" person of the name of CLARK is extant in Paris, lately exported from this country. He is largely "in oil." Just at the present writing he pervades one of the prominent hotels, occupying twenty-eight elegantly furnished rooms for his family of four persons. It is said he has no end of money.

Foot Muff.

This beautiful and comfortable foot muff, which can be folded up and carried as a satchel when not needed, will be found excellent for driving or traveling. It consists of two pieces of enameled cloth, each three quarters of a yard long and three-eighths of a yard wide, and pointed at one end, as shown in the illustration. Both these pieces are bound with black worsted braid, with the exception of the straight end, which is faced. The slippers of black cloth, lined with white fur, and embroidered with white silk in arabesque designs, are sewn on one of these pieces. A piece of enameled cloth, a quarter of a yard long and an eighth of a yard wide, is set on the straight end to serve as a pocket. For the better protection of the foot muff a third piece of brown linen, of the same size as the two first, and bound with red worsted braid, is stitched on the straight end; when the muff is closed, as is seen in first illustration, this linen comes between the enameled cloth. A handle, made of strong cord, covered with enameled cloth, is set on the outside of the foot muff, which is fastened with a button and loop.

Walnut Purse.

This tasteful little purse is netted of blue silk, and inclosed within a walnut shell. Take a large English walnut; bore two holes in the top of each half, and one hole in each side of the bottom; open it carefully, take out the kernel, wash the shell with soap and water, and give it several coatings of copal varnish. Cast on thirty stitches with blue floselle on wooden needles two-fifths of an inch in circumference, and net twelve rounds. Cast off the stitches, and fasten the bag in the nut by sewing it through the holes at the top and the bottom. Finish the bottom with steel beads and tassels; pass a silk cord, run through the meshes of the purse, through the holes in the top of the walnut, and finish the ends with steel tassels.

Feather Flowers.

THESE flowers are well suited for vases, etc., and can be made of pigeons', birds', or even hens' feathers. The first of the accompanying illustrations represents a rose of white feathers, and the second a lily of gray. The leaves are cut in the desired shape from the wing feathers, the tip of the feather forming the point of the leaf. The leaves are fastened on wires, and wound with green or white silk in the manner shown in the illustration. The pistils and stamens of the lily are made of white wool stiffened with gum-arabic, and dotted at the end with a bit of black sealing-wax.

Knitting Work-Bag.

MATERIALS: Reeds or steel springs one-fourth of an inch wide, green worsted, black floselle, steel beads, ton, ornamented with steel beads. A green silk bag, six inches longer than the frame, is then fastened within the latter, and is closed at the top by means of a green silk cord and tassels, run through a shirr in the bag.

Tatting and Silk Basket.

MATERIALS: Gray crochet cotton, blue silk, and blue ribbon.—This basket is made on a wire frame, which is shown in the accompanying illustration, of reduced size. This frame is covered on the outside with tatting rosettes, made of gray cotton, and is lined with blue silk, and trimmed with ruffles of blue ribbon, about three-fourths of an inch wide. The bottom is covered on the inside with a cushion of wadding, and is furnished on the outside with a circular stand, made by working over a cord in the single crochet. Two wire rings, wound with ribbon and covered with tatting, serve as handles to the basket.

The height of the original is about five inches. The circumference of the upper edge is about thirty-three inches, and the diameter of the bottom about four-and-a-half inches. The stand is a little over an inch high, and is widened about an inch toward the bottom. The wire frame having been thus prepared, it is wound with narrow blue ribbon.

The tatting is worked in separate rosettes. In every one of the eight divisions of the upper part there must be five rosettes, and in each of the eight divisions of the lower part there must be one rosette. Of each of these six rosettes three must be larger and three smaller. The accompanying illustration shows the full size of the larger rosettes. Beginning in the middle of the rosette work as follows: 1 loop consisting of 1 double stitch (a double stitch has one stitch to the right and one to the left), 10 picots, each separated by 2 double stitches, 1 double stitch. The thread must be joined to the 1st picot of the loop. * leave about one-sixth of an inch of thread, and begin another loop; for this make 4 double, 1 picot, 3 double, 3 picots each separated by 2 double, 3 double, 1 picot, 4 double; leave the same length of thread between the loops as before, and join to the next picot of the 1st loop. Repeat 9 times from *. In every succeeding loop, however, in place of one picot attach to the last picot of the preceding loop, then fasten the thread. In all the little rosettes the middle loop has 1 double, 9 picots, each separated by 2 double, 1 double. To this loop join 9 other loops, each of which must consist of 3 double, 1 picot, 4 double, 1 picot, 4 double, 1 picot, 3 double. The rosettes are united by small two, three, and four-leaved figures, as shown in the illustration. Each of the little leaves consists of 10 double stitches, and must be joined to the corresponding picots of the rosettes. Along the upper edge of each of the 8 parts are placed 2 green silk, and fine green silk cord. Wind the reeds or steel springs with green worsted; stitch the worsted thereon with black floselle in the pattern shown in the illustration, which gives the original size, and sew steel beads singly around the edge. The ends of the reeds must likewise be bound with green silk. The shape of the bag is shown in the illustration. Sew nine reeds, thirteen inches long, together at the ends, and fasten another, ten inches long, crossways, in the middle of these. On each side of this cross-piece, about three and a half inches from it, put a reed ring, twelve inches long. Under each of these rings put the ends of three short reeds, the other ends of which are fastened with the ends of the nine long reeds. The ends of the reeds are covered, at each extremity of the bag, with a rosette of green silk, in the middle of which is a conical silk but-large rosettes, to which the 3 small rosettes are joined, while the 3d large rosette forms one of the 8 divisions of the stand. All the wires of the basket, as well as the rings for the handles, are covered with loops of tatting lapping over one another. These loops are made as follows: 2 double, 6 picots, each separated by 2 double, 2 double; then begin another loop at the distance of one-sixth of an inch. Make a row of these loops as shown in the illustration. The thread that unites them is sewed half-way round each loop on the wrong side. The place where the handles are fastened on is covered on each side with a bow of blue ribbon, an inch wide. The frame is lined with blue silk, cushioned on the bottom, and trimmed round the edge on the inside with ruffles of blue ribbon in the manner described, and as seen in the illustration.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE SHADOW OF THE AFRICAN FOREST.

LET us return to the castaways.

It was morning on the coast of Africa—Africa the mysterious, the inhospitable Africa, leonum arida nutrit.

There was a little harbor into which flowed a shallow, sluggish river, while on each side rose high hills. In front of the harbor was an island which concealed and protected it.

Here the palm-trees grew. The sides rose steeply, the summit was lofty, and the towering palms afforded a deep, dense shade. The grass was fine and short, and, being protected from the withering heat was as fine as that of an English lawn. Up the palm-trees there climbed a thousand parasitic plants, covered with blossoms—gorgeous, golden, rich beyond all description. Birds of starry plumage flitted through the air, as they leaped from tree to tree, uttering a short, wild note; through the spreading branches sighed the murmuring breeze that came from off the ocean; round the shore the low tones of the gently-washing surf were borne as it came in in faint undulations from the outer sea.

Underneath the deepest shadow of the palms lay Brandon. He had lost consciousness when he fell from the boat; and now for the first time he opened his eyes and looked around upon the scene, seeing these sights and hearing the murmuring sounds.

In front of him stood Beatrice, looking with drooped eyelids at the grass, her arms half folded before her, her head uncovered, her hair bound by a sort of fillet around the crown, and then gathered in great black curling masses behind. Her face was pale as usual, and had the same marble whiteness which always marked it. That face was now pensive and sad; but there was no weakness there. Its whole expression showed manifestly the self-contained soul, the strong spirit evenly-poised, willing, and able to endure.

Brandon raised himself on one arm and looked wonderingly around. She started. A vivid flash of joy spread over her face in one bright smile. She hurried up and knelt down by him.

"Do not move—you are weak," she said, as tenderly as a mother to a sick child.

Brandon looked at her fixedly for a long time without speaking. She placed her cool hand on his forehead. His eyes closed as though there were a magnetic power in her touch. After a while, as she removed her hand, he opened his eyes again. He took her hand and held it fervently to his lips. "I know," said he, in a low, dreamy voice, "who you are, and who I am—but nothing more. I know that I have lost all memory; that there has been some past life of great sorrow; but I can not think what that sorrow is—I know that there has been some misfortune, but I can not remember what."

Beatrice smiled, sadly. "It will all come to you in time."

"At first when I waked," he murmured, "and looked around on this scene, I thought that I had at last entered the spirit-world, and that you had come with me; and I felt a deep joy that I can never express. But I see, and I know now, that I am yet on the earth. Though what shore of all the earth this is, or how I got here, I know not."

"You must sleep," said she, gently.

"And you—you—you," he murmured, with indescribable intensity—"you, companion, preserver, guardian angel—I feel as though, if I were not a man, I could weep my life out at your feet."

"Do not weep," said she, calmly. "The time for tears may yet come; but it is not now."

He looked at her, long, earnestly, and inquiringly, still holding her hand, which he had pressed to his lips. An unutterable longing to ask something was evident; but it was checked by a painful embarrassment.

"I know nothing but this," said he at last, "that I have felt as though sailing for years over infinite seas. Wave after wave has been impelling us on. A Hindu servant guided the boat. But I lay weak, with my head supported by you, and your arms around me. Yet, of all the days and all the years that ever I have known, these were supreme, for all the time was one long ecstasy. And now, if there is sorrow before me," he concluded, "I will meet it resignedly, for I have had my heaven already."

"You have sailed over seas," said she, sadly; "but I was the helpless one, and you saved me from death."

"And are you—to me—what I thought?" he asked, with painful vehemence and imploring eyes.

"I am your nurse," said she, with a melancholy smile.

He sighed heavily. "Sleep now," said she, and she again placed her hand upon his forehead. Her touch soothed him. Her voice arose in a low song of surpassing sweetness. His senses yielded to the subtle incantation, and sleep came to him as he lay.

When he awoke it was almost evening. Lethargy was still over him, and Beatrice made him sleep again. He slept into the next day. On waking there was the same absence of memory. She gave him some cordial to drink, and the draught revived him. Now he was far stronger, and he sat up, leaning against a tree, while Beatrice knelt near him. He looked at her long and earnestly.

"I would wish never to leave this place, but to stay here," said he. "I know nothing of my past life. I have drunk of Lethe. Yet I can not help struggling to regain knowledge of that past."

He put his hand in his bosom, as if feeling for some relic.

"I have something suspended about my neck," said he, "which is precious. Perhaps I shall know what it is after a time."

Then, after a pause, "Was there not a wreck?" he asked.

"Yes; and you saved my life."

"Was there not a fight with pirates?"

"Yes; and you saved my life," said Beatrice again.

"I begin to remember," said Brandon. "How long is it since the wreck took place?"

"It was January 15."

"And what is this?"

"February 6. It is about three weeks."

"How did I get away?"

"In a boat with me and the servant."

"Where is the servant?"

"Away providing for us. You had a sunstroke. He carried you up here."

"How long have I been in this place?"

"A fortnight."

Numerous questions followed. Brandon's memory began to return. Yet, in his efforts to regain knowledge of himself, Beatrice was still the most prominent object in his thoughts. His dream-life persisted in mingling itself with his real life.

"But you," he cried, earnestly—"you, how have you endured all this? You are weary; you have worn yourself out for me. What can I ever winds were lulled into calm, and a delicious languor stole upon all his senses.

"Sweet, sweet, sweet, god Pan,
Sweet in the fields by the river,
Blinding sweet, oh great god Pan,
The sun on the hills forgot to die,
And the lily revived, and the dragon-fly
Came back to dream by the river."

It was the μελίσσηρον ὄπα, the ὄπα κάλλιμον of the sirens.

For she had that divine voice which of itself can charm the soul; but, in addition, she had that poetic genius which of itself could give words which the music might clothe.

Now, as he saw her at a distance through the trees and marked the statuesque calm of her classic face, as she stood there, seeming in her song rather to soliloquize than to sing, breathing forth her music "in profuse strains of unprepared art," the very beauty of the singer and the very sweetness of the song put an end to all temptation.

"This is folly," he thought. "Could one like that assent to my wild fancy? Would she, with her genius, give up her life to me? No; that divine music must be heard by larger numbers. She is one who thinks she can interpret the inspiration of Mozart and Handel. And who am I?"

Then there came amidst this music a still small voice, like the voice of those helpless ones at home; and this voice seemed one of entreaty and of despair. So the temptation passed. But it passed only to be renewed again. As for Beatrice, she seemed conscious of no such effect as do to show my gratitude? You have watched me night and day. Will you not have more care of your own life?"

The eyes of Beatrice kindled with a soft light. "What is my life?" said she. "Do I not owe it over and over again to you? But I deny that I am worn out."

Brandon looked at her with earnest, longing eyes.

His recovery was rapid. In a few days he was able to go about. Cato procured fish from the waters and game from the woods, so as to save the provisions of the boat, and they looked forward to the time when they might resume their journey. But to Brandon this thought was repugnant, and an hourly struggle now went on within him. Why should he go to England? What could he do? Why should he ever part from her?

"Oh, to burst all links of habit, and to wander far away,
On from island unto island at the gateways of the day!"

In her presence he might find peace, and perpetual rapture in her smile.

In the midst of such meditations as these her voice once arose from afar. It was one of her own songs, such as she could improvise. It spoke of summer isles amidst the sea; of soft winds and spicy breezes; of eternal rest beneath overshadowing palms. It was a soft, melting strain—a strain of enchantment, sung by one who felt the intoxication of the scene, and whose genius imparted it to others. He was like Ulysses listening to the song of the sirens. It seemed to him as though all nature there joined in that marvelous strain. It was to him as though the very this. Calmly and serenely she bore herself, singing as she thought, as the birds sing, because she could not help it. Here she was like one of the classic nymphs—like the genius of the spot—like Calypso, only passionless.

Now, the more Brandon felt the power of her presence the more he took refuge within himself, avoiding all dangerous topics, speaking only of external things, calling upon her to sing of loftier themes, such as those "cieli immensi" of which she had sung when he first heard her. Thus he fought down the struggles of his own heart, and crushed out those rising impulses which threatened to sweep him helplessly away.

As for Beatrice herself she seemed changeless, moved by no passion and swayed by no impulse. Was she altogether passionless, or was this her matchless self-control? Brandon thought that it was her nature, and that she, like her master Languetti, found in music that which satisfied all passion and all desire.

In about a fortnight after his recovery from his stupor they were ready to leave. The provisions in the boat were enough for two weeks' sail. Water was put on board, and they bade adieu to the island which had sheltered them.

This time Beatrice would not let Brandon row while the sun was up. They rowed at night, and by day tried to get under the shadow of the shore. At last a wind sprang up; they now sailed along swiftly for two or three days. At the end of that time they saw European houses, beyond which arose some roofs and spires. It was Sierra Leone. Brandon's conjectures had been right. On landing here Brandon simply said that they had been wrecked in the Falcon, and had escaped on the boat, all the rest having perished. He gave his name as Wheeler. The authorities received these unfortunate ones with great kindness, and Brandon heard that a ship would leave for England on the 6th of March.

The close connection which had existed between them for so many weeks was now severed, and Brandon thought that this might perhaps remove that extraordinary power which he felt that she exerted over him. Not so. In her absence he found himself constantly looking forward toward a meeting with her again. When with her he found the joy that flowed from her presence to be more intense, since it was more concentrated. He began to feel alarmed at his own weakness.

The 6th of March came, and they left in the ship Junco for London.

Now their intercourse was like that of the old days on board the Falcon.

"It is like the Falcon," said Beatrice, on the first evening. "Let us forget all about the journey over the sea, and our stay on the island."

"I can never forget that I owe my life to you," said Brandon, vehemently.

"And I," rejoined Beatrice, with kindling eyes, which yet were softened by a certain emotion of indescribable tenderness—"I—how can I forget! Twice you saved me from a fearful death, and then you toiled to save my life till your own sank under it."

"I would gladly give up a thousand lives"—said Brandon, in a low voice, while his eyes were illumined with a passion which had never before been permitted to get beyond control, but now rose visibly, and irresistibly.

"If you have a life to give," said Beatrice, calmly, returning his fevered gaze with a full look of tender sympathy—"if you have a life to give, let it be given to that purpose of yours to which you are devoted."

"You refuse it, then!" cried Brandon, vehemently and reproachfully.

Beatrice returned his reproachful gaze with one equally reproachful, and raising her calm eyes to Heaven, said, in a tremulous voice,

"You have no right to say so—least of all to me. I said what you feel and know; and it is this, that others require your life, in comparison with whom I am nothing. Ah, my friend," she continued, in tones of unutterable sadness, "let us be friends here at least, on the sea, for when we reach England we must be separated for evermore!"

"For evermore!" cried Brandon, in agony.

"For evermore!" repeated Beatrice, in equal anguish.

"Do you feel very eager to get to England?" asked Brandon, after a long silence.

"No."

"Why not?"

"Because I know that there is sorrow for me there."

"If our boat had been destroyed on the shore of that island," he asked, in almost an imploring voice, "would you have grieved?"

"No."

"The present is better than the future. Oh that my dream had continued forever, and that I had never awaked to the bitterness of life!"

"That," said Beatrice, with a mournful smile, "is a reproach to me for watching you."

"Yet that moment of awaking was sweet beyond all thought," continued Brandon, in a musing tone, "for I had lost all memory of all things except you."

They stood in silence, sometimes looking at one another, sometimes at the sea, while the dark shadows of the Future swept gloomily before their eyes.

The voyage passed on until at last the English shores were seen, and they sailed up the Channel amidst the thronging ships that pass to and fro from the metropolis of the world.

"To-morrow we part," said Beatrice, as she stood with Brandon on the quarter-deck.

"No," said Brandon; "there will be no one to meet you here. I must take you to your home."

"To my home! You?" cried Beatrice, starting back. "You dare not."

"I dare."

"Do you know what it is?"

"I do not seek to know. I do not ask; but yet I think I know."

"And yet you offer to go?"

"I must go. I must see you to the very last."

"Be it so," said Beatrice, in a solemn voice,

"since it is the very last."

Suddenly she looked at him with the solemn gaze of one whose soul was filled with thoughts that overpowered every common feeling. It was a glance lofty and serene and unimpassioned, like that of some spirit which has passed beyond human cares, but sad as that of some prophet of woe.

"Louis Brandon!"

At this mention of his name a flash of unspeakable surprise passed over Brandon's face. She held out her hand. "Take my hand," said she, calmly, "and hold it so that I may have strength to speak."

"Louis Brandon!" said she, "there was a time on that African island when you lay under the trees and I was sure that you were dead. There was no beating to your heart, and no perceptible breath. The last test failed, the last hope left me, and I knelt by your head, and took you in my arms, and wept in my despair. At your feet Cato knelt and mourned in his Hindu fashion. Then mechanically and hopelessly he made a last trial to see if you were really dead, so that he might prepare your grave. He put his hand under your clothes against your heart. He held it there for a long time. Your heart gave no answer. He withdrew it, and in doing so took something away that was suspended about your neck. This was a metallic case and a package wrapped in oiled silk. He gave them to me."

Beatrice had spoken with a sad, measured tone—such a tone as one sometimes uses in prayer—a passionless monotone, without agitation, and without shame.

Brandon answered not a word.

"Take my hand," she said, "or I can not go through. This only can give me strength."

He clasped it tightly in both of his. She drew a long breath, and continued:

"I thought you dead, and knew the full measure of despair. Now, when these were given me. I wished to know the secret of the man who had twice rescued me from death, and finally laid down his life for my sake. I did it not through curiosity. I did it," and her voice rose slightly, with solemn emphasis—"I did it through a holy feeling that, since my life was due to you, therefore, as yours was gone, mine should replace it, and be devoted to the purpose which you had undertaken."

"I opened first the metallic case. It was under the dim shade of the African forest, and while holding on my knees the head of the man who had laid down his life for me. You know what I read there. I read of a father's love and agony. I read there the name of the one who had driven him to death. The shadows of the forest grew darker around me; as the full meaning of that revelation came over my soul they deepened into blackness, and I fell senseless by your side."

"Better had Cato left us both lying there to die, and gone off in the boat himself. But he revived me. I laid you down gently, and propped up your head, but never again dared to defile you with the touch of one so infamous as I."

"There still remained the other package, which I read—how you reached that island, and how you got that MS., I neither know nor seek to discover; I only know that all my spirit awoke within me as I read those words. A strange, inexplicable feeling arose. I forgot all about you and your griefs. My whole soul was fixed on the figure of that bereaved and solitary man, who thus drifted to his fate. He seemed to speak to me. A fancy, born out of frenzy, no doubt, for all that horror well-nigh drove me mad—a fancy came to me that this voice, which had come from a distance of eighteen years, had spoken to me; a wild fancy, because I was eighteen years old, that therefore I was connected with these eighteen years, filled my whole soul. I thought that this MS. was mine, and the other one yours. I read it over and over, and over yet again, till every word forced itself into my memory—till you and your sorrows sank into oblivion beside the woes of this man."

"I sat near you all that night. The palms sighed in the air. I dared not touch you. My brain whirled. I thought I heard voices out at sea, and figures appeared in the gloom. I thought I saw before me the form of Colonel Despard. He looked at me with sadness unutterable, yet with soft pity and affection, and extended his hand as though to bless me. Madder fancies than ever then rushed through my brain. But when morning came, and the excitement had passed, I knew that I had been delirious."

"When that morning came I went over to look at you. To my amazement, you were breathing. Your life was renewed of itself. I knelt down and praised God for this, but did not dare to touch you. I folded up the treasures, and told Cato to put them again around your neck. Then I watched you till you recovered."

"But on that night, and after reading those MSS., I seemed to have passed into another stage of being. I can say things to you now which I would not have dared to say before, and strength is given me to tell you all this before we part for evermore."

"I have awakened to infamy; for what is infamy if it be not this, to bear the name I bear? Something more than pride or vanity has been the foundation of that feeling of shame and hate with which I have always regarded it. And I have now died to my former life, and awakened to a new one."

"Louis Brandon, the agonies which may be suffered by those whom you seek to avenge I can conjecture, but I wish never to hear. I pray God that I may never know what it might break my heart to learn. You must save them, you must also avenge them. You are strong, and you are implacable. When you strike your blow will be crushing."

"But I must go and bear my lot among those you strike; I will wait on among them, sharing their infamy and their fate. When your blow falls I will not turn away. I will think of those dear ones of yours who have suffered, and for their sakes will accept the blow of revenge."

Brandon had held her hand in silence, and with a convulsive pressure during these words. As she stopped she made a faint effort to withdraw it. He would not let her. He raised it to his lips and pressed it there.

Three times he made an effort to speak, and each time failed. At last, with a strong exertion, he uttered, in a hoarse voice and broken tones,

"Oh, Beatrice! Beatrice! how I love you!"

"I know it," said she, in the same monotone which she had used before—a tone of infinite mournfulness—"I have known it long, and I would say also, 'Louis Brandon, I love you,' if it were not that this would be the last infamy; that you, Brandon, of Brandon Hall, should be loved by one who bears my name."

The hours of the night passed away. They stood watching the English shores, speaking little. Brandon clung to her hand. They were sailing up the Thames. It was about four in the morning.

"We shall soon be there," said he; "sing to me for the last time. Sing, and forget for a moment that we must part."

Then, in a low voice, of soft but penetrating tones, which thrilled through every fibre of Brandon's being, Beatrice began to sing:

"Love made us one; our unity
Is indissoluble by act of thine;
For were this mortal being ended,
And our freed spirits in the world above,
Love, passing o'er the grave, would join us there,
As once he joined us here:
And the sad memory of the life below
Would but unite us closer evermore.
No act of thine may loose
Thee from the eternal bond,
Nor shall Revenge have power
To disunite us there!"

On that same day they landed in London. The Governor's lady at Sierra Leone had insisted on replenishing Beatrice's wardrobe, so that she showed no appearance of having gone through the troubles which had afflicted her on sea and shore.

Brandon took her to a hotel and then went to his agent's. He also examined the papers for the last four months. He read in the morning journals a notice which had already appeared of the arrival of the ship off the Nore, and the statement that three of the passengers of the Falcon had reached Sierra Leone. He communicated to the owners of the Falcon the particulars of the loss of the ship, and earned their thanks, for they were able to get their insurance without waiting a year, as is necessary where nothing is heard of a missing vessel.

He traveled with Beatrice by rail and coach as far as the village of Brandon. At the inn he engaged a carriage to take her up to her father's house. It was Brandon Hall, as he very well knew.

But little was said during all this time. Words were useless. Silence formed the best communion for them. He took her hand at parting. She spoke not a word; his lips moved, but no audible sound escaped. Yet in their eyes as they fastened themselves on one another in an intense gaze there was read all that unutterable passion of love, of longing, and of sorrow that each felt.

The carriage drove off. Brandon watched it. "Now farewell, Love, forever," he murmured, "and welcome Vengeance!"

A LOVERS' QUARREL.

NETTIE BROWN was a bewildering little creature. A thousand little fascinations surrounded her like an atmosphere; little glimmering sparks of sunshine flickered in and out of her clustering curls; little Cupids laughed in the depths of her dark eyes, and myriads of little dimples danced round the corners of her mouth and played bo-peep in her rosy cheeks. In short, she was bewitching, because she could not help it, even if she had tried, which, I am happy to say, she never did. Nobody had any very profound respect for her; nobody was suddenly impressed by the beauty of her person, or the brilliancy of her intellect; nobody spoke of her as one of "the queens of society," or named her deferentially, or quoted her opinions, or sought for her advice. If you chanced to ask who she was, somebody would say, "Oh, that's little Nettie Brown," in a sort of apologetic tone; but you noticed a tenderer expression in their eyes and a brighter smile on their lips as they looked after her.

Among Nettie's most hopelessly enslaved adorers was John Marshall—a tall, grave fellow, considerably older than his enchantress—a "simple, frank man, without any pretensions to an oppressive greatness—of a golden temper, and steadfast as an anchor." Nettie was not the least bit of a flirt; in fact the young men of her set pronounced that you might as well try to flirt with a baby; but, fortunately for John Marshall, he did not want to flirt, and, what is more, did not know how. Having fallen in love in a very earnest but blundering sort of way with our Nettie, he stammered out a proposal, and was accepted, having taken the little maiden's heart by storm through the sheer force of his own devotion.

His position once defined, Nettie held back no reserves of affectionate artillery for great occasions; tried no pretty feminine tricks of coquettish coldness one day, and extra sweetness the next; never attempted to bring on minute quarrels for the pleasure of making them up again, but was so affectionate and caressing in all her little ways that John never missed the relish which the above little stratagems are supposed to impart to the somewhat insipid dish of domestic felicity.

One day, as ill-luck would have it, entered Sophy Northam, the far-away cousin and particular friend of Nettie. A most incongruous alliance it seemed, made entirely by the brisk determination of Miss Sophy herself, who denominated Nettie her "particular friend," and practically ordered a firm and devoted attachment to spring up between them.

Will being Destiny, and Sophy being another name for will, Nettie became her slave, and was petted, scolded, and laughed at by turns, as her companion's varying impulses suggested.

Sophy was piquancy itself; a brilliant brunette, with the brightest eyes, and neatest figure, and prettiest little foot ever seen. Well, one morning, not long after Nettie's engagement, down comes this brilliant embodiment of feminine wiles on her poor, unsuspecting friend and slave. By-the-by, Sophy, too, was just engaged, and all her unfortunate victim could predicate with certainty of her character was, that she was sure not to be in the same mood to-morrow in which she appeared to-day. The unvarying commonplace affection of John and Nettie exasperated this volatile young lady, and she resolved to show that "poor little goose" how a love affair ought to be managed.

"Now you don't mean to say, Nettie, that you are actually going on in this stupid, humdrum way, up to the very altar! Why, you might as well be married now! I really don't think it would make any difference to you!"

"Neither do I," answered Nettie, simply; "an engagement seems to me about as serious."

"Oh! of course," interrupted Sophy, with an impatient wave of her hand, "that's all very nice in theory, you know, but in practice it's so dreadfully stupid. Do let us have something a little more spicy to begin with. Do you suppose a young man likes to sit down (even if he's as sober and steady as your John, which, thank Heaven! Morton isn't)—do you suppose, I say, that a youth enjoys sitting down with his hands folded as soon as he's engaged, and feeling that all the delightful excitement is over; that the bird is caught, and has no notion of flying away again, even if he should open the cage-door?"

This shaft struck home, as the young lady meant it should, for there is nothing so certain to affront the gentlest of women as an insinuation that any one wishes to dispense with her affection.

"I am sure, Sophy," replied Nettie, with some spirit, "that John never complains of a want of excitement. And I think it would break his heart if I treated him as you treat Mr. De Witt."

"Break his fiddle-stick!" exclaimed Sophy, irreverently. "Bless your dear little soul, there isn't one man in five hundred that has any heart, and even that is made of India rubber. 'Men have died, and worms have eaten them, but not for love.' Let me assure you there is nothing of which men tire so soon as a calm monotony of affection. I dare say John thinks it all very nice now, but very soon he will begin to have a lurking suspicion that somehow or other you are not quite so interesting as before you were engaged, and then he will begin to be a little bored, and you will find it out, and look miserable, and that will bore him still more, and so things will keep on getting worse and worse all the time."

"Oh dear!" sighed Nettie, rather overpowered by this doleful picture. "But what can I do?"

"Do? why do as I do, to be sure," answered the energetic Sophy, and immediately detailed a long list of little contrivances to increase the "felicity" of Mr. Morton De Witt, whereby that unhappy gentleman was kept in hot water for the greater part of his existence, and only vouchsafed such occasional glimpses of the Paradise of Miss Sophy's love as were judged requisite to prolong his struggles. How she teased and coaxed and badgered him; how she went up and down and in and out of the whole gamut of feminine moods in the course of twenty-four hours! How she was so bewilderingly sweet to him at one moment that he was on the very pinnacle of bliss, and the very next time she saw him was so chillingly polite that he was driven to the verge of desperation. All of which manoeuvres Miss Sophy averred greatly increased the dramatic interest of the situation. Nettie listened with a wondering admiration not unmixed with fear.

"But, Sophy," she ventured faintly, at last, "I could not carry out this sort of thing at all. What would be the use of making believe I don't love John when he knows perfectly well that I do?" for which ridiculous plea I am happy to say she did have the grace to blush.

At this preposterous assertion Sophy came down upon the enemy with all her forces. She plied her well with grape-shot, round-shot, and canister; she attacked front and rear at once, in a most surprising manner; she formed herself into a hollow square, so to speak, and performed other miracles of evolution; in short, she utterly routed the confused and bewildered forces of her opponent, and established herself triumphantly as mistress, or rather master, of the situation.

That evening John Marshall appeared as usual. Instead of the impetuous, demonstrative, bright, and restless Nettie of heretofore, he encountered a pretty, exceedingly polite young lady, who called him her "dear John," and said she was "so glad to see him," and sank back into the depths of her rocking-chair and rocked—a very dangerous symptom to one who knows the ins and outs of feminine nature.

John did not, like most other men, but he instinctively felt that something was wrong. There sat Nettie, as pretty and fresh as ever; but somehow the sparkles had died out of her bright brown eyes, the dimples no longer played bo-peep in her cheeks, and, although she answered all his questions and remarks with the most scrupulous politeness, still her presence, instead of being refreshing and inspiring as usual, was as oppressive as a wet blanket on a July day.

"Nettie, what is the matter?" burst out John at length, worried past endurance by this extraordinary effect.

"Matter, John?" said Nettie, with innocent surprise; "why nothing. What do you mean?"

"Why don't you laugh and talk as you generally do, and why don't you come and sit by me on the sofa, instead of perching yourself up in that horrid rocking-chair?" growled John, slightly irate, it must be confessed.

Nettie rose with the most serene, unruffled aspect, seated herself beside John, arranged her flowing drapery with the utmost precision, and looking up in his face with the sweetest of smiles, said, in the tone of one addressing a hopelessly spoiled child, "There, dear; now are you satisfied?"

John flung himself to the other end of the sofa with an impatient jerk.

"Pshaw! Nettie, that isn't what I mean!"

"It's what you said you meant, at all events," replied Nettie, with the same innocent astonishment in her wide-open eyes; "and I think you are very cross and disagreeable to-night, dear, and I really don't know what to make of it."

Here Nettie departed from the passive attitude so far as to indulge in a very pretty pout, which encouraging weakness so disarmed John that he only said, "Nettie!" in a very pleading and reproachful tone. Whereupon Nettie relinquished the dangerous pout, and with the most cruelly patronizing smile, observed that she was sure dear John must be far from well; he was not generally cross unless he had a headache, and she thought he had better take a good walk in the fresh air, and then go home and go to bed.

John stared at her for a moment in undisguised astonishment, and then quietly rose up and walked out of the house. Nettie called, "Good-by, dear!" in the sweetest manner, after his retreating form, but the silent figure, fast disappearing in the darkness, deigned no reply.

Nettie went to bed forthwith, and meditated on the performances of the evening. First she felt triumphant that she had played her part so well; a triumph partly compounded of the ordinary feminine pleasure in acting, and partly of the pleasing consciousness that Sophy could reproach her no longer. Then she began to recall John's "crossness," and to feel rather aggrieved thereat; then she thought of the fond, lingering "Good-night" she had lost, and a few little tears stole up to her eyes; then she reflected that after all it was her own fault, and she had been very cruel; and just as another shower was about to descend on John's account it was suddenly checked by a sweet but guilty thrill of satisfaction to think that she had this power over him, and could make him miserable if she chose. Then it occurred to her that, after all, John did behave in a very cross, disagreeable manner, and that he ought to be punished for it, even if the process did make her somewhat uncomfortable; after which righteous and highly moral conclusion she went to sleep, with a sigh for her own discomfort and a smile for her power over John vainly striving for the mastery of her lips.

The next morning the tempter appeared again in the likeness of Miss Northam, arrayed as to her person in the coolest and freshest of morning-dresses, and as to her spirit in the calm consciousness of her last victory over De Witt, whom she had reduced the night before to a state bordering on idiocy.

She listened to Nettie's triumphant relation with the quiet dignity of recognized superiority, and advised her to continue in the same course. And that Nettie might have every advantage of position, she invited her to tea, the lovers to come in during the evening, after they had been sufficiently talked over by their respective owners.

Whether Miss Sophy's interest in this little affair arose from the fact that her genius for flirtation was so great that her own province was too small for her ambition and she sighed for new worlds to conquer, or whether she had "that sort of itch for settling other people's destinies" which Charles Reade says is one of the commonest forms of sanctioned lunacy, or whether she had really worked herself up into the belief that she was a sort of female missionary and doing a vast deal of good, I can not undertake to say—I leave it to the readers of Harper's Bazar to determine.

But Sophy Northam, clever as she was, had made one little mistake. She had prescribed one of Morton De Witt's doses for the inner system of John Marshall. To be sure, as this brilliant strategist argued, all men are alike, especially when they are in love; but still, in every human machine, like every patent lock, there are sundry out-of-the-way twists and turns which make it a little different from every other machine, and make it rather more complicated and difficult to manage.

Now just such a nature as John Marshall had never happened to cross Miss Sophy's path before. He was entirely too simple for her to comprehend, and the lock had a little twist in one of its wards which set at defiance the pretty little key she had lent Nettie.

In other words, John quietly took up the same course of action that had been prescribed for his defeat, and attacked Nettie on her own ground. That evening he was more brilliant and entertaining than she had ever known him, studiously polite to her, and very attentive to every body else. Sophy was lost in admiration. With the magnanimity of a great warrior she could afford to acknowledge the prowess of a rival. As for Nettie, she felt like the fisherman in the Arabian Nights who let the genie out of the bottle, and could not get him back again. There it was, this dark, imponderable volume of smoke, rolling up before her, every moment growing worse, and no effort of hers seemed adequate to manage any thing at once so vast and so impalpable. So poor little Nettie faded and sparkled by turns; brilliant and animated whenever she thought John was looking at her, dull and dejected when she saw his attention was elsewhere. Nothing could be prettier than the little, wistful sidelong looks she cast at him, the pensive poise of her head, and the droop of her downcast eyelashes. Sophy caught her in one of these Clytie poses, whisked her into a corner, and railed at her heartily.

Much to her surprise, the worm turned. "It's all very well for you to call me silly and spiritless," said the transformed Clytie, with flashing eyes; "I think with you that a certain allowance of spirit is necessary for the preservation of every pair." (She did not intend a pun, and trampled over it with lofty disdain.) "I am glad that John has shown enough to make it unnecessary for me to exert myself. In your case it is different. Of course you have to do it for two. I honor your motives, but I deplore the necessity. And I am afraid it is time to go home. Good-night, dear!"

And darting suddenly at her friend with a stinging little needle of a kiss, Nettie turned away, skillfully extricated John from his attentive group of listeners and departed, leaving Sophy in a state of prostrate bewilderment, as the books say, more easily imagined than described. That young lady was for once quite thrown off her balance. What more trying position for a woman of spirit than not to know exactly how much she has been insulted?

Meanwhile John and Nettie paced quietly homeward. Very quietly, for she was struggling with an absurd but eminently feminine disposition to cry, and in the effort to fight down her tears, necessarily had to hold her tongue, while John was partly tired by his unusual efforts at entertaining, and partly curious to see what Nettie would do if he let her alone.

At last they reached the familiar steps; the scene of so many meetings and partings, greetings and farewells. The sight of the old stones nerved Nettie to a desperate effort. With one final and prodigious gulp she swallowed the last tear, caught hold of one of John's buttons just as he was turning to go, and opened her lips to begin a very pretty moral lecture—said moral lecture she had been elaborating to herself all the way home, and in it she intended fairly to divide the blame of their little misunderstanding between them, and to wind up with an affectionate assurance of better things to come.

But as she looked up and saw the old kind face looking down at her, with a gleam of amusement lurking behind the gravity of the eyes, she forgot all her formal explanations, and felt so ashamed that she began to wish she had let John go. Then summoning up all her courage, she looked wistfully at the very middle of John's top button, which she was fingering, and whispered doubtfully, "John; if you were to try very hard do you think you could forgive me?"

History has not recorded what John did. If my readers, that is, the sterner portion thereof, will take the trouble to calculate the effect upon themselves of a pretty, up-turned face, "all kinder smily round the lips, and teary round the lashes," said face set in a frame of moonlight solitude, and romance generally, they will probably arrive at something like the actual result. History has recorded, however, what John said. Like the speeches of all great men at all great moments, it was short, simple, and to the point. He said: "Little woman, don't try it again!"

And I don't think she did. At least by the last accounts they were still living in a state of much humdrum content and felicity.

As for Sophy, the bungling wedding of one of her friends suddenly stimulated her to an heroic exertion. She felt that it was her duty to show the world how such things ought to be done, so she graciously allowed the long-suffering Morton to marry her. In a blaze of glory, compounded of white satin, orange-flowers, tulle veils, bride-maids, presents, carriages, and wedding-cards, the moral entity called Morton De Witt passed out of independent existence. In future he vegetated as "Mrs. De Witt's husband." Somewhere within the brilliant aureole which surrounds that gorgeous and fashionable comet he revolves, unseen, his "ineffectual fires paled" by the glory that envelops him, a little twinkling star hid forever behind the sweeping brilliancy of his radiant partner.

THE REMARKABLE NEEDLES.

HOW did her grandmother knit her in? I can not tell you that. All I know about it is this: The jar was broken. The tall, green jar, with a dragon sprawling over it. Nobody knew who did it, though mamma asked every body. Hetty's brother declared that he had not touched it. Hetty's heart gave a guilty thump, but she said "No, ma'am, I know nothing about it," when she was asked. As for Hetty's grandmother, she only pursed her lips up tight, and knitted away faster than ever with her "remarkable needles."

For some reason Hetty, after she had said "No, ma'am, I know nothing about it," began to watch these needles; indeed she could not help looking at them; and I did not see it, but they say that her grandmother knitted faster and faster, till the needles sent out sparks; and then before she knew it Hetty was fast to her grandmother's thread. It must have been a very strong thread, for though she held fast to her chair with hands and feet it dragged her across the room, and it pulled her up on the needles, where she hung with the stitches, and around and around she went on the needles, till she was knitted deep into the stocking, stitches over her, stitches under her, fast in the middle of a red stripe.

Then her grandmother rolled up Hetty in the stocking, stuck the needles in the ball of yarn, and laid them away on the top shelf of the cupboard, saying to Hetty:

"Henceforth I mean that you shall speak the truth in spite of yourself. The real little Hetty broke the jar; but as you say that you did not break it, you shall be the red stripe in my stocking, which of course could not have done the mischief, till you are ready to confess the truth."

Then she shut the door, and left Hetty in the dark on the top shelf.

And what did Hetty's mother say? Bless you, she knew nothing about it.

So there Hetty lay. Old bottles were her nearest neighbors. Motes of dust settled down on them, till she and the stocking were gray alike, and she could not shake them off. A spider spun his web all around her, and she could not break it. The mice came and frisked about, but their talk was only about bread and cheese. The stitches, too, chattered with each other, but they would not speak to Hetty at all, because she was not made of wool like them. For a time Hetty hoped that somebody would miss her, but all the home-people seemed to think that she was gone on a visit. So Uncle John came, and Hetty did not see him; and there was a picnic, while Hetty was fast in a red stocking stripe. And Tip chewed her wax doll to bits, and she could not cry out; and yet it was so hard to confess about the jar that she might have been there now if a mouse had not nibbled her toes.

"Oh, grandma, my toes! Grandma," screamed Hetty, "let me out, and I will tell mamma! Oh! Ah!"

She screamed, as I suppose you would if you were fast in a stocking and a mouse was lunching on your toes; but nobody heard her except her grandmother who was sitting by the fire.

"I declare, I must have left my knitting-work here!" said her grandmother, opening the door. The mouse ran away, and grandma took down the stocking and brushed off the dust, and there was Hetty saying to her mother:

"Mamma, I have told you a lie. I did break the green jar."

If you had been knitted fast in a red stripe would you not have been very careful of your words? Hetty was careful before her grandmother; but when away that was quite another matter. So it happened that as the girls were chattering at school about their brothers, how strong and tall they were, or how mischievous and cross they were, as girls will, Hetty, not to be outdone, said:

"Well, my brother is taller and stronger than I am."

"But your brother is only six years old!" cried the girls.

"That is true," answered Hetty. "Still, as I say, he is much taller and much stronger. And oh, how cross! Your brother Jack, I am certain, Kate, is amiable beside him. Why, he never speaks a pleasant word!"

"I wonder that your mother does not teach him better manners," said Kate, in surprise.

"Oh, but that is impossible. Nobody can teach him any thing," returned Hetty, quickly.

"Why, he even strikes mamma. He is the worst boy in the world. You can not believe a word he says; and so stupid—"

She stopped short. Just here Hetty heard a click—only a little click, but it made her think of the "remarkable needles," and she began to feel very guilty and uncomfortable. She dawdled as long as she dared before going home, and slipped as quietly as possible past her grandmother's door; but she could not help hearing the needles—clickety click! clickety click! They had never made such a noise; and though she shut her door, the sound followed her—clickety click! She could hear nothing else. "What could grandmother be knitting?" thought the guilty little girl; and oh, how she wished that she had never told those silly, useless stories about her brother! and that the dinner-bell would not ring, or that she need not go down.

The dinner-hour came, however, and Hetty dared not stay away. All the family were at table, and some body was sitting in her place—a stranger, a boy, larger than herself, who turned around as she came up to what had always been her chair, and said, in a very decided tone, "Clear out!"

"What!" said Hetty.

"Clear out!" repeated the boy.

Hetty looked at her mother.

"Suppose you should move your chair," she said to the boy.

"I won't give up my place!" he screamed, loudly.

"But you need not give up your place. You need only move a little."

"Do you not see that he is too stupid to understand you?" said Hetty's grandmother, in a low voice.

"Why don't you help me, instead of staring there?" continued this amiable young gentleman.

"You must wait your turn," answered Hetty's mamma, mildly.

"But I won't wait; jumping up and planting myself before her. 'Take that now!' striking her on the cheek.

"Oh," screamed Hetty in horror, "why do you let him speak and behave like that, mamma?"

"She can not help it. He is the worst boy in the world. Nobody can teach him any thing," returned her grandmother, eying her sternly.

Hetty turned pale.

"You all abuse me. You all treat me ill!" screamed this frightful boy, tearing the tablecloth from the table, and dancing on the dishes, as they lay on the floor.

"This is too much! Really, Hetty, I am sorry for you; but you must take him away," said her mamma, sadly. "It would be impossible to live with this creature."

"I take him away!"

"Yes. He is yours, you know. The new brother that you made, or rather that I knit for you, while you were describing him, at school," replied her grandmother. "You remember that I told you that henceforth you should speak the truth in spite of yourself. As you had no such brother as you represented I have provided one for you; and you will find that he answers the description perfectly."

Hetty looked at her mother imploringly. Her mother's eyes were full of tears, but she only said, mournfully:

"I can not help you, my dear child; and I would not if I could. You must take your lie with you into the world, and perhaps when you see every day how hateful it is, you may learn to love the truth."

And then the door closed behind her, and Hetty found herself in the street, with her terrible new brother.

"Come!" he said, pushing her roughly.

"What are you standing there for, you little fool! Now you have cheated me out of my dinner and turned me out of doors you must find me a home, and take care of me."

Hetty looked up at him, and he looked so red and so ugly, and she felt so angry that she should say she had brought about their misfortunes, that she said to herself, "I won't stay with him," and dodged around the very first corner that she saw.

But the boy was too quick for her; and catching her by the arm, walked on with her, holding her fast that she should not run again.

So they wandered through the streets till they came to a large house, over whose gate was written—"Home for Desolate Children."

"This is the place for me," thought Hetty, and knocking, they were told to come in, and found a large man with spectacles.

"Who are you?" said the large man.

"We are brother and sister," answered the boy, before Hetty could open her mouth. "My sister is such a liar that her mother turned her out of doors, and I came with her rather than let her go alone."

"Bad—very bad!" said the tall man. "Are you not ashamed when you see how much harm you have done your brother as well as yourself, little girl?"

"But I have not harmed him," said Hetty; and she began to tell her story, to which the tall man listened patiently till she came to being knitted up in a red stripe.

"Monstrous!" he cried. "Ridiculous! Knitted out of your chair! Fast in a stocking!" and he stopped his ears. "Stop, I say—I won't hear another word! You are the most dreadful liar that I ever met. Take her away! Put her in a room by herself, and give her only a little bread."

Accordingly Hetty was hustled out of the room, leaving her new brother behind her with the tall man, who asked him to sit down with him at table. But I have already told you that this boy was very stupid. He was also very hungry. He seated himself in the tall man's chair, and, seizing knife and fork, began to cut out great bits of meat from the joint and swallow them.

"Stop!" cried the tall man. "That is my chair, and we must say grace beside."

"I won't stop: and what do I care for your chair and your grace?" answered the boy, stuffing potatoes, macaroni, and mutton, with both hands, into his mouth.

"I say you shall!" roared the angry man.

By way of answer our boy threw the platter at him, joint and all.

Hetty, eating her third crust of bread, heard a terrible noise below, and while she listened in surprise her door was thrown open.

"Get out," said the tall man, "and go after your brother. I believe you are wicked elves, and not children. Go quickly!"

It was now very dark, and the snow fell, but Hetty was forced to obey. Outside she found her evil brother waiting for her.

"This is the second time that you have cheated me out of my dinner," he said to her, with as much fury as if it had been true. But Hetty made no answer. She was so tired that she stumbled continually, and she was in despair. Suddenly, "There is your mother," said the boy.

"Where, oh, where?" cried Hetty, forgetting that she must not believe a word that he said. She forgot that she was tired. She ran and jumped from one snow-drift to another. Her heart beat fast. "I will tell her how sorry I am, and she will forgive me," she thought. But when she came to the turn, where she could see far ahead, there was nothing—only the broad white road and black hills against the sky.

"Ha! ha!" laughed her brother; "I thought I could make you run."

Hetty shivered, and sank down in the snow. Her strength had gone: her knees would not hold her.

"I am dying," she said to herself, "but I do not wonder that they sent me out. If this creature were twice as cruel we might live if he would tell the truth; but what can I do when he can never be believed? It is as well to die now."

Then her grandmother, who had been following her all day, stepped out from behind a tree, saying:

"No, my child, it is better to live, since you have learned the value of truth."

Then she took out the "remarkable needles," and with them picked up a stitch on the evil boy's nose; and giving that stitch a hearty jerk he began to unravel. And Hetty's grandmother unraveled him from top to toe, and wound him up in a ball of handsome yarn, and stuck it on the "remarkable needles," and put them in her pocket. And then she wrapped Hetty in her fur cloak, and took her home, where her mother was waiting for her with tears and kisses, and such a nice supper!

MRS. TYPESET'S DIARY.

Monday Eve.—"Now do let us be there in good season," I had said to Mr. Typeset as we came up from dinner to-night, "for I do not fancy pushing through a crowd to my seat, and there will be sure to be a jam at the doors; besides, Mr. Dickens has requested us to be seated ten minutes before eight!" But although I made this remark in a very general manner, including myself in the injunction, I really meant to stimulate Mr. T. to put the finishing touches to his toilette seasonably; for notwithstanding all that is said in the books about the exemplary patience of gentlemen in waiting for their wives to dress, my private opinion is that there's another side to the question. At any rate Mr. Typeset (though I wouldn't find fault with the good man for the world) is wonderfully fond of saying, when we are going out of an evening, "I am all ready, my dear; I'll wait for you in the parlor." And I come down into the parlor presently and find him complacently playing on the piano waiting for me! But when we get to the street door I discover his coat is not brushed, nor his hat—perhaps his hair is—but his gloves are in his other coat pocket, and his handkerchief—well, it is in his bureau drawer—and as to his cravat he is sure to have on a very unbecoming one. But if I hint to him, in the mildest manner, that he isn't half ready, and that he needs a good deal of looking after, he takes it all good-humoredly, and says, "That's just one reason I married you, my dear!" So I can't scold.

Our seats in Steinway Hall were excellent, and we were early enough to watch the entrance, in coming crowd, and to examine the ingenious apparatus which Mr. Dickens has arranged for his readings. As to the audience almost every body was in capital humor. One lady directly behind me seemed an exception, and she fumed and fretted because of the "tight seats" which the architects of Steinway Hall had constructed; but her size rendered this somewhat excusable. On the platform stood a small crimson-covered table, a carafe of water and a tumbler on one side of it, and a little crimson book-rest, raised several inches above the level of the table; on the other side, a crimson curtain as a back-ground, and an excellent arrangement of light. All unannounced, walking briskly, book in hand, Mr. Dickens came upon the stage. There was plenty of applause without adding my mite, so I looked with all my eyes. A middle-aged gentleman, rather spare, hair so thin as to give the appearance of being partly bald, mustache and beard sprinkled with gray, face indicating good sound sense and hearty good-humor; dress neat and unpretending, with a red-and-white rose-bud in the button-hole of his coat. He acknowledges the applause with a quiet bow, and then stands, turning his eyes here and there—quite vainly at present—to find a pause in which to commence. But he improves the first one, and while I am thinking that he is introducing his reading with a little preface, I find him already in the "Christmas Carol."

But he is not reading; he is telling the story. One hand, to be sure, rests upon his book, and he turns the pages now and then; but he is talking, and acting—suppose it must be so called for want of another word—though there is nothing that seems artificial in look, or tone, or gesture. I was certainly somewhat disappointed at first that his voice possessed so little strength and volume, and that it was needful to listen carefully to catch every word. But his enunciation is distinct, the intonations natural, and wonderfully varied with every character; something in the man himself brings his audience at once into sympathy with him, and I became absorbed in listening, and watching the facial changes, and the expressive gestures; now it was Scrooge, and then the Ghost—now Tiny Tim, and then Bob Cratchit—every character in that beautiful "Christmas Carol" vividly portrayed. He carried all his hearers unconsciously along with him, through pathetic passages and humorous descriptions; and I was almost breathless with intensity of interest when he closed his book and vanished from the stage.

In a few moments he reappeared, and read—no, told as the famous trial of Pickwick, convulsing the entire audience with laughter, which they did their best to subdue, so as not to lose a word. But there are some things that can not well be described, and Mr. Dickens's readings are among them. The evening's entertainment was over quite too soon, for we were out of the Hall before ten o'clock; but it will ever be a pleasant memory, and will give me new interest in the writings of Charles Dickens.

Wednesday Eve.—About one hundred and twenty-five years ago the Oratorio of "Samson" was first performed, in London, under the immediate supervision of its great composer, Handel. It met with great success then; but it would be interesting if we could actually compare its first performance with the one to-night at Steinway Hall. "Samson" is a grand Oratorio, and the competent artists who rendered it this evening were listened to by a delighted audience. Handel's music is characterized by grandeur and sublimity, and although he spent only five weeks in composing "Samson," it is one of the most remarkable of his productions.

Thursday.—The papers tell a curious story of a young lady living in Massachusetts, who a few weeks since experienced a disagreeable sensation near the right shoulder. A long black mark was visible, and shortly after a hard substance could be distinctly felt. Her physician was called, and succeeded in removing part of a hair-pin. The supposition is that the young lady must have swallowed it when a child, and that it has been working around her system ever since, until it finally came near the surface.

Friday.—Such a snow-storm as we have had! A real old-fashioned "Down East" snow-storm, blocking up the streets and impeding locomotion every where. This has been a blowing, drifting storm; but a calm, quiet fall of snow—when the huge flakes silently chase each other downward, covering, in solemn stillness, the whole landscape with a dense white robe, soft and pure—is a grand and beautiful scene. Yet to really seem beautiful I think it must be witnessed in the country. Snow, in a great city like New York, seems out of place. Nobody is prepared for it, nobody wants to see it, except the small boys who delight in snow-balling, and a few pleasure-seekers who hope for a sleigh-ride. It is such an inconvenience to every body—there is no place to put it. It must not be in the yards, nor on the house-tops, nor on the sidewalks, nor yet can it be in large quantities in the streets. The cars and omnibuses are stopped by it; the house-keeper can not get to market; the merchant finds it hard work to reach his store; in short every thing is, as it were, upset by a snow-storm. And then the pure beauty of the snow vanishes in a day or two—a dingy mixture, totally unlike the original article, takes its place—then comes the "slush," and the streets are almost impassable. But the New England farmer expects snow, he prepares for it, and is glad when it comes to wrap up the earth securely against the winter winds. His sleigh and merry tinkling bells are ready, his sled and snow-shoes, his warm wraps for hand and feet; and food and fodder are in house and barn. The snow has not come to him for a few days, but for months—it is the harbinger of many pleasures: the good wife looks from the window into the thickening air, and softly murmurs "It snows!" while gleeful boys and girls dance and caper through the fast falling flakes, and shout "It snows! It snows!" And at "Merry Christmas" the sleighing, the coasting, and the skating may be depended upon to give joy and jollity. We in the city, too, plan to have a very merry Christmas, even if we have to wade through seas of mud to purchase Christmas gifts—as present appearances indicate we may possibly be obliged to do. The shops are putting on their holiday attire, and neither "wind nor weather" will deter us from seeing every thing and buying all we can.

Saturday Eve.—From every section of the country come pleasant and encouraging words in regard to the Bazar. I have seen and received many letters in which it is spoken of in the highest terms. A letter from Washington, received to-day, is pleasant. The writer says:

"We like its moral tone, its usefulness, and its abnegation of folly's fripperies, so attendant upon 'fashionable' publications. It seems to aspire to be something higher than a dry-goods 'dummy' in literature, exhibiting merely the 'style'—so often not the style, however. As a public instructor, it will soon be accepted as the criterion of good taste and fashion; and as a publication, it will bring renewed homage to the shrine at which youth and beauty, age and homeliness alike worship."

BONNETS AND LINGERIE.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

Walking Dresses.

Fig. 1.—Fanchon of blue velvet, with velvet strings, edged with narrow lace. Trimming of lace, with velvet pansies. Paletot and dress of blue cloth, trimmed with narrow velvet. The paletot is cut straight, with tabs in front. The over-skirt, which is almost flat, is confined at the waist by a sash, the ends of which fall nearly to the trimming of the skirt. The under-skirt, which is longer and fuller, is trimmed horizontally with narrow velvet. This may be either of cloth or silk.

Fig. 2.—Bonnet of gray velvet, something of the Mary Stuart shape in front. Trimming of gray velvet ivy leaves, and pendants falling over a velvet band. Full suit of gray cloth, edged and trimmed with gray velvet galloon, with broad black band and narrow black edge. The over-skirt forms the pelisse, and crosses at the left under the belt. Full sleeves, large pocket in the right side of the skirt. Under-skirt scant and short, fulling to the top of the boot.

Bonnets and Lingerie.

Fig. 1.—Trianon of white uncut velvet with frill behind. The front is trimmed with lace as well as the frill, and is ornamented with two small bows of blue ribbon. A rouleau of blue ribbon forms the heading of the lace in front, and is fastened by a bow on the temples, whence it extends, forming strings, which are edged with lace. This is an exceedingly graceful bonnet.

Fig. 2.—Trianon of pink velvet, trimmed on the front with three bias folds of pink satin, one of which overlies the edge, and is fringed with beads. A small pink feather is placed on the top of the front, and another long one forms the heading behind of a deep frill of lace, which is prolonged, forming strings that tie over strings of pink satin.

Fig. 3.—Fanchon of lilac velvet edged with a notched bias fold of satin, turned up on the front. Long, wide strings, simply tied under the chin. A cluster of lilac gladiolas is arranged on the front in the Mary Stuart fashion.

Fig. 4.—Marie Antoinette mantelet of pink taffetas, trimmed on the shoulders with a narrow guipure edge, and round the bottom and sash ends with broad, rich white guipure.

EASY-CHAIR.

PORTIÈRE.—BACK.

Fig. 5.—Bonnet of Havana velvet, pleated lengthwise, with a prolongation of the same, forming strings and bow without ends. The front is trimmed with a wreath of bronzed foliage, with grelots. A frill of black guipure finishes the back, and ends in strings which are fastened under the bow.

Fig. 6.—Diadem fanchon of black velvet, finished with an elegant frill of black lace, striped with black velvet, and forming rich strings, which are crossed in front, and fastened with a pink rosette. The inside trimming is composed of small white feathers, forming a diadem, and ending on the temple with a pink rose.

Fig. 7.—Bretelle belt of blue taffetas, composed of three lappets in front and three behind, bretelles, and belt, all edged with black guipure. This beautiful belt is of an entirely new shape, and is easily made. It is worn over a muslin or lace waist for opera or dinner toilette, and also sets off a Cashmere or silk waist of a harmonizing color.

Dressing-Table.

The arrangement of this dressing-table is both simple and elegant. The frame is of wood, with a mirror in the centre, and two shelves on either side, as seen in the illustration. The covering is of chintz, trimmed with ruches, rosettes, and a flounce of the same material.

Portière.

This portière is provided with a new and convenient kind of bracket, with wheels, for drawing and opening the hangings, which are shown in the accompanying illustrations. These brackets are placed above the door, where they support an iron rod to which the hangings are fastened by means of small brass rings. The first illustration, which shows the wrong side of the curtain, clearly shows the arrangement of the whole. The hangings are pleated at the top, in the manner shown in the second illustration; a strip of cloth is laid across the wrong side, and tacked at proper distances to the pleats, so as to keep them in place; and each pleat is confined by a button. The cord for drawing and opening the hangings is passed round the wheel of the brackets, then the cord a is placed at the x, and the cord b is fastened to the b on the curtain. The ends of the cord are furnished with weights. To open the hangings draw the cord b, as seen in the illustration; to draw them, use the corresponding cord a.

Easy-Chair.

This easy-chair is covered with brown damask, tacked with strong cord and furnished with brown silk buttons. The middle is trimmed with a strip of corn-colored silk, elaborately embroidered. Deep fringe and heavy silk cord form the trimming around the bottom: the fringe on the embroidered strip being corn-color, and that on the cover brown like the latter.

Chair with Movable Back.

This chair, which will be prized by those who love their ease, can readily be made by an ingenious person by means of a simple iron pivot and socket, which permit the back to swing to and fro, like an ordinary toilette-glass. A cord, fastened to the columns on the back of the chair, limits the inclination of the back, which is also fluted round the edge with cord. The frame of this comfortable chair can be easily made by any cabinet-maker, and the upholstery fluted at home. In the design the frame is of oak, and the upholstery of brown silk jamask.

CHAIR WITH MOVABLE BACK.

Now, the Obenreizers being skilled musicians, it was easily brought to pass that they should be asked to join these musical unions. Guardian and Ward consenting, or Guardian consenting for both, it was necessarily brought to pass that Vendale's life became a life of absolute thralldom and enchantment. For, in the mouldy Christopher-Wren church on Sundays, with its dearly beloved brethren assembled and met together, five-and-twenty strong, was not that Her voice that shot like light into the darkest places, thrilling the walls and pillars as though they were pieces of his heart! What time, too, Madame Dor in a corner of the high pew, turning her back upon every body and every thing, could not fail to be Ritually right at some moment of the service; like the man whom the doctors recommended to get drunk once a month, and who, that he might not overlook it, got drunk every day.

But, even those seraphic Sundays were surpassed by the Wednesday concerts established for the putriarchal family. At those concerts, she would sit down to the piano, and sing them, in her own tongue, songs of her own land, songs calling from the mountain-tops to Vendale, "Rise above the groveling level country; come far away from the crowd; pursue me as I mount higher, higher, higher, melting into the azure distance; rise to my supremest height of all, and love me here!" Then would the pretty bodice, the clocked stocking, and the silver-buckled shoe be, like the broad forehead and the bright eyes, fraught with the spring of a very chamois, until the strain was over.

Not even over Vendale himself did these songs of hers cast a more potent spell than over Joey Ladle in his different way. Steadily refusing to muddle the harmony by taking any share in it, and evincing the supremest contempt for scales and such like rudiments of music—which, indeed, seldom captivate mere listeners—Joey did at first give up the whole business as a bad job, and the whole of the performers for a set of howling Derivishes. But, deservingly traces of unmuddled harmony in a part-song one day, he gave his two under-cellarmen faint hopes of getting on toward something in course of time. An anthem of Handel's led to further encouragement from him; though he objected that that great musician must have been down in some of them foreign cellars pretty much, for to go and say the same thing so many times over; which, look it in how you might, he considered a certain sign of your having took it in somehow. On a third occasion, the public appearance of Mr. Jarvis with a flute, and of an odd man with a violin, and the performance of a duet by the two, did so astonish him that, solely of his own impulse and motion, he became inspired with the words, "Ann Koar!" repeatedly pronouncing them as if calling in a familiar manner for some lady who had distinguished herself in the orchestra. But this was his final testimony to the merits of his mates, for, the instrumental duet being performed at the first Wednesday concert, and being presently followed by the voice of Marguerite Obenreizer, he sat with his mouth wide open, entranced, until she had finished; when, rising in his place with much solemnity, and prefacing what he was about to say with a bow that specially included Mr. Wilding in it, he delivered himself of the gratifying sentiment: "After that, ye may all on ye get to bed!" And ever afterward declined to render homage in any other words to the musical powers of the family.

Thus began a separate personal acquaintance between Marguerite Obenreizer and Joey Ladle. She laughed so heartily at his compliment, and yet was so abashed by it, that Joey made bold to say to her, after the concert was over, he hoped he wasn't so muddled in his head as to have took a liberty? She made him a gracious reply, and Joey ducked in return.

"You'll change the luck time about, Miss," said Joey, ducking again. "It's such as you in the place that can bring round the luck of the place."

"Can I? Round the luck?" she answered, in her pretty English, and with a pretty wonder. "I fear I do not understand. I am so stupid."

"Young Master Wilding, Miss," Joey explained, confidentially, though not much to her enlightenment, "changed the luck, afore he took in young Master George. So I say, and so they'll find. Lord! Only come into the place and sing over the luck a few times, Miss, and it won't be able to help itself!"

With this, and with a whole brood of ducks, Joey backed out of the presence. But Joey being a privileged person, and even an involuntary conquest being pleasant to youth and beauty, Marguerite merrily looked out for him next time. "Where is my Mr. Joey, please?" she asked of Vendale.

So Joey was produced and shaken hands with, and that became an Institution.

Another Institution arose in this wise. Joey was a little hard of hearing. He himself said it was "Wapors," and perhaps it might have been; but whatever the cause of the effect, there the effect was, upon him. On this first occasion he had been seen to sidle along the wall, with his left hand to his left ear, until he had sidled himself into a seat pretty near the singer, in which place and position he had remained, until addressing to his friends the amateurs the compliment before mentioned. It was observed on the following Wednesday that Joey's action as a Pecking Machine was impaired at dinner, and it was rumored about the table that this was explainable by his high-strung expectations of Miss Obenreizer's singing, and his fears of not getting a place where he could hear every note and syllable.

The rumor reaching Wilding's ears, he, in his good-nature, called Joey to the front at night before Marguerite began. Thus the Institution came into being that on succeeding nights, Marguerite, running her hands over the keys before singing, always said to Vendale, "Where is my Mr. Joey, please?" and that Vendale always brought him forth, and stationed him near by. That he should then, when all eyes were upon him, express in his face the utmost contempt for the exertions of his friends and confidence in Marguerite alone, whom he would stand contemplating, not unlike the rhinoceros out of the spelling-book, tamed and on his hind legs, was a part of the Institution. Also that when he remained after the singing in his most ecstatic state, some bold spirit from the back should say, "What do you think of it, Joey?" and he should be goaded to reply, as having that instant conceived the retort, "After that, ye may all on ye get to bed!" These were other parts of the Institution.

But, the simple pleasures and small jests of Cripple Corner were not destined to have a long life. Underlying them from the first was a serious matter, which every member of the patriarchal family knew of, but which, by tacit agreement, all forebore to speak of. Mr. Wilding's health was in a bad way.

He might overcome the shock he had sustained in the one great affection of his life, or he might have overcome his consciousness of being in the enjoyment of another man's property; but the two together were too much for him. A man haunted by twin ghosts, he became deeply depressed. The inseparable spectres sat at the board with him, ate from his platter, drank from his cup, and stood by his bedside at night. When he recalled his supposed mother's love, he felt as though he had stolen it. When he rallied a little under the respect and attachment of his dependents, he felt as though he were even fraudulent in making them happy, for that should have been the unknown man's duty and gratification.

Gradually, under the pressure of his brooding mind, his body stooped, his step lost its elasticity, his eyes were seldom lifted from the ground. He knew he could not help the deplorable mistake that had been made, but he knew he could not mend it; for the days and weeks went by, and no one claimed his name or his possessions. And now there began to creep over him a cloudy consciousness of often-recurring confusion in his head. He would unaccountably lose, sometimes whole hours, sometimes a whole day and night. Once, his remembrance stopped as he sat at the head of the dinner-table, and was blank until daybreak. Another time, it stopped as he was beating time to their singing, and went on again when he and his partner were walking in the court-yard by the light of the moon, half the night later. He asked Vendale (always full of consideration, work, and help) how this was. Vendale only replied, "You have not been quite well; that's all." He looked for explanation into the faces of his people. But they would put it off with, "Glad to see you looking so much better, sir;" or, "Hope you're doing nicely now, sir;" in which was no information at all.

At length, when the partnership was but five months old, Walter Wilding took to his bed, and his housekeeper became his nurse.

"Lying here, perhaps you will not mind my calling you Sally, Mrs. Goldstraw?" said the poor wine merchant.

"It sounds more natural to me, sir, than any other name, and I like it better."

"Thank you, Sally. I think, Sally, I must of late have been subject to fits. Is that so, Sally? Don't mind telling me now."

"It has happened, sir."

"Ah! That is the explanation!" he quietly remarked. "Mr. Obenreizer, Sally, talks of the world being so small that it is not strange how often the same people come together, and come together, at various places, and in various stages of life. But it does seem strange, Sally, that I should, as I may say, come round to the Foundling to die."

He extended his hand to her, and she gently took it.

"You are not going to die, dear Mr. Wilding."

"So Mr. Bintrey said, but I think he was wrong. The old child-feeling is coming back upon me, Sally. The old hush and rest, as I used to fall asleep."

After an interval he said, in a placid voice, "Please kiss me, Nurse," and, it was evident, believed himself to be lying in the old Dormitory.

As she had been used to bend over the fatherless and motherless children, Sally bent over the fatherless and motherless man, and put her lips to his forehead, murmuring—

"God bless you!"

"God bless you!" he replied, in the same tone.

After another interval, he opened his eyes in his own character, and said: "Don't move me, Sally, because of what I am going to say; I lie quite easily. I think my time is come. I don't know how it may appear to you, Sally, but—"

Insensibility fell upon him for a few minutes; he merged from it once more.

"—I don't know how it may appear to you, Sally, but so it appears to me."

When he had thus conscientiously finished his favorite sentence, his time came, and he died.

ACT II.

VENDALE MAKES LOVE.

THE summer and the autumn had passed. Christmas and the New Year were at hand.

As executors honestly bent on performing their duty toward the dead, Vendale and Bintrey had held more than one anxious consultation on the subject of Wilding's will. The lawyer had declared, from the first, that it was simply impossible to take any useful action in the matter at all. The only obvious inquiries to make, in relation to the lost man, had been made already by Wilding himself; with this result, that time and death together had not left a trace of him discoverable. To advertise for the claimant to the property, it would be necessary to mention particulars—a course of proceeding which would invite half the impostors in England to present themselves in the character of the true Walter Wilding. "If we find a chance of tracing the lost man, we will take it. If we don't, let us meet for another consultation on the first anniversary of Wilding's death." So Bintrey advised. And so, with the most earnest desire to fulfill his dead friend's wishes, Vendale was fain to let the matter rest for the present.

Turning from his interest in the past to his interest in the future, Vendale still found himself confronting a doubtful prospect. Months on months had passed since his first visit to Soho Square,—and through all that time the one language in which he had told Marguerite that he loved her was the language of the eyes, assisted, at convenient opportunities, by the language of the hand.

What was the obstacle in his way? The one immovable obstacle which had been in his way from the first. No matter how fairly the opportunities looked, Vendale's efforts to speak with Marguerite alone, ended invariably in one and the same result. Under the most accidental circumstances, in the most innocent manner possible, Obenreizer was always in the way.

With the last days of the old year came an unexpected chance of spending an evening with Marguerite, which Vendale resolved should be a chance of speaking privately to her as well. A cordial note from Obenreizer invited him, on New Year's Day, to a little family dinner in Soho Square. "We shall be only four," the note said. "We shall be only two," Vendale determined, "before the evening is out!"

New Year's Day, among the English, is associated with the giving and receiving of dinners, and with nothing more. New Year's Day, among the foreigners, is the grand opportunity of the year for the giving and receiving of presents. It is occasionally possible to acclimatize a foreign custom. In this instance Vendale felt no hesitation about making the attempt. His one difficulty was to decide what his New Year's gift to Marguerite should be. The defensive pride of the peasant's daughter—morbidly sensitive to the inequality between her social position and his—would be secretly roused against him if he ventured on a rich offering. A gift, which a poor man's purse might purchase, was the one gift that could be trusted to find its way to her heart, for the giver's sake. Stoutly resisting temptation, in the form of diamonds and rubies, Vendale bought a brooch of the flagree-work of Genoa,—the simplest and most unpretending ornament that he could find in the jeweler's shop.

He slipped his gift into Marguerite's hand as she held it out to welcome him on the day of the dinner.

"This is your first New Year's Day in England," he said. "Will you let me help to make it like a New Year's Day at home?"

She thanked him, a little constrainedly, as she looked at the jeweler's box, uncertain what it might contain. Opening the box, and discovering the studiously simple form under which Vendale's little keepsake offered itself to her, she penetrated his motive on the spot. Her face turned on him brightly, with a look which said, "I own you have pleased and flattered me." Never had she been so charming, in Vendale's eyes, as she was at that moment. Her winter dress—a petticoat of dark silk, with a bodice of black velvet rising to her neck, and enclosing it softly in a little circle of swan's down—heightened, by all the force of contrast, the dazzling fairness of her hair and her complexion. It was only when she turned aside from him to the glass, and, taking out the brooch that she wore, put his New Year's gift in its place, that Vendale's attention wandered far enough away from her to discover the presence of other persons in the room.

He now became conscious that the hands of Obenreizer were affectionately in possession of his elbows. He now heard the voice of Obenreizer thanking him for his attention to Marguerite, with the faintest possible ring of mockery in its tone. ("Such a simple present, dear sir! and showing such nice tact!") He now discovered, for the first time, that there was one other guest, and but one, besides himself, whom Obenreizer presented as a compatriot and friend. The friend's face was mouldy, and the friend's figure was fat. His age was suggestive of the autumnal period of human life. In the course of the evening he developed two extraordinary capacities. One was a capacity for silence; the other was a capacity for emptying bottles.

Madame Dor was not in the room. Neither was there any visible place reserved for her when they sat down to table. Obenreizer explained that it was "the good Dor's simple habit to dine always in the middle of the day. She would make her excuses later in the evening." Vendale wondered whether the good Dor had, on this occasion, varied her domestic employment from cleaning Obenreizer's gloves to cooking Obenreizer's dinner. This at least was certain,—the dishes served were, one and all, as achievements in cookery, high above the reach of the rude elementary art of England. The dinner was unobtrusively perfect. As for the wine, the eyes of the speechless friend rolled over it, as in solemn ecstasy. Sometimes he said "Good!" when a bottle came in full; and sometimes he said "Ah!" when a bottle went out empty,—and there his contributions to the gayety of the evening ended.

Silence is occasionally infectious. Oppressed by private anxieties of their own, Marguerite and Vendale appeared to feel the influence of the speechless friend. The whole responsibility of keeping the talk going rested on Obenreizer's shoulders, and manfully did Obenreizer sustain it. He opened his heart in the character of an enlightened foreigner, and sang the praises of England. When other topics ran dry, he returned to this inexhaustible source, and always set the stream running again as copiously as ever. Obenreizer would have given an arm, an eye, or a leg to have been born an Englishman. Out of England there was no such institution as a home, no such thing as a fireside, no such object as a beautiful woman. His dear Miss Marguerite would excuse him, if he accounted for her attractions on the theory that English blood must have mixed at some former time with their obscure and unknown ancestry. Survey this English nation, and behold a tall, clean, plump, and solid people! Look at their cities! What magnificence in their public buildings! What admirable order and propriety in their streets! Admire their laws, combining the eternal principle of justice with the other eternal principle of pounds, shillings, and pence; and applying the product to all civil injuries, from an injury to a man's honor, to an injury to a man's nose! You have ruined my daughter,—pounds, shillings, and pence! You have knocked me down with a blow in my face,—pounds, shillings, and pence! Where was the material prosperity of such a country as that to stop? Obenreizer, projecting himself into the future, failed to see the end of it. Obenreizer's enthusiasm entreated permission to exhale itself, English fashion, in a toast. Here is our modest little dinner over, here is our frugal dessert on the table, and here is the admirer of England conforming to national customs, and making a speech! A toast to your white cliffs of Albion, Mr. Vendale! to your national virtues, your charming climate, and your fascinating women! to your Hearths, to your Homes, to your Habeas Corpus, and to all your other institutions! In one word,—to England! Heep-heep-heep! hooray!

Obenreizer's voice had barely chanted the last note of the English cheer, the speechless friend had barely drained the last drop out of his glass, when the festive proceedings were interrupted by a modest tap at the door. A woman-servant came in, and approached her master with a little note in her hand. Obenreizer opened the note with a frown; and, after reading it with an expression of genuine annoyance, passed it on to his compatriot and friend. Vendale's spirits rose as he watched these proceedings. Had he found an ally in the annoying little note? Was the long-looked-for chance actually coming at last?

"I am afraid there is no help for it?" said Obenreizer, addressing his fellow-countryman. "I am afraid we must go."

The speechless friend handed back the letter, shrugged his heavy shoulders, and poured himself out a last glass of wine. His fat fingers lingered fondly round the neck of the bottle. They pressed it with a little amatory squeeze at parting. His globular eyes looked dimly, as through an intervening haze, at Vendale and Marguerite. His heavy articulation labored, and brought forth a whole sentence at a birth. "I think," he said, "I should have liked a little more wine." His breath failed him after that effort; he gasped, and walked to the door.

Obenreizer addressed himself to Vendale with an appearance of the deepest distress.

"I am so-shocked, so confused, so distressed," he began. "A misfortune has happened to one of my compatriots. He is alone, he is ignorant of your language,—I and my good friend, here, have no choice but to go and help him. What can I say in my excuse? How can I describe my affliction at depriving myself in this way of the honor of your company?"

He paused, evidently expecting to see Vendale take up his hat and retire. Discerning his opportunity at last, Vendale determined to do nothing of the kind. He met Obenreizer dexterously, with Obenreizer's own weapons.

"Pray don't distress yourself," he said. "I'll wait here with the greatest of pleasure till you come back."

Marguerite blushed deeply, and turned away to her embroidery frame in a corner by the window. The film showed in Obenreizer's eyes, and the smile came something sourly to Obenreizer's lips. To have told Vendale that there was no reasonable prospect of his coming back in good time would have been to risk offending a man whose favorable opinion was of solid commercial importance to him. Accepting his defeat with the best possible grace, he declared himself to be equally honored and delighted by Vendale's proposal. "So frank, so friendly, so English!" He bustled about, apparently looking for something he wanted, disappeared for a moment through the folding-doors communicating with the next room, came back with his hat and coat, and protesting that he would return at the earliest possible moment, embraced Vendale's elbows, and vanished from the scene in company with the speechless friend.

Vendale turned to the corner by the window, in which Marguerite had placed herself with her work. There, as if she had dropped from the ceiling, or come up through the floor—there, in the old attitude, with her face to the stove—sat an Obstacle that had not been foreseen, in the person of Madame Dor! She half got up, half looked over her broad shoulder at Vendale, and plumped down again. Was she at work? Yes. Cleaning Obenreizer's gloves as before? No; darned Obenreizer's stockings.

The case was now desperate. Two serious considerations presented themselves to Vendale. Was it possible to put Madame Dor into the stove? The stove wouldn't hold her. Was it possible to treat Madame Dor, not as a living woman, but as an article of furniture? Could the mind be brought to contemplate this respectable matron purely in the light of a chest of drawers, with a black gauze head-dress accidentally left on the top of it? Yes, the mind could be brought to do that. With a comparatively trifling effort, Vendale's mind did it. As he took his place on the old fashioned window-seat, close by Marguerite and her embroidery, a slight movement appeared in the chest of drawers, but no remark issued from it. Let it be remembered that solid furniture is not easy to remove, and that it has this advantage in consequence,—there is no fear of upsetting it.

Unusually silent and unusually constrained, —with the bright color fast fading from her face, with a feverish energy possessing her fingers,—the pretty Marguerite bent over her embroidery, and worked as if her life depended on it. Hardly less agitated himself, Vendale felt the importance of leading her very gently to the avowal which he was eager to make,—to the other sweet-er avowal still, which he was longing to hear. A woman's love is never to be taken by storm; it yields insensibly to a system of gradual approach. It ventures by the roundabout way, and listens to the low voice. Vendale led her memory back to their past meetings when they were traveling together in Switzerland. They revived the impressions, they recalled the events, of the happy by-gone time. Little by little, Marguerite's constraint vanished. She smiled, she was interested, she looked at Vendale, she grew idle with her needle, she made false stitches in her work. Their voices sank lower and lower; their faces bent nearer and nearer to each other as they spoke. And Madame Dor? Madame Dor behaved like an angel. She never looked round; she never said a word; she went on with Obenreizer's stockings. Pulling each stocking up tight over her left arm, and holding that arm aloft from time to time, to catch the light on her work, there were moments, delicate and indescribable moments, when Madame Dor appeared to be sitting upside down, and contemplating one of her own respectable legs elevated in the air. As the minutes wore on, these elevations followed each other at longer and longer intervals. Now and again, the black gauze head-dress nodded, dropped forward, recovered itself. A little heap of stockings slid softly from Madame Dor's lap, and remained unnoticed on the floor. A prodigious ball of worsted followed the stockings, and rolled lazily under the table. The black gauze head-dress nodded, dropped forward, recovered itself, nodded again, dropped forward again, and recovered itself no more. A composite sound, partly as of the purring of an immense cat, partly as of the planing of a soft board, rose over the hushed voices of the lovers, and hummed at regular intervals through the room. Nature and Madame Dor had combined together in Vendale's interest. The best of women was asleep.

Marguerite rose to stop—not the snoring—let us say, the audible repose of Madame Dor. Vendale laid his hand on her arm, and pressed her back gently into her chair.

"Don't disturb her," he whispered. "I have been waiting to tell you a secret. Let me tell it now."

Marguerite resumed her seat. She tried to resume her needle. It was useless; her eyes failed her; her hand failed her; she could find nothing.

"We have been talking," said Vendale, "of the happy time when we first met, and first traveled together. I have a confession to make. I have been concealing something. When we spoke of my first visit to Switzerland, I told you of all the impressions I had brought back with me to England—except one. Can you guess what that one is?"

Her eyes looked steadfastly at the embroidery, and her face turned a little away from him. Signs of disturbance began to appear in her neat velvet bodice, round the region of the brooch. She made no reply. Vendale pressed the question without mercy.

"Can you guess what the one Swiss impression is, which I have not told you yet?"

Her face turned back toward him, and a faint smile trembled on her lips.

"An impression of the mountains, perhaps?" she said, slyly.

"No; a much more precious impression than that."

"Of the lakes?"

"No. The lakes have not grown dearer and dearer in remembrance to me every day. The lakes are not associated with my happiness in the present, and my hopes in the future. Marguerite! all that makes life worth having hangs, for me, on a word from your lips. Marguerite! I love you!"

Her head drooped, as he took her hand. He drew her to him, and looked at her. The tears escaped from her downcast eyes, and fell slowly over her cheeks.

"O, Mr. Vendale," she said, sadly, "it would have been kinder to have kept your secret. Have you forgotten the distance between us? It can never, never be!"

"There can be but one distance between us, Marguerite,—a distance of our making. My love, my darling, there is no higher rank in goodness, there is no higher rank in beauty, than yours! Come! whisper the one little word which tells me you will be my wife!"

She sighed bitterly. "Think of your family," she murmured; "and think of mine!"

Vendale drew her a little nearer to him.

"If you dwell on such an obstacle as that," he said, "I shall think but one thought—I shall think I have offended you."

She started, and looked up. "O no!" she exclaimed, innocently. The instant the words passed her lips, she saw the construction that might be placed on them. Her confession had escaped her in spite of herself. A lovely flush of color overspread her face. She made a momentary effort to disengage herself from her lover's embrace. She looked up at him entreatingly. She tried to speak. The words died on her lips in the kiss that Vendale pressed on them. "Let me go, Mr. Vendale!" she said, faintly.

"Call me George."

She laid her head on his bosom. All her heart went out to him at last. "George!" she whispered.

"Say you love me!"

Her arms twined themselves gently round his neck. Her lips, timidly touching his cheek, murmured the delicious words,—"I love you!"

In the moment of silence that followed, the sound of the opening and closing of the house door came clear to them through the wintry stillness of the street.

Marguerite started to her feet.

"Let me go!" she said. "He has come back!"

She hurried from the room, and touched Madame Dor's shoulder in passing. Madame Dor woke up with a loud snort, looked first over one shoulder and then over the other, peered down into her lap and discovered neither stockings, worsted, nor darning-needle in it. At the same moment, footsteps became audible ascending the stairs. "Mon Dieu!" said Madame Dor, addressing herself to the stove, and trembling violently. Vendale picked up the stockings and the ball, and huddled them all back in a heap over her shoulder. "Mon Dieu!" said Madame Dor, for the second time, as the avalanche of worsted poured into her capacious lap.

The door opened, and Obenreizer came in. His first glance round the room showed him that Marguerite was absent.

"What!" he exclaimed, "my niece is away? My niece is not here to entertain you in my absence? This is unpardonable. I shall bring her back instantly."

Vendale stopped him.

"I beg you will not disturb Miss Obenreizer," he said. "You have returned, I see, without your friend?"

"My friend remains, and consoles our afflicted compatriot. A heart-rending scene, Mr. Vendale! The household gods at the pawnbroker's,—the family immersed in tears. We all embraced in silence. My admirable friend alone possessed his composure. He sent out, on the spot, for a bottle of wine."

"Can I say a word to you in private, Mr. Obenreizer?"

"Assuredly." He turned to Madame Dor. "My good creature, you are sinking for want of repose. Mr. Vendale will excuse you."

Madame Dor rose, and set forth sideways on her journey from the stove to bed. She dropped a stocking. Vendale picked it up for her, and opened one of the folding-doors. She advanced a step, and dropped three more stockings. Vendale stooping to recover them as before, Obenreizer interfered with profuse apologies, and with a warning look at Madame Dor. Madame Dor acknowledged the look by dropping the whole of the stockings in a heap, and then shuffling away panic-stricken from the scene of disaster. Obenreizer swept up the complete collection fiercely in both hands. "Go!" he cried, giving his prodigious handful a preparatory swing in the air. Madame Dor said, "Mon Dieu," and vanished into the next room, pursued by a shower of stockings.

"What must you think, Mr. Vendale," said Obenreizer, closing the door, "of this deplorable intrusion of domestic details? For myself, I blush at it. We are beginning the New Year as badly as possible; every thing has gone wrong to-night. Be seated, pray,—and say, what may I offer you? Shall we pay our best respects to another of your noble English institutions? It is my study to be, what you call, jolly. I propose a grog."

Vendale declined the grog with all needful respect for that noble institution.

"I wish to speak to you on a subject in which I am deeply interested," he said. "You must have observed, Mr. Obenreizer, that I have, from the first, felt no ordinary admiration for your charming niece?"

"You are very good. In my niece's name, I thank you."

"Perhaps you may have noticed, latterly, that my admiration for Miss Obenreizer has grown into a tender and deeper feeling?"

"Shall we say friendship, Mr. Vendale?"

"Say love,—and we shall be nearer to the truth."

Obenreizer started out of his chair. The faintly discernible beat, which was his nearest approach to a change of color, showed itself suddenly in his cheeks.

"You are Miss Obenreizer's guardian," pursued Vendale. "I ask you to confer upon me the greatest of all favors,—I ask you to give me her hand in marriage."

Obenreizer dropped back into his chair. "Mr. Vendale," he said, "you petrify me."

"I will wait," rejoined Vendale, "until you have recovered yourself."

"One word before I recover myself. You have said nothing about this to my niece?"

"I have opened my whole heart to your niece. And I have reason to hope—"

"What?" interposed Obenreizer. "You have made a proposal to my niece, without first asking for my authority to pay your addresses to her?" He struck his hand on the table, and lost his hold over himself for the first time in Vendale's experience of him. "Sir!" he exclaimed, indignantly, "what sort of conduct is this? As a man of honor, speaking to a man of honor, how can you justify it?"

"I can only justify it as one of our English institutions," said Vendale, quietly. "You admire our English institutions. I can't honestly tell you, Mr. Obenreizer, that I regret what I have done. I can only assure you that I have not acted in the matter with any intentional disrespect toward yourself. This said, may I ask you to tell me plainly what objection you see to favoring my suit?"

"I see this immense objection," answered Obenreizer, "that my niece and you are not on a social equality together. My niece is the daughter of a poor peasant; and you are the son of a gentleman. You do us an honor," he added, lowering himself again gradually to his customary polite level, "which deserves, and has, our most grateful acknowledgments. But the inequality is too glaring; the sacrifice is too great. You English are a proud people, Mr. Vendale. I have observed enough of this country to see that such a marriage as you propose would be a scandal here. Not a hand would be held out to your peasant-wife; and all your best friends would desert you."

"One moment," said Vendale, interposing on his side. "I may claim, without any great arrogance, to know more of my country-people in general, and of my own friends in particular, than you do. In the estimation of every body whose opinion is worth having, my wife herself would be the one sufficient justification of my marriage. If I did not feel certain—observe, I say certain—that I am offering her a position which she can accept without so much as the shadow of a humiliation,—I would never (cost me what it might) have asked her to be my wife. Is there any other obstacle that you see? Have you any personal objection to me?"

Obenreizer spread out both his hands in courteous protest. "Personal objection!" he exclaimed. "Dear sir, the bare question is painful to me."

"We are both men of business," pursued Vendale, "and you naturally expect me to satisfy you that I have the means of supporting a wife. I can explain my pecuniary position in two words. I inherit from my parents a fortune of twenty thousand pounds. In half of that sum I have only a life-interest, to which, if I die, leaving a widow, my widow succeeds. If I die, leaving children, the money itself is divided among them, as they come of age. The other half of my fortune is at my own disposal, and is invested in the wine business. I see my way to greatly improving that business. As it stands at present I can not state my return from my capital embarked at more than twelve hundred a year. Add the yearly value of my life-interest,—and the total reaches a present annual income of fifteen hundred pounds. I have the fairest prospect of soon making it more. In the mean time do you object to me on pecuniary grounds?"

Driven back to his last entrenchment, Obenreizer rose, and took a turn backward and forward in the room. For the moment, he was plainly at a loss what to say or do next.

"Before I answer that last question," he said, after a little close consideration with himself, "I beg leave to revert for a moment to Miss Marguerite. You said something just now which seemed to imply that she returns the sentiment with which you are pleased to regard her?"

"I have the inestimable happiness," said Vendale, "of knowing that she loves me."

Obenreizer stood silent for a moment, with the film over his eyes, and the faintly perceptible heat becoming visible again in his cheeks.

"If you will excuse me for a few minutes," he said, with ceremonious politeness, "I should like to have the opportunity of speaking to my niece." With those words, he bowed, and quitted the room.

Left by himself, Vendale's thoughts (as a necessary result of the interview, thus far) turned instinctively to the consideration of Obenreizer's motives. He had put obstacles in the way of the courtship; he was now putting obstacles in the way of the marriage,—a marriage offering advantages which even his ingenuity could not dispute. On the face of it, his conduct was incomprehensible. What did it mean?

Seeking, under the surface, for the answer to that question,—and remembering that Obenreizer was a man of about his own age; also, that Marguerite was, strictly speaking, his half-niece only,—Vendale asked himself, with a lover's ready jealousy, whether he had a rival to fear, as well as a guardian to conciliate. The thought just crossed his mind, and a more. The sense of Marguerite's kiss still lingering on his cheek reminded him gently that even the jealousy of a moment was now a treason to her.

On reflection, it seemed most likely that a personal motive of another kind might suggest the true explanation of Obenreizer's conduct. Marguerite's grace and beauty were precious ornaments in that little household. They gave it a special social attraction and a special social importance. They armed Obenreizer with a certain influence in reserve, which he could always depend upon to make his house attractive, and which he might always bring more or less to bear on the forwarding of his own private ends. Was he the sort of man to resign such advantages as were here implied, without obtaining the fullest possible compensation for the loss? A connection by marriage with Vendale offered him solid advantages, beyond all doubt. But there were hundreds of men in London with far greater power and far wider influence than Vendale possessed. Was it possible that this man's ambition secretly looked higher than the highest prospects that could be offered to him by the alliance now proposed for his niece? As the question passed through Vendale's mind, the man himself reappeared—to answer it, or not to answer it, as the event might prove.

A marked change was visible in Obenreizer when he resumed his place. His manner was less assured, and there were plain traces about his mouth of recent agitation which had not been successfully composed. Had he said something, referring either to Vendale or to himself, which had roused Marguerite's spirit, and which had placed him, for the first time, face to face with a resolute assertion of his niece's will? It might or might not be. This was only certain,—he looked like a man who had met with a repulse.

"I have spoken to my niece," he began. "I find, Mr. Vendale, that even your influence has not entirely blinded her to the social objections to your proposal."

"May I ask," returned Vendale, "if that is the only result of your interview with Miss Obenreizer?"

A momentary flash leaped up through the Obenreizer film.

"You are master of the situation," he answered, in a tone of sardonic submission. "If you insist on my admitting it, I do admit it in those words. My niece's will and mine used to be one, Mr. Vendale. You have come between us, and her will is now yours. In my country, we know when we are beaten, and we submit with our best grace. I submit, with my best grace, on certain conditions. Let us revert to the statement of your pecuniary position. I have an objection to you, my dear sir,—a most amazing, a most audacious objection, from a man in my position to a man in yours."

"What is it?"

"You have honored me by making a proposal for my niece's hand. For the present (with best thanks and respects), I beg to decline it."

"Why?"

"Because you are not rich enough."

The objection, as the speaker had foreseen, took Vendale completely by surprise. For the moment he was speechless.

"Your income is fifteen hundred a year," pursued Obenreizer. "In my miserable country I should fall on my knees before your income, and say, 'What a princely fortune!' In wealthy England, I sit as I am, and say, 'A modest independence, dear sir; nothing more. Enough, perhaps, for a wife in your own rank of life, who has no social prejudices to conquer. Not more than half enough for a wife who is a meanly born foreigner, and who has all your social prejudices against her.' Sir! if my niece is ever to marry you, she will have what you call uphill work of it in taking her place at starting. Yes; yes; this is not your view, but it remains, immovably remains, my view for all that. For my niece's sake, I claim that this uphill work shall be made as smooth as possible. Whatever material advantages she can have to help her, ought, in common justice, to be hers. Now, tell me, Mr. Vendale, on your fifteen hundred a year can your wife have a house in a fashionable quarter, a footman to open her door, a butler to wait at her table, and a carriage and horses to drive about in? I see the answer in your face,—your face says, No. Very good. Tell me one more thing, and I have done. Take the mass of your educated, accomplished, and lovely country-women, is it, or is it not, the fact that a lady who has a house in a fashionable quarter, a footman to open her door, a butler to wait at her table, and a carriage and horses to drive about in, is a lady who has gained four steps in female estimation, at starting? Yes? or No?"

"Come to the point," said Vendale. "You view this question as a question of terms. What are your terms?"

"The lowest terms, dear sir, on which you can provide your wife with those four steps at starting. Double your present income,—the most rigid economy can not do it in England on less. You said just now that you expected greatly to increase the value of your business. To work,—and increase it! I am a good devil after all! On the day when you satisfy me, by plain proofs, that your income has risen to three thousand a year, ask me for my niece's hand, and it is yours."

"May I inquire if you have mentioned this arrangement to Miss Obenreizer?"

"Certainly. She has a last little morsel of regard still left for me, Mr. Vendale, which is not yours yet; and she accepts my terms. In other words, she submits to be guided by her guardian's regard for her welfare, and by her guardian's superior knowledge of the world." He threw himself back in his chair, in firm reliance on his position, and in full possession of his excellent temper.

Any open assertion of his own interests, in the situation in which Vendale was now placed, seemed to be (for the present at least) hopeless. He found himself literally left with no ground to stand on. Whether Obenreizer's objections were the genuine product of Obenreizer's own view of the case, or whether he was simply delaying the marriage in the hope of ultimately breaking it off altogether,—in either of these events, any present resistance on Vendale's part would be equally useless. There was no help for it but to yield, making the best terms that he could on his own side.

"I protest against the conditions you impose on me," he began.

"Naturally," said Obenreizer; "I dare say I should protest myself, in your place."

"Say, however," pursued Vendale, "that I accept your terms. In that case I must be permitted to make two stipulations on my part. In the first place I shall expect to be allowed to see your niece."

"Aha! to see my niece? and to make her in as great a hurry to be married as you are yourself? Suppose I say No? you would see her perhaps without my permission?"

"Decidedly!"

"How delightfully frank! How exquisitely English! You shall see her, Mr. Vendale, on certain days, which we will appoint together. What next?"

"Your objection to my income," proceeded Vendale, "has taken me completely by surprise. I wish to be assured against any repetition of that surprise. Your present views of my qualification for marriage require me to have an income of three thousand a year. Can I be certain, in the future, as your experience of England enlarges, that your estimate will rise no higher?"

"In plain English," said Obenreizer, "you doubt my word?"

"Do you propose to take my word for it, when I inform you that I have doubled my income?" asked Vendale. "If my memory does not deceive me, you stipulated, a minute since, for plain proofs?"

"Well played, Mr. Vendale! You combine the foreign quickness with the English solidity. Accept my best congratulations. Accept, also, my written guaranty."

He rose; seated himself at a writing-desk at a side-table, wrote a few lines, and presented them to Vendale, with a low bow. The engagement was perfectly explicit, and was signed and dated with scrupulous care.

"Are you satisfied with your guaranty?"

"I am satisfied."

"Charmed to hear it, I am sure. We have had our little skirmish,—we have really been wonderfully clever on both sides. For the present our affairs are settled. I bear no malice. You bear no malice. Come, Mr. Vendale, a good English shake hands."

Vendale gave his hand, a little bewildered by Obenreizer's sudden transitions from one humor to another.

"When may I expect to see Miss Obenreizer again?" he asked, as he rose to go.

"Honor me with a visit to-morrow," said Obenreizer, "and we will settle it then. Do have a grog before you go! No? Well! well! we will reserve the grog till you have your three thousand a year, and are ready to be married. Aha! When will that be?"

"I made an estimate some months since, of the capacities of my business," said Vendale. "If that estimate is correct, I shall double my present income."

"And be married!" added Obenreizer.

"And be married," repeated Vendale, "within a year from this time. Good-night."

VENDALE MAKES MISCHIEF.

When Vendale entered his office the next morning, the dull commercial routine at Cripple Corner met him with a new face. Marguerite had an interest in it now! The whole machinery which Wilding's death had set in motion, to realize the value of the business—the balancing of ledgers, the estimating of debts, the taking of stock, and the rest of it—was now transformed into machinery which indicated the chances for and against a speedy marriage. After looking over results, as presented by his accountant, and checking additions and subtractions, as rendered by the clerks, Vendale turned his attention to the stock-taking department next, and sent a message to the cellars, desiring to see the report.

The Cellarman's appearance, the moment he put his head in at the door of his master's private room, suggested that something very extraordinary must have happened that morning. There was an approach to alacrity in Joey Ladle's movements! There was something which actually stimulated cheerfulness in Joey Ladle's face!

"What's the matter?" asked Vendale. "Any thing wrong?"

"I should wish to mention one thing," answered Joey. "Young Mr. Vendale, I have never set myself up for a prophet."

"Who ever said you did?"

"No prophet, as far as I've heard tell of that profession," proceeded Joey, "ever lived principally underground. No prophet, whatever else he might take in at the pores, ever took in wine from morning to night, for a number of years together. When I said to Young Master Wilding, respecting his changing the name of the firm, that one of these days he might find he'd changed the luck of the firm,—did I put myself forward as a prophet? No, I didn't. Has what I said to him come true? Yes, it has. In the time of Pebbleson Nephew, Young Mr. Vendale, no such thing was ever known as a mistake made in a consignment delivered at these doors. There's a mistake been made now. Please to remark that it happened before Miss Margaret came here. For which reason it don't go against what I've said respecting Miss Margaret singing round the luck. Read that, sir," concluded Joey, pointing attention to a special passage in the report, with a forefinger which appeared to be in process of taking in through the pores nothing more remarkable than dirt. "It's foreign to my nature to crow over the house I serve, but I feel it a kind of a solemn duty to ask you to read that."

Vendale read as follows:—"Note, respecting the Swiss champagne. An irregularity has been discovered in the last consignment received from the firm of Defresnier & Co." Vendale stopped, and referred to a memorandum-book by his side. "That was in Mr. Wilding's time," he said. "The vintage was a particularly good one, and he took the whole of it. The Swiss champagne has done very well, hasn't it?"

"I don't say it's done badly," answered the Cellarman. "It may have got sick in our customers' bins, or it may have bust in our customers' hands. But I don't say its done badly with us."

Vendale resumed the reading of the note: "We find the number of the cases to be quite correct by the books. But six of them, which present a slight difference from the rest in the brand, have been opened, and have been found to contain a red wine instead of champagne. The similarity in the brands, we suppose, caused a mistake to be made in sending the consignment from Neuchâtel. The error has not been found to extend beyond six cases."

"Is that all!" exclaimed Vendale, tossing the note away from him.

Joey Ladle's eye followed the flying morsel of paper drearly.

"I'm glad to see you take it easy, sir," he said. "Whatever happens, it will be always a comfort to you to remember that you took it easy at first. Sometimes one mistake leads to another. A man drops a bit of orange-peel on the pavement by mistake, and another man treads on it by mistake, and there's a job at the hospital, and a party crippled for life. I'm glad you take it easy, sir. In Pebbleson Nephew's time we shouldn't have taken it easy till we had seen the end of it. Without desiring to crow over the house, Young Mr. Vendale, I wish you well through it. No offense, sir," said the Cellarman, opening the door to go out, and looking in again ominously before he shut it. "I'm muddled and mouloucolly, I grant you. But I'm an old servant of Pebbleson Nephew, and I wish you well through them six cases of red wine."

Left by himself, Vendale laughed, and took up his pen. "I may as well send a line to Defresnier & Company," he thought, "before I forget it." He wrote at once in these terms:

"Dear Sirs,—We are taking stock, and a trifling mistake has been discovered in the last consignment of champagne sent by your house to ours. Six of the cases contain red wine—which we hereby return to you. The matter can easily be set right, either by your sending us six cases of the champagne, if they can be produced, or, if not, by your crediting us with the value of six cases on the amount last paid (five hundred pounds) by our firm to yours. Your faithful servants, WILDING & Co."

This letter dispatched to the post, the subject dropped at once out of Vendale's mind. He had other and far more interesting matters to think of. Later in the day he paid the visit to Obenreizer which had been agreed on between them. Certain evenings in the week were set apart which he was privileged to spend with Marguerite,—always, however, in the presence of a third person. On this stipulation Obenreizer politely but positively insisted. The one concession he made was to give Vendale his choice of who the third person should be. Confiding in past experience, his choice fell unhesitatingly upon the excellent woman who mended Obenreizer's stockings. On hearing of the responsibility intrusted to her, Madame Dor's intellectual nature burst suddenly into a new stage of development. She waited till Obenreizer's eye was off her,—and then she looked at Vendale, and dimly winked.

The time passed,—the happy evenings with Marguerite came and went. It was the tenth morning since Vendale had written to the Swiss firm, when the answer appeared on his desk, with the other letters of the day:

"Dear Sirs,—We beg to offer our excuses for the little mistake which has happened. At the same time we regret to add that the statement of our error, with which you have favored us, has led to a very unexpected discovery. The affair is a most serious one for you and for us. The particulars are as follows:

"Having no more champagne of the vintage last sent to you, we made arrangements to credit your firm with the value of the six cases, as suggested by yourself. On taking this step, certain forms observed in our mode of doing business necessitated a reference to our bankers' book, as well as to our ledger. The result is a moral certainty that no such remittance as you mention can have reached our house, and a literal certainty that no such remittance has been paid to our account at the bank."

"It is needless, at this stage of the proceedings, to trouble you with details. The money has unquestionably been stolen in the course of its transit from you to us. Certain peculiarities which we observe, relating to the manner in which the fraud has been perpetrated, lead us to conclude that the thief may have calculated on being able to pay the missing sum to our bankers before an inevitable discovery followed the annual striking of our balance. This would not have happened, in the usual course, for another three months. During that period, but for your letter, we might have remained perfectly unconscious of the robbery that has been committed."

"We mention this last circumstance, as it may help to show you that we have to do, in this case, with no ordinary thief. Thus far we have not even a suspicion of who that thief is. But we believe you will assist us in making some advance toward discovery, by examining the receipt (forged, of course) which has no doubt purported to come to you from our house. Be pleased to look and see whether it is a receipt entirely in manuscript, or whether it is a numbered and printed form which merely requires the filling in of the amount. The settlement of this apparently trivial question is, we assure you, a matter of vital importance. Anxiously awaiting your reply, we remain, with high esteem and consideration, DEFRESNIER & Co."

Vendale laid the letter on his desk, and waited a moment to steady his mind under the shock that had fallen on it. At the time of all others when it was most important to him to increase the value of his business, that business was threatened with a loss of five hundred pounds. He thought of Marguerite, as he took the key from his pocket and opened the iron chamber in the wall in which the books and papers of the firm were kept.

He was still in the chamber, searching for the forged receipt, when he was startled by a voice speaking close behind him.

"A thousand pardons," said the voice; "I am afraid I disturb you."

He turned, and found himself face to face with Marguerite's guardian.

"I have called," pursued Obenreizer, "to know if I can be of any use. Business of my own takes me away for some days to Manchester and Liverpool. Can I combine any business of yours with it? I am entirely at your disposal, in the character of commercial traveler for the firm of Wilding & Co."

"Excuse me for one moment," said Vendale;

"I will speak to you directly." He turned round again, and continued his search among the papers. "You come at a time when friendly offers are more than usually precious to me," he resumed. "I have had very bad news this morning from Neuchâtel."

"Bad news!" exclaimed Obenreizer. "From Defresnier & Company?"

"Yes. A remittance we sent to them has been stolen. I am threatened with a loss of five hundred pounds. What's that?"

Turning sharply, and looking into the room for the second time, Vendale discovered his envelope-case overthrown on the floor, and Obenreizer on his knees picking up the contents.

"All my awkwardness!" said Obenreizer. "This dreadful news of yours startled me; I stepped back—" He became too deeply interested in collecting the scattered envelopes to finish the sentence.

"Don't trouble yourself," said Vendale. "The clerk will pick the things up."

"This dreadful news!" repeated Obenreizer, persisting in collecting the envelopes. "This dreadful news!"

"If you will read the letter," said Vendale, "you will find I have exaggerated nothing. There it is, open on my desk."

He resumed his search, and in a moment more discovered the forged receipt. It was on the numbered and printed form described by the Swiss firm. Vendale made a memorandum of the number and date. Having replaced the receipt and locked up the iron chamber, he had leisure to notice Obenreizer, reading the letter in the recess of a window at the far end of the room.

"Come to the fire," said Vendale. "You look perished with the cold out there. I will ring for some more coals."

Obenreizer rose, and came slowly back to the desk. "Marguerite will be as sorry to hear of this as I am," he said, kindly. "What do you mean to do?"

"I am in the hands of Defresnier & Company," answered Vendale. "In my total ignorance of the circumstances, I can only do what they recommend. The receipt which I have just found turns out to be the numbered and printed form. They seem to attach some special importance to its discovery. You have had experience, when you were in the Swiss house, of their way of doing business. Can you guess what object they have in view?"

Obenreizer offered a suggestion.

"Suppose I examine the receipt?" he said.

"Are you ill?" asked Vendale, startled by the change in his face, which now showed itself plainly for the first time. "Pray go to the fire. You seem to be shivering; I hope you are not going to be ill?"

"Not I!" said Obenreizer. "Perhaps I have caught cold. Your English climate might have spared an admirer of your English institutions. Let me look at the receipt."

Vendale opened the iron chamber. Obenreizer took a chair, and drew it close to the fire. He held both hands over the flames. "Let me look at the receipt," he repeated, eagerly, as Vendale reappeared with the paper in his hand. At the same moment a porter entered the room with a fresh supply of coals. Vendale told him to make a good fire. The man obeyed the order with a disastrous alacrity. As he stepped forward and raised the scuttle, his foot caught in a fold of the rug, and he discharged his entire cargo of coals into the grate. The result was an instant smothering of the flame, and the production of a stream of yellow smoke, without a visible morsel of fire to account for it.

"Imbecile!" whispered Obenreizer to himself, with a look at the man which the man remembered for many a long day afterward.

"Will you come into the clerks' room?" asked Vendale. "They have a stove there."

"No, no. No matter."

Vendale handed him the receipt. Obenreizer's interest in examining it appeared to have been quenched as suddenly and as effectually as the fire itself. He just glanced over the document, and said, "No; I don't understand it! I am sorry to be of no use."

"I will write to Neuchâtel by to-night's post," said Vendale, putting away the receipt for the second time. "We must wait, and see what comes of it."

"By to-night's post," repeated Obenreizer. "Let me see. You will get the answer in eight or nine days' time. I shall be back before that. If I can be of any service as commercial traveler, perhaps you will let me know between this and then. You will send me written instructions? My best thanks. I shall be most anxious for your answer from Neuchâtel. Who knows? It may be a mistake, my dear friend, after all. Courage! courage! courage!" He had entered the room with no appearance of being pressed for time. He now snatched up his hat, and took his leave with the air of a man who had not another moment to lose.

His previous impression of Obenreizer was shaken by what he had heard and seen at the interview which had just taken place. He was disposed, for the first time, to doubt whether, in this case, he had not been a little hasty and hard in his judgment on another man. Obenreizer's surprise and regret, on hearing the news from Neuchâtel, bore the plainest marks of being honestly felt,—not politely assumed for the occasion. With troubles of his own to encounter, suffering, to all appearance, from the first insidious attack of a serious illness, he had looked and spoken like a man who really deplored the disaster that had fallen on his friend. Hitherto, Vendale had tried vainly to alter his first opinion of Marguerite's guardian, for Marguerite's sake. All the generous instincts in his nature now combined together and shook the evidence which had seemed unanswerable up to this time. "Who knows?" he thought. "I may have read that man's face wrongly, after all."

The time passed—the happy evenings with Marguerite came and went. It was again the tenth morning since Vendale had written to the Swiss firm; and again the answer appeared on his desk with the other letters of the day:

"Dear Sir,—My senior partner, M. Defresnier, has been called away, by urgent business, to Milan. In his absence (and with his full concurrence and authority), I now write to you again on the subject of the missing five hundred pounds."

"Your discovery that the forged receipt is executed upon one of our numbered and printed forms has caused inexpressible surprise and distress to my partner and to myself. At the time when your remittance was stolen, but three keys were in existence opening the strong box in which our receipt-forms are invariably kept. My partner had one key; I had the other. The third was in the possession of a gentleman who, at that period, occupied a position of trust in our house. We should as soon have thought of suspecting one of ourselves as of suspecting this person. Suspicion now points at him, nevertheless. I can not prevail on myself to inform you who the person is, so long as there is the shadow of a chance that he may come innocently out of the inquiry which must now be instituted. Forgive my silence; the motive of it is good."

"The form our investigation must now take is simple enough. The handwriting on your receipt must be compared, by competent persons whom we have at our disposal, with certain specimens of handwriting in our possession. I can not send you the specimens, for business reasons, which, when you hear them, you are sure to approve. I must beg you to send me the receipt to Neuchâtel,—and, in making this request, I must accompany it by a word of necessary warning."

"If the person at whom suspicion now points really proves to be the person who has committed this forgery and theft, I have reason to fear that circumstances may have already put him on his guard. The only evidence against him is the evidence in your hands, and he will move heaven and earth to obtain and destroy it. I strongly urge you not to trust the receipt to the post. Send it to me, without loss of time, by a private hand, and choose nobody for your messenger but a person long established in your own employment, accustomed to traveling, capable of speaking French; a man of courage, a man of honesty, and, above all things, a man who can be trusted to let no stranger scrape acquaintance with him on the route. Tell no one—absolutely no one—but your messenger of the turn this matter has now taken. The safe transit of the receipt may depend on your interpreting literally the advice which I give you at the end of this letter."

"I have only to add that every possible saving of time is now of the last importance. More than one of our receipt-forms is missing, and it is impossible to say what new frauds may not be committed if we fail to lay our hands on the thief."

"Your faithful servant,
"ROLLAND."
"(Signing for Defresnier & Co.)"

Who was the suspected man? In Vendale's position, it seemed useless to inquire.

Who was to be sent to Neuchâtel with the receipt? Men of courage and men of honesty were to be had at Cripple Corner for the asking. But where was the man who was accustomed to foreign traveling, who could speak the French language, and who could be really relied on to let no stranger scrape acquaintance with him on his route? There was but one man at hand who combined all those requisites in his own person, and that man was Vendale himself.

It was a sacrifice to leave his business; it was a greater sacrifice to leave Marguerite. But a matter of five hundred pounds was involved in the pending inquiry; and a literal interpretation of M. Rolland's advice was insisted on in terms which there was no trifling with. The more Vendale thought of it, the more plainly the necessity faced him, and said, "Go!"

As he locked up the letter with the receipt, the association of ideas reminded him of Obenreizer. A guess at the identity of the suspected man looked more possible now. Obenreizer might know.

The thought had barely passed through his mind, when the door opened, and Obenreizer entered the room.

"They told me at Soho Square you were expected back last night," said Vendale, greeting him. "Have you done well in the country? Are you better?"

A thousand thanks. Obenreizer had done admirably well. Obenreizer was infinitely better. And now what news? Any letter from Neuchâtel?

"A very strange letter," answered Vendale. "The matter has taken a new turn, and the letter insists—without excepting any body—on my keeping our next proceedings a profound secret."

"Without excepting any body?" repeated Obenreizer. As he said the words, he walked away again, thoughtfully, to the window at the other end of the room, looked out for a moment, and suddenly came back to Vendale. "Surely they must have forgotten?" he resumed, "or they would have excepted me?"

"It is Monsieur Rolland who writes," said Vendale. "And, as you say, he must certainly have forgotten. That view of the matter quite escaped me. I was just wishing I had you to consult, when you came into the room. And here I am tied by a formal prohibition, which can not possibly have been intended to include you. How very annoying!"

Obenreizer's filmy eyes fixed on Vendale attentively.

"Perhaps it is more than annoying!" he said. "I came this morning not only to hear the news, but to offer myself as messenger, negotiator,—what you will. Would you believe it? I have letters which oblige me to go to Switzerland immediately. Messages, documents, any thing,—I could have taken them all to Defresnier & Rolland for you."

"You are the very man I wanted," returned Vendale. "I had decided, most unwillingly, on going to Neuchâtel myself, not five minutes since, because I could find no one here capable of taking my place. Let me look at the letter again."

He opened the strong room to get at the letter. Obenreizer, after glancing round him to make sure that they were alone, followed a step or two and waited, measuring Vendale with his eye. Vendale was the tallest man, and unmistakably the strongest man also of the two. Obenreizer turned away, and warmed himself at the fire.

Meanwhile, Vendale read the last paragraph in the letter for the third time. There was the plain warning,—there was the closing sentence, which insisted on a literal interpretation of it. The hand which was leading Vendale in the dark led him on that condition only. A large sum was at stake; a terrible suspicion remained to be verified. If he acted on his own responsibility, and if any thing happened to defeat the object in view, who would be blamed? As a man of business, Vendale had but one course to follow. He locked the letter up again.

"It is most annoying," he said to Obenreizer,—"it is a piece of forgetfulness on Monsieur Rolland's part which puts me to serious inconvenience, and places me in an absurdly false position toward you. What am I to do? I am acting in a very serious matter, and acting entirely in the dark. I have no choice but to be guided, not by the spirit, but by the letter of my instructions. You understand me, I am sure? You know, if I had not been fettered in this way, how gladly I should have accepted your services?"

"Say no more!" returned Obenreizer. "In your place I should have done the same. My good friend, I take no offense. I thank you for your compliment. We shall be traveling companions, at any rate," added Obenreizer. "You go, as I go, at once?"

"At once. I must speak to Marguerite first, of course!"

"Surely! surely! Speak to her this evening. Come and pick me up on the way to the station. We go together by the mail train to-night?"

"By the mail train to-night."

It was later than Vendale had anticipated when he drove up to the house in Soho Square. Business difficulties, occasioned by his sudden departure, had presented themselves by dozens. A cruelly large share of the time which he had hoped to devote to Marguerite had been claimed by duties at his office which it was impossible to neglect.

To his surprise and delight, she was alone in the drawing-room when he entered it.

"We have only a few minutes, George," she said. "But Madame Dor has been good to me,—and we can have those few minutes alone." She threw her arms around his neck, and whispered eagerly, "Have you done any thing to offend Mr. Obenreizer?"

"I!" exclaimed Vendale, in amazement.

"Hush!" she said, "I want to whisper it. You know the little photograph I have got of you. This afternoon it happened to be on the chimney-piece. He took it up and looked at it,—and I saw his face in the glass. I know you have offended him! He is merciless; he is revengeful; he is as secret as the grave. Don't go with him, George,—don't go with him!"

"My own love," returned Vendale, "you are letting your fancy frighten you! Obenreizer and I were never better friends than we are at this moment."

Before a word more could be said, the sudden movement of some ponderous body shook the floor of the next room. The shock was followed by the appearance of Madame Dor. "Obenreizer!" exclaimed this excellent person in a whisper, and plumped down instantly in her regular place by the stove.

Obenreizer came in with a courier's bag strapped over his shoulder.

"Are you ready?" he asked, addressing Vendale. "Can I take any thing for you? You have no traveling-bag. I have got one. Here is the compartment for papers, open at your service."

"Thank you," said Vendale. "I have only one paper of importance with me; and that paper I am bound to take charge of myself. Here it is," he added, touching the breast-pocket of his coat, "and here it must remain till we get to Neuchâtel."

As he said those words, Marguerite's hand caught his, and pressed it significantly. She was looking toward Obenreizer. Before Vendale could look, in his turn, Obenreizer had wheeled round, and was taking leave of Madame Dor.

"Adieu, my charming niece!" he said, turning to Marguerite next. "En route, my friend, for Neuchâtel!" He tapped Vendale lightly over the breast-pocket of his coat, and led the way to the door.

Vendale's last look was for Marguerite. Marguerite's last words to him were, "Don't go!"

ACT III.

IN THE VALLEY.

It was about the middle of the month of February when Vendale and Obenreizer set forth on their expedition. The winter being a hard one, the time was bad for travelers. So bad was it that these two travelers, coming to Strasburg, found its great inns almost empty. And even the few people they did encounter in that city, who had started from England or from Paris on business journeys toward the interior of Switzerland, were turning back.

Many of the railroads in Switzerland that tourists pass easily enough now, were almost or quite impracticable then. Some were not begun; more were not completed. On such as were open, there were still large gaps of old road where communication in the winter season was often stopped; on others, there were weak points where the new work was not safe, either under conditions of severe frost or of rapid thaw.

The running of trains on this last class was not to be counted on in the worst time of the year, was contingent upon weather, or was wholly abandoned through the months considered the most dangerous.

At Strasburg there were more travelers' stories afloat, respecting the difficulties of the way farther on, than there were travelers to relate them. Many of these tales were as wild as usual; but the more modestly marvelous did derive some color from the circumstance that people were indisputably turning back. However, as the road to Basle was open, Vendale's resolution to push on was in no wise disturbed. Obenreizer's resolution was necessarily Vendale's, seeing that he stood at bay thus desperately;—he must be ruined, or must destroy the evidence that Vendale carried about him, even if he destroyed Vendale with it.

The state of mind of each of these two fellow-travelers toward the other was this. Obenreizer, encircled by impending ruin through Vendale's quickness of action, and seeing the circle narrowed every hour by Vendale's energy, hated him with the animosity of a fierce, cunning lower animal. He had always had instinctive movements in his breast against him; perhaps because of that old sore of gentleman and peasant; perhaps because of the openness of his nature; perhaps because of his better looks; perhaps because of his success with Marguerite; perhaps on all those grounds, the two last not the least. And now he saw in him, besides, the hunter who was tracking him down. Vendale, on the other hand, always contending generously against his first vague mistrust, now felt bound to contend against it more than ever, reminding himself, "He is Marguerite's guardian. We are on perfectly friendly terms; he is my companion of his own proposal, and can have no interested motive in sharing this undesirable journey." To which pleas in behalf of Obenreizer, chance added one consideration more, when they came to Basle, after a journey of more than twice the average duration.

They had had a late dinner, and were alone in an inn room there, overhanging the Rhine, at that place rapid and deep, swollen and loud. Vendale lounged upon a couch, and Obenreizer walked to and fro,—now stopping at the window, looking at the crooked reflections of the town lights in the dark water (and peradventure thinking, "If I could fling him into it!"), now resuming his walk with his eyes upon the floor.

"Where shall I rob him, if I can? Where shall I murder him, if I must?" So, as he paced the room, ran the river, ran the river, ran the river.

The burden seemed to him, at last, to be growing so plain that he stopped; thinking it as well to suggest another burden to his companion. "The Rhine sounds to-night," he said with a smile, "like the old water-fall at home. That water-fall which my mother showed to travelers (I told you of it once). The sound of it changed with the weather, as does the sound of all falling waters and flowing waters. When I was pupil of the watch-maker, I remembered it as sometimes saying to me for whole days, 'Who are you, my little wretch? Who are you, my little wretch?' I remembered it as saying, other times, when its sound was hollow, and storm was coming up the Pass: 'Boom, boom, boom. Beat him, beat him, beat him.' Like my mother enraged,—if she was my mother."

"If she was?" said Vendale, gradually changing his attitude to a sitting one. "If she was? Why do you say 'if'?"

"What do I know?" replied the other negligently, throwing up his hands and letting them fall as they would. "What would you have? I am so obscurely born, that how can I say? I was very young, and all the rest of the family were men and women, and my so-called parents were old. Any thing is possible of a case like that?"

"Did you ever doubt?"

"I told you once, I doubt the marriage of those two," he replied, throwing up his hands again, as if he were throwing the unprofitable subject away. "But here I am in Creation. I come of no fine family. What does it matter?"

"At least you are Swiss," said Vendale, after following him with his eyes to and fro.

"How do I know?" he retorted, abruptly, and stopping to look back over his shoulder. "I say to you, at least you are English. How do you know?"

"By what I have been told from infancy."

"Ah! I know of myself that way."

"And," added Vendale, pursuing the thought that he could not drive back, "by my earliest recollections."

"I also. I know of myself that way,—if that way satisfies."

"Does it not satisfy you?"

"It must. There is nothing like 'it must,' in this little world. It must. Two short words those, but stronger than long proof or reasoning."

"You and poor Wilding were born in the same year. You were nearly of an age," said Vendale, again thoughtfully looking after him as he resumed his pacing up and down.

"Yes. Very nearly."

Could Obenreizer be the missing man? In the unknown associations of things, was there a subtler meaning than he himself thought, in that theory so often on his lips about the smallness of the world? Had the Swiss letter presenting him, followed so close on Mrs. Goldstraw's revelation concerning the infant who had been taken away to Switzerland, because he was that infant grown a man? In a world where so many depths lie unsounded, it might be. The chances, or the laws,—call them either,—that had wrought out the revival of Vendale's own acquaintance with Obenreizer, and had ripened it into intimacy, and had brought them here together this present winter night, were hardly less curious; while read by such a light, they were seen to cohere toward the furtherance of a continuous and an intelligible purpose.

Vendale's awakened thoughts ran high while his eyes musingly followed Obenreizer pacing up and down the room, the river ever running to the tune: "Where shall I rob him, if I can? Where shall I murder him, if I must?" The secret of his dead friend was in no hazard from Vendale's lips; but just as his friend had died of its weight, so did he in his lighter succession feel the burden of the trust, and the obligation to follow any clue, however obscure. He rapidly asked himself, would he like this man to be the real Wilding? No. Argue down his mistrust as he might, he was unwilling to put such a substitute in the place of his late guileless, outspoken, child-like partner. He rapidly asked himself, would he like this man to be rich? No. He had more power than enough over Marguerite as it was, and wealth might invest him with more. Would he like this man to be Marguerite's guardian, and yet proved to stand in no degree of relationship toward her, however disconnected and distant? No. But these were not considerations to come between him and fidelity to the dead. Let him see to it that they passed him with no other notice than the knowledge that they had passed him, and left him bent on the discharge of a solemn duty. And he did see to it, so soon that he followed his companion with ungrudging eyes, while he still paced the room; that companion, whom he supposed to be moodily reflecting on his own birth, and not on another man's—least of all what man's—violent death.

The road in advance from Basle to Neuchâtel was better than had been represented. The latest weather had done it good. Drivers, both of horses and mules, had come in that evening after dark, and had reported nothing more difficult to be overcome than trials of patience, harness, wheels, axles, and whipcord. A bargain was soon struck for a carriage and horses, to take them on in the morning, and to start before daylight.

"Do you lock your door at night when traveling?" asked Obenreizer, standing warming his hands by the wood fire in Vendale's chamber, before going to his own.

"Not I. I sleep too soundly."

"You are so sound a sleeper?" he retorted, with an admiring look. "What a blessing!"

"Any thing but a blessing to the rest of the house," rejoined Vendale, "if I had to be knocked up in the morning from the outside of my bedroom door!"

"I too," said Obenreizer, "leave open my room. But let me advise you, as a Swiss who knows: always, when you travel in my country, put your papers—and, of course, your money—under your pillow. Always the same place."

"You are not complimentary to your countrymen," laughed Vendale.

"My countrymen," said Obenreizer, with that light touch of his friend's elbows by way of good-night and benediction, "I suppose, are like the majority of men. And the majority of men will take what they can get. Adieu! At four in the morning."

"Adieu! At four."

Left to himself, Vendale raked the logs together, sprinkled over them the white wood-ashes lying on the hearth, and sat down to compose his thoughts. But they still ran high on their latest theme, and the running of the river tended to agitate rather than to quiet them. As he sat thinking, what little disposition he had had to sleep, departed. He felt it hopeless to lie down yet, and sat dressed by the fire. Marguerite, Wilding, Obenreizer, the business he was then upon, and a thousand hopes and doubts that had nothing to do with it, occupied his mind at once. Every thing seemed to have power over him, but slumber. The departed disposition to sleep kept far away.

He had sat for a long time thinking, on the hearth, when his candle burned down, and its light went out. It was of little moment; there was light enough in the fire. He changed his attitude, and, leaning his arm on the chair-back, and his chin upon that hand, sat thinking still.

But he sat between the fire and the bed, and, as the fire flickered in the play of air from the fast-flowing river, his enlarged shadow fluttered on the white wall by the bedside. His attitude gave it an air, half of mourning, and half of bending over the bed imploring. His eyes were observant of it, when he became troubled by the disagreeable fancy that it was like Wilding's shadow, and not his own.

A slight change of place would cause it to disappear. He made the change, and the apparition of his disturbed fancy vanished. He now sat in the shade of a little nook beside the fire, and the door of the room was before him.

It had a long cumbersome iron latch. He saw the latch slowly and softly rise. The door opened a very little, and came to again: as though only the air had moved it. But he saw that the latch was out of the hasp.

The door opened again very slowly, until it opened wide enough to admit some one. It afterward remained still for awhile, as though cautiously held open on the other side. The figure of a man then entered, with its face turned toward the bed, and stood quiet just within the door. Until it said, in a low half-whisper, at the same time taking one step forward, "Vendale!"

"What now?" he answered, springing from his seat; "who is it?"

It was Obenreizer, and he uttered a cry of surprise as Vendale came upon him from that unexpected direction. "Not in bed?" he said, catching him by both shoulders with an instinctive tendency to a struggle; "then something is wrong!"

"What do you mean?" said Vendale, releasing himself.

"First tell me; you are not ill?"

"Ill? No."

"I have had a bad dream about you. How is it that I see you up and dressed?"

"My good fellow, I may as well ask you how is it that I see you up and undressed?"

"I have told you why. I have had a bad dream about you. I tried to rest after it, but it was impossible. I could not make up my mind to stay where I was, without knowing you were safe; and yet I could not make up my mind to come in here. I have been minutes hesitating at the door. It is so easy to laugh at a dream that you have not dreamed. Where is your candle?"

"Burned out."

"I have a whole one in my room. Shall I fetch it?"

"Do so."

His room was very near, and he was absent for but a few seconds. Coming back with the candle in his hand, he knelt down on the hearth and lighted it. As he blew with his breath a charred billet into flame for the purpose, Vendale, looking down at him, saw that his lips were white and not easy of control.

"Yes!" said Obenreizer, setting the lighted candle on the table, "it was a bad dream. Only look at me!"

His feet were bare; his red-flannel shirt was thrown back at the throat, and its sleeves were rolled above the elbows; his only other garment, a pair of under pantaloons or drawers, reaching to the ankles, fitted him close and tight. A certain lithe and savage appearance was on his figure, and his eyes were very bright.

"If there had been a wrestle with a robber, as I dreamed," said Obenreizer, "you see I was stripped for it."

"And armed, too," said Vendale, glancing at his girdle.

"A traveler's dagger, that I always carry on the road," he answered, carelessly, half drawing it from its sheath with his left hand, and putting it back again. "Do you carry no such thing?"

"Nothing of the kind."

"No pistols?" said Obenreizer, glancing at the table, and from it to the untouched pillow.

"Nothing of the sort."

"You Englishmen are so confident! You wish to sleep?"

"I have wished to sleep this long time, but I can't do it!"

"I neither, after the bad dream. My fire has gone by the way of your candle. May I come and sit by yours? Two o'clock! It will soon be four, that it is not worth the trouble to go to bed again."

"I shall not take the trouble to go to bed at all, now," said Vendale; "sit here and keep me company, and welcome."

Going back to his room to arrange his dress, Obenreizer soon returned in a loose cloak and slippers, and they sat down on opposite sides of the hearth. In the interval, Vendale had replenished the fire from the wood-basket in his room, and Obenreizer had put upon the table a flask and cup from his.

"Common cabaret brandy, I am afraid," he said, pouring out; "bought upon the road, and not like yours from Cripple Corner. But yours is exhausted; so much the worse. A cold night, a cold time of night, a cold country, and a cold house. This may be better than nothing; try it."

Vendale took the cup, and did so.

"How do you find it?"

"It has a coarse after-flavor," said Vendale, giving back the cup with a slight shudder; "and I don't like it."

"You are right," said Obenreizer, tasting and smacking his lips; "it has a coarse after-flavor, and I don't like it. Booh! it burns, though!" He had flung what remained in the cup, upon the fire.

Each of them leaned an elbow on the table, reclined his head upon his hand, and sat looking at the flaring logs. Obenreizer remained watchful and still; but Vendale, after certain nervous twitches and starts, in one of which he rose to his feet, and looked wildly about him, fell into the strangest confusion of dreams. He carried his papers in a leather case or pocket-book, in an inner breast-pocket of his buttoned traveling coat; and whatever he dreamed of, in the lethargy that got possession of him, something inopportune in these papers called him out of that dream, though he could not wake from it.

He was belated on the steppes of Russia (some shadowy person gave that name to the place) with Marguerite; and yet the sensation of a hand at his breast, softly feeling the outline of the pocket-book as he lay asleep before the fire, was present to him. He was shipwrecked in an open boat at sea, and having lost his clothes, had no other covering than an old sail; and yet a creeping hand, tracing outside all the other pockets of the dress he actually wore, for papers, and finding none answer its touch, warned him to rouse himself. He was in the ancient vault at Cripple Corner, to which was transferred the very bed substantial and present in that very room at Basle; and Wilding (not dead as he had supposed, and yet he did not wonder much) shook him, and whispered, "Look at that man! Don't you see he has risen, and is turning the pillow? Why should he turn the pillow, if not to seek those papers that are in your breast? Awake!" And yet he slept, and wandered off into other dreams.

Watchful and still, with his elbow on the table and his head upon that hand, his companion at length said: "Vendale! We are called. Past Four!" Then, opening his eyes, he saw, turned sideways on him, the filmy face of Obenreizer.

"You have been in a heavy sleep," he said. "The fatigue of constant traveling and the cold!"

"I am broad awake now," cried Vendale, springing up, but with an unsteady footing. "Haven't you slept at all?"

"I may have dozed, but I seem to have been patiently looking at the fire. Whether or no, we must wash, and breakfast, and turn out. Past four, Vendale; past four!"

It was said in a tone to rouse him, for already he was half asleep again. In his preparation for the day, too, and at his breakfast, he was often virtually asleep while in mechanical action. It was not until the cold dark day was closing in, that he had any distinct impressions of the ride than jingling bells, bitter weather, slipping horses, frowning hillsides, bleak woods, and a stoppage at some wayside house of entertainment, where they had passed through a cow-house to reach the travelers' room above. He had been conscious of little more, except of Obenreizer sitting thoughtful at his side all day, and eyeing him much.

But when he shook off his stupor, Obenreizer was not at his side. The carriage was stopping to bait at another wayside house; and a line of long narrow carts, laden with casks of wine, and drawn by horses with a quantity of blue collar and head-gear, were bailing too. These came from the direction in which the travelers were going, and Obenreizer (not thoughtful now, but cheerful and alert) was talking with the foremost driver. As Vendale stretched his limbs, circulated his blood and cleared off the lees of his lethargy, with a sharp run to and fro in the bracing air, the line of carts moved on: the drivers all saluting Obenreizer as they passed him.

"Who are those?" asked Vendale.

"They are our carriers,—Defresnier & Company's," replied Obenreizer. "Those are our casks of wine." He was singing to himself, and lighting a cigar.

"I have been dreadfully dull company to-day," said Vendale. "I don't know what has been the matter with me."

"You had no sleep last night; and a kind of brain-congestion frequently comes, at first, of such cold," said Obenreizer. "I have seen it often. After all, we shall have our journey for nothing, it seems."

"How for nothing?"

"The House is at Milan. You know, we are a Wine House at Neuchâtel, and a Silk House at Milan? Well, Silk happening to press of a sudden, more than Wine, Defresnier was summoned to Milan. Rolland, the other partner, has been taken ill since his departure, and the doctors will allow him to see no one. A letter awaits you at Neuchâtel to tell you so. I have it from our chief carrier whom you saw me talking with. He was surprised to see me, and said he had that word for you if he met you. What do you do? Go back?"

"Go on," said Vendale.

"On?"

"On? Yes. Across the Alps, and down to Milan." Obenreizer stopped in his smoking to look at Vendale, and then smoked heavily, looked up the road, looked down the road, looked down at the stones in the road at his feet.

"I have a very serious matter in charge," said Vendale; "more of these missing forms may be turned to as bad account, or worse; I am urged to lose no time in helping the House to take the thief; and nothing shall turn me back."

"No?" cried Obenreizer, taking out his cigar to smile, and giving his hand to his fellow-traveler. "Then nothing shall turn me back. Ho, driver!—Dispatch. Quick there! Let us push on!"

They traveled through the night. There had been snow, and there was a partial thaw, and they mostly traveled at a foot-pace, and always with many stoppages to breathe the splashed and floundering horses. After an hour's broad daylight, they drew rein at the inn door at Neuchâtel, having been some eight-and-twenty hours in conquering some eighty English miles.

When they had hurriedly refreshed and changed, they went together to the house of business of Defresnier & Company. There they found the letter which the wine-carrier had described, enclosing the tests and comparisons of handwriting essential to the discovery of the Forger. Vendale's determination to press forward, without resting, being already taken, the only question to delay them was by what Pass could they cross the Alps? Respecting the state of the two Passes of the St. Gotthard and the Simplon, guides and the mule-drivers differed greatly; and both Passes were still far enough off, to prevent the travelers from having the benefit of any recent experience of either. Besides which, they well knew that a fall of snow might altogether change the described conditions in a single hour, even if they were correctly stated. But, on the whole, the Simplon appearing to be the hopefuller route, Vendale decided to take it. Obenreizer bore little or no part in the discussion, and scarcely spoke.

To Geneva, to Lausanne, along the level margin of the lake to Yevay, so into the winding valley between the spurs of the mountains, and into the valley of the Rhone. The sound of the carriage-wheels, as they rattled on, through the day, through the night, became as the wheels of a great clock recording the hours. No change of weather varied the journey, after it had hardened into a sullen frost. In a sombre-yellow sky, they saw the Alpine ranges; and they saw enough of snow on nearer and much lower hills tops and hillsides, to sully, by contrast, the purity of lake, torrent, and waterfall, and make the villages look discolored and dirty. But no snow fell, nor was there any snow-drift on the road. The stalking along the valley of more or less of white mist, changing on their hair and dress into icicles, was the only variety between them and the gloomy sky. And still by day, and still by night, the wheels. And still they rolled, in the hearing of one of them, to the burden, altered from the burden of the Rhine: "The time is gone for robbing him alive, and I must murder him."

They came, at length, to the poor little town of Brig, at the foot of the Simplon. They came there after dark, but yet could see how dwarfed men's works and men became with the immense mountains towering over them. Here they must lie for the night; and here was warmth of fire, and lamp, and dinner, and wine, and after-conference resounding, with guides and drivers. No human creature had come across the Pass for four days. The snow above the snow-line was too soft for wheeled carriage, and not hard enough for sledge. There was snow in the sky. There had been snow in the sky for days past, and the marvel was that it had not fallen, and the certainty was that it must fall. No vehicle could cross. The journey might be tried on mules, or it might be tried on foot; but the best guides must be paid danger-price in either case, and that, too, whether they succeeded in taking the two travelers across, or turned for safety and brought them back.

In this discussion, Obenreizer bore no part whatever. He sat silently smoking by the fire until the room was cleared and Vendale referred to him.

"Bah! I am weary of these poor devils and their trade," he said in reply. "Always the same story. It is the story of their trade to-day, as it was the story of their trade when I was a ragged boy. What do you and I want? We want a knapsack each, and a mountain-staff each. We want no guide; we should guide him; he would not guide us. We leave our portmanteaus here, and we cross together. We have been on the mountains together before now, and I am mountain-born, and I know this Pass—Pass!—rather High Road!—by heart. We will leave these poor devils, in pity, to trade with others; but they must not delay to make a pretense of earning money. Which is all they mean."

Vendale, glad to be quit of the dispute, and to cut the knot, active, adventurous, bent on getting forward, and, therefore, very susceptible to the last hint, readily assented. Within two hours they had purchased what they wanted for the expedition, had packed their knapsacks, and lay down to sleep.

At break of day they found half the town collected in the narrow street to see them depart. The people talked together in groups; the guides and drivers whispered apart, and looked up at the sky; no one wished them a good journey.

As they began the ascent a gleam of sun shone from the otherwise unaltered sky, and for a moment turned the tin spires of the town to silver.

"A good omen!" said Vendale (though it died out while he spoke). "Perhaps our example will open the Pass on this side."

"No; we shall not be followed," returned Obenreizer, looking up at the sky and back at the valley. "We shall be alone up yonder."

ON THE MOUNTAIN.

The road was fair enough for stout walkers, and the air grew lighter and easier to breathe as the two ascended. But the settled gloom remained as it had remained for days back. Nature seemed to have come to a pause. The sense of hearing, no less than the sense of sight, was troubled by having to wait so long for the change, whatever it might be, that impended. The silence was as palpable and heavy as the lowering clouds,—or rather cloud, for there seemed to be but one in all the sky, and that one covering the whole of it.

Although the light was thus dimly shrouded, the prospect was not obscured. Down in the valley of the Rhone behind them, the stream could be traced through all its many windings, oppressively sombre and solemn in its one leaden hue, a colorless waste. Far and high above them, glaciers and suspended avalanches overhung the spots where they must pass by and by; deep and dark below them on their right, were awful precipice and roaring torrent; tremendous mountains arose in every vista. The gigantic landscape, uncheered by a touch of changing light or a solitary ray of sun, was yet terribly distinct in its ferocity. The hearts of two lonely men might shrink a little, if they had to win their way for miles and hours among a legion of silent and motionless men,—mere men like themselves,—all looking at them with fixed and frowning front. But how much more, when the legion is of Nature's mightiest works, and the frown may turn to fury in an instant!

As they ascended the road became gradually more rugged and difficult. But the spirits of Vendale rose as they mounted higher, leaving so much more of the road behind them conquered. Obenreizer spoke little, and held on with a determined purpose. Both, in respect of agility and endurance, were well qualified for the expedition. Whatever the born mountaineer read in the weather-tokens, that was illegible to the other, he kept to himself.

"Shall we get across to-day?" asked Vendale.

"No," replied the other. "You see how much deeper the snow lies here than it lay half a league lower. The higher we mount, the deeper the snow will lie. Walking is half wading even now. And the days are so short! If we get as high as the fifth Refuge, and lie to-night at the Hospice, we shall do well."

"Is there no danger of the weather rising in the night," asked Vendale, anxiously, "and snowing us up?"

"There is danger enough about us," said Obenreizer, with a cautious glance onward and upward, "to render silence our best policy. You have heard of the Bridge of the Ganthier?"

"I have crossed it once."

"In the summer?"

"Yes; in the traveling season."

"Yes; but it is another thing at this season; with a sneer, as though he were out of temper. "This is not a time of year, or a state of things, on an Alpine Pass, that you gentlemen holiday-travelers know much about."

"You are my Guide," said Vendale, good-humoredly. "I trust to you."

"I am your Guide," said Obenreizer, "and I will guide you to your journey's end. There is the Bridge before us."

They had made a turn into a desolate and dismal ravine, where the snow lay deep below them, deep above them, deep on every side. While speaking, Obenreizer stood pointing at the bridge, and observing Vendale's face, with a very singular expression on his own.

"If I, as Guide, had sent you over there, in advance, and encouraged you to give a shout or two, you might have brought down upon yourself tons and tons and tons of snow, that would not only have struck you dead, but buried you deep at a blow."

"No doubt," said Vendale.

"No doubt. But that is not what I have to do, as Guide. So pass silently. Or, going as we go, our indiscretion might else crush and bury me. Let us go on!"

EXPOSITION UNIVERSELLE.

THE intelligence and judgment of the Imperial Commission in the matter of awards are clearly evinced in the following extract from The Exposition Universelle Illustrated ("publication authorized by the Imperial Commission").

"By their skill, universally recognized, Messrs. WHEELER & WILSON added to Howe's system of sewing machines important modifications, which have placed them in the front rank of manufacturers."

"The gold medal which has just been awarded them affirms, moreover, that none of the machines from the workshop of Howe or of his principal tributaries unite the qualities of simplicity and solidity of mechanism by which these machines are distinguished above all others."

"In their machine, remarkable for its form and elegance, they have substituted for the shuttle of Howe a small flat disk, which revolves vertically with unvarying swiftness. Hence this machine is the most simple of all, and, notwithstanding its great precision in operation, its price is not above that of the most imperfect systems."

"Elegance, perfection of work, simplicity, solidity of mechanism, and facility of management—such are the essential qualities united in the WHEELER & WILSON machine, constituting a superiority which the jury has, with unanimity, recognized and proclaimed."

"To these gentlemen the gold medal was awarded as manufacturers of machines; to Mr. ELIAS HOWE a similar medal was awarded as propagator. The distinction made by the jury explains itself."

"The original machine of THIMONNIER only needed to pass into the skillful hands of WHEELER & WILSON to receive the highest perfection. To-day, thanks to its cheapness, their machine is accessible to all. Its simplicity assures it not only a place in the chamber of the seamstress, but its elegant form wins its admittance into the most sumptuous parlor."—Evening Mail.

UNCOLORED JAPAN, 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.

GUNPOWDER, $1 25; best, $1 50 per lb.

Coffees roasted and ground daily.

Ground Coffee, 20 cents, 25 cents, 30 cents, 35 cents; best, 40 cents per pound.

Hotels, saloons, boarding-house keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our

FRENCH BREAKFAST AND DINNER COFFEE, which we sell at the low price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 50 cents to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St., (Post-Office Box 5643,) N. Y.

To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea Trade (previous to the establishment of the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,) we will start with the American Houses, leaving out of the account entirely the profits of the Chinese factors.

First. The American House in China or Japan makes large profits on their sales or shipments—and some of the richest retired merchants in this country have made their immense fortunes through their houses in China.

Second. The Banker makes large profits upon the foreign exchange used in the purchase of Teas.

Third. The Importer makes a profit of 30 to 50 per cent. in many cases.

Fourth. On its arrival here it is sold by the cargo, and the Purchaser sells it to the Speculator in invoices of 1000 to 2000 packages, at an average profit of about 10 per cent.

Fifth. The Speculator sells it to the Wholesale Tea Dealer in lines at a profit of 10 to 15 per cent.

Sixth. The Wholesale Tea Dealer sells it to the Wholesale Grocer in lots to suit his trade at a profit of about 10 per cent.

Seventh. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail Dealer at a profit of 15 to 25 per cent.

Eighth. The Retailer sells it to the Consumer for ALL THE PROFIT HE CAN GET.

When you have added to these EIGHT profits as many brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, and add the original cost of the Tea, it will be perceived what the consumer has to pay. And now we propose to show why we can sell so very much lower than small dealers.

We propose to do away with all these various profits and brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, with the exception of a small commission paid for purchasing to our correspondents in China and Japan, one cartage, and a small profit to ourselves—which, on our large sales, will amply pay us.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city. Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a Club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a Club say how much Tea or Coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price-List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete, send it to us by mail. We will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost—so that there need be no confusion in their distribution: each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the Club can divide equally among themselves.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford.

We send no complimentary package for clubs of less than thirty dollars.

COUNTRY CLUBS, Hand and Wagon Peddlers, and small stores (of which class we are supplying many thousands, all of which are doing well), can have their orders promptly and faithfully filled, and, in case of Clubs, can have each party's name marked on their package and directed, by sending their orders to Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey street.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than thirty dollars had better send post-office drafts, or money, with their orders, to save the expense of collecting by express; but larger orders we will send by express, to collect on delivery.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third by sending directly to

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.

Beware of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are

BOGUS OR IMITATIONS.

We have no branches, and do not in any case authorize the use of our name.

Post-Office Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.

THE GREAT
UNITED STATES TEA WAREHOUSE,
T. Y. KELLEY & CO.,
30 Vesey St., New York.

Are now supplying families throughout the country with TEAS warranted, in all cases, perfectly pure as imported, at cargo prices—thus saving to them five or six profits of middle-men, which average from 50 cents to $1 per pound. Clubs can be formed in any city or town, by any person, male or female; and to such as will take the trouble we will furnish Teas and Coffees, for their own use, free of charge, to the amount of five per cent. on each order they send us. On application, we send by mail circulars containing price list of all our Teas and Coffees, also club lists and terms to agents in detail.

We forward all goods (collect on delivery) by the Express Company, and members of the club can divide the express charges equally among themselves.

THE SKEIN.

SLIP, yes slip your skein, my Kitty,
O'er my hands, and wind, and wind,
All the while, with little pity,
Tangling, tangling, heart and mind:
Kitty! eyes upon the wool!
Not on me, my beautiful!

Now you droop your eyes completely,
Winding, winding, dreamily;
Wherefore, wherefore smile so sweetly
On a thing that can not see?
If you must smile, smile this way!
I will bear it as I may!

Ah! the rose bud fingers flitting
Swift about the color'd ball!
How my heart beats time, while sitting:
Still, I try to bear it all:
Kitty, do you know or care
'Tis my heart you're winding there?

Kitty, I am in a vision!
All the world to mist doth die;
Only, in an air Elysian,
Little fairy fingers fly:
Surely, if they flit too near,
I shall catch and kiss them, dear!

Tangled! pout not, frown not, Kitty!
Though I gladly bear the pain;
For your anger is so pretty,
It may make me sin again.
There! 'tis well! Now wind and wind,
Tangling further heart and mind!

Now, 'tis done! the last thread lingers
Sadly from me, slow to part;
Canst thou see that in my fingers
I am holding up my heart?
Wind and wind! I do not care!
Smile or frown! and I will bear!

Ah! so fast and quick you wind it,
I no more can keep it mine;
Do you wonder that you find it
Throbbing now, close, close to thine:
Tangled, tangled are the twain;
Kiss, kiss, kiss them free again!

"I was never wet through in my life, never further than my skin."

The man who earns his living by the sweat of his brow complains that it is hard times just now, when the thermometer is down toward zero.

"Here, I can't pass you," said the door-keeper of a theatre. "You needn't pass me," said the irrepressible dead-head whom he addressed; "just you stand where you are, I'll pass you." And he passed.

THE LOVE THAT ALWAYS LASTS—Self-love.

An Irishman was speaking of the excellence of a telescope. "Do you see that wee speck on the edge of the hill yonder? That, now, is my old pig, though hardly to be seen; but when I look at him with my glass, it bring him so near that I can plainly hear him grunt."

Ancient and modern Greece is known among classical students as whale-oil and petroleum.

HAIR-DRESSING IN 1867.

LADY. "My hair is not so thick as when you last cut it, I fancy."

HAIR-DRESSER. "Well, ma'am, I must say it is not so voluminous as it was; but, really, one can improvise it so well now that original material is not of much consequence!"

When does a man have to keep his word?—When no one will take it.

A bishop, who was fond of shooting, in one of his excursions met with a friend's gamekeeper, whom he sharply reproved for inattention to religious duties, exhorting him strenuously "to go to church and read his Bible." The keeper, in an angry mood, responded, "Why, I do read my Bible, Sir, but I don't find any mention of the apostles going a-shooting." "No, my good man, you are right," said the bishop; "the shooting was very bad in Palestine, so they went fishing instead."

THE GOBLIN GINGHAM.

Kind ladies and gentlemen, list to my woes,
Though I've hardly the strength left to sing 'em,
The cause of my griefs you would hardly suppose
Is a horrible old-fashioned gingham.
It's useless, I know, for it lets in the rain,
And the shabbiest beggar would scout it,
Although it's the cause of my sorrow and pain,
Yet I can't move a footstep without it.

I once had an aunt, very sad to relate,
And on her death-bed she addressed me,
She'd left all the others the jewels and plate,
But she gave me this gingham and blessed me.
She said it was worth all the wealth of a prince,
I was never to scout or abuse it,
I've been trying to find out its worth ever since,
Oh! will nobody help me to lose it?

I took it to pieces in hopes I might find
Either silver or gold 'praps within it;
But nothing was there, and my whole peace of mind
Is destroyed, and I can't sleep a minute.
I leave it at houses, it comes back next day,
And one day in the river I shied it—
A boy brought it back with a shilling to pay—
Oh, will nobody help me to hide it?

I once tied it up in a very nice case,
And persuaded a friend to accept it;
A week had elapsed—there was joy in my face,
For I fondly believed he had kept it;
Next morning a large case arrived from abroad,
It's a present, thought I, from some fellow!
There was carriage two pounds, which I couldn't afford—
Alas! 'twas that fatal umbrella!

I made a large bonfire beautifully bright,
With the gingham stuck up in the centre,
I locked all the doors when I left for the night,
And I ordered that no one should enter.
Next morning I fancied my woes at an end,
It's a long lane that hasn't a turning,
I raked up the ashes, and there was my friend,
Perhaps a little improved by the burning.

I'm cut by my friends, and my hair's turning gray,
And I feel that it can't last much longer—
Although I grow weaker and weaker each day,
Yet my hate for the gingham grows stronger.
I feel it won't leave me as long as I've breath,
And my woes to the grave I shall bring 'em,
I know I shall be even after my death
Still pursued by the ghost of a gingham.

DIFFERENT KINDS OF "FOLKS."

KIND FOLKS.—The man who makes you a present you do not want; the friend who gives you so much advice; the lady who insists that you have not made out your dinner; the old gentleman who is starving himself to lay up money for you; the shopkeeper who abates the price of the article just because it is you; and the mother who lets the dear children do as they please.

HAPPY FOLKS.—A child with a rattle; a small chap drumming on a tin pan; a school-boy on a holiday; two lovers walking by moonlight; a gent imbibing a sherry cobbler; a boy sucking new cider through a straw; and two country misses over an ice-cream.

GENTEEL FOLKS.—The young lady who lets her mother do the ironing for fear of spreading her hands; the miss who wears thin shoes on a rainy day; and the young gentleman who is ashamed to be seen walking with his father.

INDUSTRIOUS FOLKS.—The young lady who reads romances in bed; the friend who is always engaged when you call; and the correspondent who can not find time to answer your letters.

"I require," said a sage of the tribe of Penobscot, "but three things to make me happy."
"What is the first?" inquired a searcher of wisdom.
"Tobacco," was the reply.
"What is the second?"
"Ram."
"Well, what is the third?"
"Why," said the philosopher, contemplatively, "a little more rum."

GOOD ADVICE.

For sea-sickness, stay at home.
For drunkenness, drink cold water.
For health, rise early.
For accidents, keep out of danger.
To keep out of jail, pay your debts.
To be happy, be honest.
To please all, mind your own business.

A little girl, showing her little cousin, about four years old, a star in the firmament one clear night, said: "That star you see up there is bigger than this world." "No, it ain't," said he. "Yes, it is." "Then why don't it keep the rain off!"

In Chicago, recently, much amusement was created by a certain deacon announcing in the most grave and solemn tone that the ground of the cemetery was in such a bad condition that no person who could help it would be buried in it.

NEW-YEAR'S DAY IN OLDEN TIMES.

THE festival of the New Year is old-fashioned enough, since we learn from a dictionary of antiquities that it was instituted by Numa Pompilius, and dedicated to the Latin god Janus, about seven centuries before the Christian era. The agreeable and social custom of dancing is probably of still more ancient date.

We have not the least occasion, however, to go further back than about a hundred and fifty years for the interesting exhibition of gallantry and full-dress display among the fine ladies and gentlemen at a fashionable assembly on New-Year's Eve, which is delineated by our artist in the accompanying illustration of an old-fashioned New-Year dance.

The end of Queen Anne's reign—the age of the Tutlers, Guardians, and Spectators; when Sir Plume and Sir Fopling Flutter ogled the fair Lady Betty or Lady Arabella of the party, as they approached each other, with all the airs and graces of conventional courtesy, to join in the stately minuet or the newly-imported French contre-danse—is the period to which the scene must be referred. Sir Plume is conspicuously present, exactly as Pope describes him in "The Rape of the Lock:"

"Sir Plume, of amber snuff-box justly vain,
And the nice conduct of a clouded cane."

His periwig, so remarkable for its long, drooping curls, his brooch, his lace frill, and those exuberant lace ruffles, his richly-embroidered waistcoat and the spreading skirts of his splendid coat, his high-heeled shoes with enormous silver buckles, his sword behind his left thigh, and cocked-hat under his left arm, make up the outward costume of the fine gentleman at the beginning of the last century; but the exquisite silliness of his face belongs to no generation, and may perhaps find its match in some of the reunions of frivolous gaiety which belong to our own age. As for the lady to whom he directs his languishing addresses, though she also is condemned by fashion to such a quantity of costly attire, such flowers and furbelows, such frills and stomachers, and, above all, such a preposterous plumed and powdered head-dress, we find in her countenance, despite the useless patch of sticking-plaster, an expression of modesty, good-humor, and good sense, with a satirical glance of the eye and turn of the lip, from which tokens it may be hoped that she will not listen to the foolish coxcomb, but, dismissing him at the end of the dance, will accept the services of that grave, elderly beau in the back-ground, who may be trusted to lead her to her carriage, and so quit the festive scene at a reasonable hour.

These belles and beaux would probably have wondered at the New York custom which shuts the ladies within doors on New-Year's Day, and sends the gentlemen abroad to call on all their friends and acquaintances. The custom is peculiar to New York city, and had its rise among our Dutch ancestors; though imitated to some extent in other parts of the country, it is only in the great metropolis that it flourishes in full vigor; and the same thing is true to some extent of Christmas. In New England, for instance, there is no general observance of these holidays, which pass by there almost unnoticed, Thanksgiving being the great festival of that section. But the New-Year's calls keep alive many pleasant acquaintances and friendly feelings that would otherwise die of neglect; and we hope that the day is far distant when we shall lose this relic of New Amsterdam.

THE DOLLS' DRESS-MAKER.

OUR artist has given us a charming illustration, on page 165, of Miss Jenny Wren, the dolls' dress-maker, whose story our friend Charles Dickens has so beautifully told us, surrounded with her Lilliputian customers—some already dressed, and others awaiting their turn. In this great assembly some of our young friends will doubtless recognize the gifts of Santa Claus, who is usually liberal in his distribution of dolls at Christmas time. Besides, these are real flesh and blood dolls, so to speak; not being mere fictions of the imagination, but drawn from bona-fide models, kindly furnished for the purpose by Messrs. Althof, Bergmann, & Co., Maiden Lane.

DANGERS AND FEARS.

HALF the miseries of mortal life consist in anticipating the other half. The apprehension of a future ill, though it be unfounded, destroys the pleasure of the present. To a certain extent this is desirable; because the reasonable fear of evil is necessary for the regulation of our conduct. Prudence is founded upon fear. But all beyond what is thus necessary is a mere surplus of suffering. Anticipations arising from ignorance, or cherished after they have served their function of modifying our actions, are not wholesome.

Many persons, however, are constantly disturbed by such forebodings. There are those who suffer no end of troubles, which never had and never can have a beginning, and who suffer veritable evils more in anticipation than in their realization. In the mental machinery of many individuals this one "bearing" causes more friction than all the rest. We should like to put a drop of oil upon this heated bearing.

It is true that one can not reason to much effect with fear when it is aroused; but it may predispose the mind to more judicious fear, to philosophize a little about it when it is not aroused.

Many objects of fear are rendered more appalling than they should be, by our ignorance of them.

The terrors caused by a thunder-shower afford a good illustration of this. Many persons suffer serious solicitude on account of these storms, to a degree quite disproportioned to that which they feel respecting much more serious dangers. It is shown by the census that deaths from lightning in the United States are scarcely one-seventh as many as those caused by falls. The cellar stairs, the step-ladder, the fruit-tree, the bench on which one climbs to adjust the curtains or to put away the sweetmeats, the swing, and the saddle—these and other familiar objects are, in one sense, more dangerous than some which are much dreaded. To compare it with another class of dangers, there are more than forty times as many women killed by burns and scalds as by lightning. That is to say, that thunder-storms, if they came every day in the year, would not probably cause more suffering than that which now results from the kitchen-fire, and the tea-kettle, the box of matches, the muslin dress, and crinoline skirt, the petroleum lamp, the India crackers, and the clothes boiler. Accidental poisoning, again, causes the death of more than six times as many women as does lightning. Those two or three bottles and papers of powders, carefully put away on the high shelf in the pantry, should not disturb one's peace of mind; still less should the less fatal dangers of the thunder-bolt. The function of fear is to lead us to take reasonable precautions against exposure. Those who cherish it, after this has been done, prolong gratuitous suffering; and the sublimity, the moral suggestions of the awe-inspiring storm, seem to be lost on those whom it thus fills with a physical terror.

To take another instance: A lady is invited by her husband to take a tour in Europe. She would be delighted to visit those scenes of which she has so often read; but she dreads the dangers of the voyage so much that she can not make up her mind to go; or, if she decides to go, the feeling of danger deprives her of all pleasure on the voyage. She feels as if they were safe at home, and that the voyage would render their existence precarious. But, in fact, it is known with the same certainty as any other generalization relating to human life, that a voyage across the Atlantic, and a sojourn in Western Europe, such as American travelers usually make, does not diminish, but increases the chances of life. There are peculiar perils attendant upon it, and it is the novelty of these which is the reason of her fears; but, taking them fully into the account, the probable duration of life is increased, not by staying at home, but by braving the voyage. Not long since, a gentleman whose life was insured, being about to visit France, called at the office of the Company whose policy he held, to inform them that he was going to incur the unusual risk of crossing the ocean, and was ready to pay an additional premium if necessary to keep his insurance good. The secretary laughed, and replied that none was necessary; and that if there were any difference it would be more proper for the Company to pay him something for going, as it rather increased than diminished his expectation of life.

Fear contains two elements, necessarily combined, but not to be confounded, in forming a judicious estimate of danger. The one depends upon the gravity of the evil contemplated; the other upon the likelihood that it will happen. The evil may be very great, and the chance of its happening very small. On the other hand, the evil may be very small, yet the probability that it will happen very large.

While the timid mind is perturbed by the contemplation of any grave evil, without much reference to the question of probability, it is the mark of an inconsiderate mind to be affected chiefly by a great degree of probability, without much regard to the gravity or insignificance of the evil. In view of approaching rain many will run vigorously for shelter on account of the great probability of spoiling a new bonnet ribbon who, when comfortably seated at home by the cool, open window, would not be induced to change their seat on account of the possibility that the draft of air might cause a cold and a fatal illness.

It is the graver evils of life against which we need to take the most careful precautions, even though they are much less likely to happen than more trifling evils. Men insure against great losses which are not very likely to happen, while they wisely bear, each for himself, the risk of minor evils of a nature to happen every day.

The prudent regard, first, the gravity of the evil. The rash are affected only where the probability is great and apparent. The timid exaggerate the degree of probability, and borrow trouble by continuing to fear after they have taken the proper precautions.

The old proverb, that "Every one has his taste," has been applied to the matter of fears; and some persons do seem to take a sort of gratification in cherishing favorite anxieties. But it is more important to observe that people do not generally understand each other's fears, and are not considerate of the suffering caused by fears which they do not appreciate.

The bachelor laughs at the maiden lady, who is said to look into the closets and under the bed every night before she retires to rest to see that no man is concealed there. In his heroic self-confidence that he could toss any such fellow out of the window he is quite incapacitated to appreciate the serious aspect of the plight of a timid woman face to face with the intruder.

The servant-girl down stairs laughs at her mistress's fears, which forbid such nice young men from resorting every night unnoticed to the kitchen fire-side; for the simple-minded girl does not know how often a thief gains an entrance to the plate-closet by making a passage through the heart of Bridget.

The mistress, in turn, can not help being amused at the fears and forebodings with which Bridget is immediately cast down when she feels a pain in her head or her side. The mistress fails to appreciate the fact that the average continuance of the life of those who immigrate to our shores, as Bridget has, is but about five years; and that with so great a risk of death hanging over her, in a strange climate, and three thousand miles from the old home, a little pain is a serious premonition.

To be more reasonable in our own fears, and more considerate of the apparently unreasonable fears of others, would add much to the happiness of daily life. One who is in fear, even though it be foolish, needs sympathy as really as one who is in trouble. Troubles are sometimes cured by laughing; but fears are not—the sufferer is only forced to conceal them.

A CUP OF CHOCOLATE.

LINNEUS, the great botanist, appreciated so highly the good qualities of chocolate that he gave it the name of theobroma—food for gods. Its agreeable taste, and its gently stimulating and nutritious properties have been long proved by experience, and modern chemistry has shown that it is composed of just the constituents, and in such proportion as to make it a food, if not for celestial beings, the best adapted to the wants of man. Its composition has a remarkable similarity to that of milk, all of whose nutritious elements it possesses. It has moreover an aromatic oil which gives it a peculiar and agreeable flavor, and a principle called theobromine, which has the same remarkable property as the theine of tea and caffeine of coffee—of checking the waste of, and thus not only indirectly nourishing, but refreshing the body.

Chocolate is both food and drink. It contains the nutritious properties of bread, and the exhilarating qualities of tea and coffee. There probably is no single substance known which could exclusively support human life so long as chocolate.

The cocoa bean, which is the product of a small tree known to botanists as the Theobroma Cacao, a native of Mexico, and of Central and Southern America, is neither a very palatable nor wholesome food until prepared by art. It possesses a bitterness in its natural state, and such a large proportion of oil that both the taste and stomach are apt to reject it. Deprived, however, of its husk and roasted, or mixed into a paste with flour or starch, sugar, and flavored with vanilla or spice, it is exceedingly palatable and wholesome. When used in the former state it is known as cocoa, and in the latter as chocolate, under which name (Chocolati) Cortéz and his followers found it a universal beverage in Mexico, where it had been so long in use that its origin was forgotten.

The consumption of chocolate is by no means so general as its fitness to the uses of mankind, proved both by experience and science. While there are 2240 millions of pounds of tea, and 600 millions of pounds of coffee, there are but 100 millions of cocoa consumed in the world. In the countries of which it is a product it is almost the exclusive beverage, and is besides largely drunk in France, Spain, and Italy. In our country it is unfortunately so very expensive that its use is confined almost exclusively to the wealthy, among whom, commended by its cost, it takes its place as a fashionable refreshment.

Though cocoa, or the bean roasted and ground, is prepared for drinking by infusing it with boiling water, like tea and coffee, the paste or chocolate is made very much as a soup, and is consumed in its totality of fluid and substance. Chocolate is often complained of, by those of delicate stomach, as being too rich. This over-richness ordinarily arises from the mistake of making it with milk instead of water. The practice so universal in French, Spanish, and Italian coffee-houses, of serving a glass of cold water with the cup of chocolate, is a good one; as an occasional sip of the former greatly qualifies the richness and oiliness of the latter.

Such are the nutritious and other wholesome qualities of chocolate, that it offers one of the best articles of diet when convenience or necessity requires that the food should be taken in a concentrated form. In traveling, a small supply of the ordinary chocolate cakes, sold in the confectioners' shops, will satisfy the appetite and sustain the vigor of the body during a long journey. We would recommend every traveler by our railways to store away in his pocket a paper of chocolate bombs, and forego—no difficult matter, we should suppose—the headlong rush to the troughs of the way-side piggeries, miscalled refreshment-rooms, and thus escape the dangerous embrace of the demon of dyspepsia, which hovers over them.

Those, moreover, whose business compels them to lengthen inordinately the interval of time between breakfast and dinner, would be wise to substitute for the precipitate guzzling at a slushy bar of the conglomerate mess of oysters, pies, beer, and cocktails, which compose the daily lunch, half a dozen of plain chocolate drops. These will satisfy hunger and sustain the vigor without any risk of disordering the stomach and unfitting it for its wholesome service at the coming family dinner.

"PLAIN GIRLS."

A WRITER in the Saturday Review expresses his solicitude for the "Plain Girls" who are in a fair way to be defrauded of a woman's dearest earthly hope—the hope of marriage. No doubt the tendency of modern society is to regard marriage as "the great end and justification of a woman's life." But certainly this tendency includes an increase of chances for the plain girls, and will naturally prompt them to cultivate such substantial habits and such agreeable manners as will make them attractive, despite of plainness, for married life. Beauty and accomplishments are very essential to heroines in novels—"Jane Eyre" and that school of novelists to the contrary notwithstanding; but what we need and enjoy in fiction is not always identical with what we need and enjoy in actual existence. The truly ideal and the truly real are indeed finally one, but meanwhile they are not one, so that the same sort of heroine that charms our imaginative sentiments, and awakens to a semi-state of ecstasy our admiration and its attendant emotions, would have much less charm for our eyes, and still less for our hearts, if seen through the calmer atmosphere of common life.

But, after all, have the plain girls as such any thing to fear? Happily for them, and yet more happily for the other sex, the instinct of marriage is not rigidly conditioned by the accidents of beauty and a high style of fascinations. Undoubtedly it would be if the imagination and its class of feelings had the control. But nature, with its kind foresight, has located this instinct elsewhere than in the imagination—has put it with all sensible people in the heart—and has determined it to stay there, no matter how tastes and artificial usages may undertake to remove it to other ground. Domestic sentiment—the craving of the soul after this companionship—the profound feeling that life is incomplete in its absence—will always have much more to do with marriage than any mere impression of graceful charms. Plain girls, then, are not necessarily at a disadvantage. The race of plain men is not yet extinct—probably never will be—and while this race lasts the plain girls may thank Heaven and take courage. Up to this date they have held their own "co-ordinate sovereignty" pretty well, and, in some respects, have gained on their more elegant and witching rivals. The fact is, that "Plain Girls" are commanding a premium in the market—a very bad figure this, but merely used to give pungency to the truth that your most fashionable women are not marrying in any thing like the same ratio as the "Plain Girls."

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Letter to a Young Housekeeper.

MY DEAR CHARLOTTE—I wish you a merry Christmas and a happy New-Year; and, as I know how perplexed you are in beginning your household cares, I am going to give you some advice, which I hope may serve to fulfill my hearty good wishes. You must not laugh that an old bachelor presumes to advise a young housekeeper. An old bachelor is not necessarily a crusty and crotchety fog. He is not necessarily impracticably wedded to his own fancies and theories. Far from it, my dear, and although I say it, some of the most childlike of men have been old bachelors. Was there ever a more kindly author, a more genial man, of fresher impulses and sweeter sympathies, than Washington Irving? Yet you remember that he was an old bachelor. He had an early attachment, you tell me, and did not choose celibacy. My dear Charlotte, he was but an example of thousands and thousands of men. The old bachelor, at whom the young lovers look so compassionately when they see him at Dickens's readings, for instance, and whom they pity so deeply when the magical tone summons the images of love and happiness, knows more about it than they. He has loved and lost, and the inarticulate music in his heart, if it came to words, would repeat those of the poet:

"'Tis better to have 'loved and lost,
Than never to have loved at all."

Is it the Christmas season, I wonder, that makes me say so? However that may be, you will see that it is the very tenderness and constancy of feeling that so often makes a man a bachelor. Don't ask me any questions, I pray you. But answer me one. Don't you feel sure that if you had died before you were orange-flowers Charles would always have remained unmarried? So you see your own best-beloved was a possible bachelor, and he would have been the same Charles, but infinitely softened. Let that thought dispose you kindly toward the sad fraternity, dear Charlotte, for sad it is whatever we may say of our freedom. The young people joke with me at this happy season, and pity me for being old and beyond hope. Dear young people, I, too, was born in Arcady. I was once young, and it is nothing but hope, and youth, and faith, that have made me an old bachelor.

Bless my heart! I am an old bachelor, or I should not so garrulously glide away from my subject and purpose. I have undertaken to give you some advice as to your manners as you set out upon the matrimonial journey. Housekeeping is hard to you, and it seems as if the experience of all the elders promised you nothing but hardness for the rest of the journey. Servants are so ignorant, and intractable, and wearing, you say. And, really, you don't know what it is coming to! And you are very sure, before he opens his lips, that an Old Bachelor is the very last person in the world who can be of any service to you! And it is all very well for men, who never go into the kitchen, to advise about its management! And, in fact, the kitchen department is a horrible discipline, and will so remain until the system of hired service is abolished, and husbands, wives, and children, do the work of their own households.

Now, my dear Charlotte, I do not propose to write you a chapter of recipes, nor tell you how to get more pungent sauces and richer flavors out of your kitchen. That would be the subject of M. Blot's letters, should he become your correspondent. But is it not possible to find a way by which you can get more good temper, and greater alacrity, and a more kindly feeling out of the kitchen? and, every thing considered, is that not worth while? I know—nobody better—how good a good gravy is, for instance; but do you know, Charlotte, I had rather pour indifferent gravy over my meat, with good humor in Biddy's heart and face, than a very lickensome sauce with peevishness? I live in quiet bachelor quarters, you know, with nobody but Peggy to wait upon me; but very much of my pleasure in my pleasant lodgings would be gone if I did not know that Peggy felt a kind interest in me, and an interest not wholly dependent upon her very moderate wages.

My advice to you is short and simple. It is merely, oil to the hinges. My Christmas gift to you, if you will only choose to have it, is a flask of oil—sweet, golden oil. This is the chrism which I would pour upon your household at this holy tide. And the good Pastor Bräm shall ascend the pulpit and preach us a short Christmas story. The Pastor Bräm is the head of one of the German charitable homes for poor children, and he says that one of his friends—we will call him Karl—was complaining to another—let us call him Hans—that nothing went well in his house; that all was at sixes and sevens; and the sole reason was the misconduct of the servants. They were cross, and wasteful, and vexatious in every way; in one word, there was Beelzebub to pay in his kitchen. Karl told his piteous tale, and when he had ended Hans replied that he had formerly had the same experience. Every thing went wretchedly among his workmen, and he was ready to surrender, when, one day, he said, I remembered the foolish fellow who tried to tread upon the shadow of his own head, and I turned directly about. I became patient, and gentle, and courteous. When the men did well I praised freely. When they did ill I kept my temper, and showed them how to do what I wanted. It was like sunshine after a long storm. Gradually we came to the best understanding, and every thing goes smoothly—because I am smooth. "So Hans said to me," said Karl, "and from that time I have always kept a bottle of his oil on hand, and my machinery now runs as well as his."

I say to you, therefore, dear Charlotte, oil the hinges. Remember that the machinery will not run of itself, will not take care of itself. You have undertaken to be manager, and you must do a manager's duties. That is what you young married women forget. There, for instance, is your little friend Jenny Wren. When she married Robin Redbreast she thought, because she was to have plenty of money to spend, that she had nothing to do but to sit in a sumptuous drawing-room, wear superb silks, drive in a canary-paneled carriage, and go to endless dinners and balls. What was the result? Old Ned in the kitchen. And why? Because if her servants had been ants and flies she could not have treated them with more lofty and inhuman disdain. She trod upon them as upon the carpets over which she stepped. To the serene, high mightiness of dear little ridiculous Jenny Wren they were conveniences, like a bell, or a clock, or a door-knob. And she made them feel that she so regarded them. Well, now, my dearest Charlotte, nobody likes to be considered a door-knob, nor to be treated like a bell-pull. Charles may pay a human being fifty dollars a day to black his boots; but if he makes the blacker feel that there is no relation whatever between him and Charles, except that of his service and payment with an absolute haughty unconsciousness of his existence upon the part of Charles, his feeling for your dear husband will not be what you would approve.

First of all, remember that a man's a man for a' that. The most piercing cry in familiar literature is that in Hood's "Bridge of Sighs:"

"Oh, it was pitiful!
Near a whole city full,
Friend she had none."

And how often I think of it when I see the manner and hear the tone and perceive the principle of domestic management in the houses of you dear young married people. They are not pariahs, as you seem to suppose, the people whom we pay to help take care of our houses. They are human beings like the rest of us, and to-morrow how many of them will be wearing silks and sitting in carriages! My rule when I was a newly-married man and a young blushing papa, said my late worthy friend the Reverend Doctor Blunt, was to treat all the servants in my kitchen as if they were the grand-parents of my unborn grand-children's unborn husbands and wives.

My dear Charlotte, you need not trouble yourself to say that if you give an inch in your kitchen an ell will be taken, and that nothing ruins "such people" so surely as familiarity. Courtesy and kindness and human sympathy never ruined any body, and never harmed a soul. The kindest and gentlest people I have ever known were the firmest and the most respected. The employers who got the most work and the most willingly were those who felt, and who showed that they felt, a real interest in their workmen. Do you think that Scrooge was any less willingly served by Bob Cratchit after he saw Marley's ghost than before? Yet Marley's ghost was but a flask of oil—of the sweet golden oil of kindness and sympathy.

The details, dear Charlotte, I leave to your own good sense. To be forever suspicious, fretful, severe; to suppose that your kitchen is an enemy's camp and to behave accordingly, is merely to make the parlor the frontier of a hostile country. It is also to teach your children that service is dishonorable. And if service in the kitchen then service every where. If you will take that view Charles is as much a servant as your Biddy. He is clerk in a great dry-goods house I know, and you need not toss your head. But he must observe hours, and obey rules, and submit to inspection, and do his duty faithfully or be discharged; and he is paid wages for his work. But would he rather have the Brothers Cheeryble or Pecksniff for his employer? And now put it to yourself, dear Charlotte, had you rather be a Mrs. Cheeryble or a Mrs. Pecksniff to your kitchen?

This is the season when it is pleasant to think of these things, for it is the festival of Him who was servant of all. If you are where you hear the Christmas bells ringing, you can easily fancy them singing the sweet old refrain, Peace on earth, good will, good will. You and I, Charlotte, can begin to melt that music into our lives, by the way in which we treat every body around us—by our constant, daily, hourly manners upon the great highway. Of course you will be very sweet to the high and mighty Mrs. Jenny Wren. But if you will be as thoughtful and patient with your Mrs. Biddy, and if I am so with my Mrs. Peggy, why then, my dear girl, you and I will have a merry Christmas all the year round.

You may show this to Charles with the compliments of the season from your devoted friend,
AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

A NEW-YEAR'S reception dress, prepared by one of our most tasteful modistes, is of gros grain of the delicate shade known as pistache. The long, full-trained skirt is plain about the hips and front, but is gathered at the back in several rows of French gathers. The front width is cut off at the knee and finished by a wide flounce set on in box pleats. Large velvet leaves, embroidered with floss, and shaded from a dark green to the lightest shade, form a heading to the flounce. Similar leaves, alternating with others of gros grain, bound with white satin, are arranged around the skirt about ten inches from the edge. The long sash-ends are ornamented with three leaves, at the points of which are acorn pendants of green and white. There are two waists to this dress—a plain high corsage with flowing sleeves, and a low round waist with bertha of folds and short puffed sleeves.

WHITE SATIN AND CHAMBERY.

A very elaborate dress is of white satin gaze de Chambery. The trained satin skirt has a flounce on the front width like the one just described. This flounce is of striped Chambery gauze. The heading of the flounce is formed of bows of white marabout feathers tipped with green. Gauze leaves, with a solid white satin stripe in the centre of each, are bound with green satin, and arranged en tablier down the front and around the edge of the skirt. Over all this is a striped gauze tunic trimmed with white and green marabouts, and looped at the side by marabout bows. The low-necked corsage has three square tabs behind and before, and is fastened in front by buttons of green and gilt. Short sleeves almost concealed by a bertha made of green satin folds and gilt braid. Marabout bow in front and on each shoulder.

TOILETTE FOR A MATRON.

An appropriate toilette for a married lady receiving New-Year's calls has just been completed. It is of Lyons velvet, of a rich maroon color. The front widths of the skirt are left open, disclosing a white satin under-skirt. Two wide ruffles of point appliqué lace are sewn on the front width of the petticoat. A thick satin cord surrounds the velvet skirt. The corsage is round at the waist and short on the shoulder. A revers or surplice collar leaves the throat bare. The revers is faced with white satin, and edged with maroon-piping and appliqué lace. Chemisette of tulle, and under-sleeves puffed from wrist to arm-hole. Long flowing sleeves lined with white.

DRESS FOR A YOUNGER LADY.

A very appropriate and far more simple toilette for a young lady is of white French poplin, gracefully made and trimmed. It is gored in the Princess style. The skirt measures two and a half yards from belt to edge of train. The front width is cut entire and plain. A Spanish flounce, beginning at the front seams half a yard wide, becomes gradually narrower toward the back. Three rows of blue satin pipings an inch thick are sewn above the flounce. A finger-length above these are three other rows, to which are added a netted fringe with blue crocheted pendants. High corsage and coat sleeves. Blue satin pipings arranged about the shoulders with a bertha of fringe. Similar trimming on the sleeves and sash. Large buttons of blue satin with a pearl rim. Point lace collar and under-sleeves. Jewelry of turquoise and pearl.

BRIDAL DRESS.

A bridal dress just finished is of heavy white Antwerp silk with high corsage, coat sleeves, and full train. At the edge of the skirt is a white satin rouleau of plaited piping. Bars of the rouleau are placed horizontally down the front width from the throat to the hem. At each end of the bars are rosettes of point appliqué lace. Similar bars are sewn on the outer seam of the sleeve from arm-hole to wrist. A broad sash of satin, bordered with a rouleau and flounced at the pointed ends with wide lace, falls from the belt at the side and almost in front. This completes a simple and most effective trimming. The veil is of tulle, very full and long. Wreath of frosted wax orange flowers, with long sprays at the side.

The bridesmaids' dresses were of white silk, with over-skirts of tulle. Diagonal puffs were arranged about the upper skirt, and dotted with small flowers. Each lady wore a sash and flowers of different color. The first bridesmaid wore a pink sash and coiffure of pink verbenas. Clusters of the same flower were on the puffs of the skirt; the second wore blue bells in her hair and blue sash; third, yellow primroses and sash to match; fourth, pea-green sash with transparent leaves for a head-dress.

MARIGOLD BROCADE.

A very rich silk of the new marigold shade, like cloth of gold, is brocaded in medallions with black. This is a robed dress, the medallions becoming gradually smaller toward the waist, falling in with the gored seams. But little trimming can be used with effect on brocades. Rows of narrow Chantilly lace with satin piping heading are on the cuffs, as epaulets, and about the neck. Buttons of black onyx set in Etruscan gold. Barbes of Chantilly with gilt tipped marabouts form the coiffure.

Another elegant costume for a brunette is of capucine gros grain—capucine is a darker orange than marigold. Plain low corsage, round at the belt and square in the neck both front and back. Puffs of guipure fill out the square. Short Spanish sleeve of guipure, and fichu of the same tied loosely at the left side. The front width is plain; all the others are scalloped and bound with black satin. The scallop extends around the front seams up to the waist. Inside the scallop is an appliqué vine of black velvet leaves embroidered with gilt.

BLUE HOLLAND SATIN.

A pretty dress for a blonde has just been made of Marie Louise blue Holland satin. This beautiful goods has the lustre of satin, but is as soft and flowing as the thinnest muslin. The waist is cut Pompadour and worn with a chemisette of illusion and white thread lace. Puffed illusion sleeves are worn under long, wing-like sleeves of the material of the dress. The trimming consists of a wide band of white satin with inserted points on either side, a white crocheted button at each point. Bayadere ceinture with blue satin rings studded with pearls and edged with lace.

Still another reception dress is of black silk with gilt brocaded stripe. Small bouquets of rose-buds on the black stripe. Trimming of Maltese lace with black satin folds and gilt braid.

VISITING SUITS.

Two very rich carriage suits, made by one of our leading modistes, are in good taste throughout. The first, of steel-colored corded silk, has a long skirt encircled by two bands of plush of the same shade. At the lower edge of the band are inserted points of the silk. The plain waist is untrimmed. Coat sleeves around which are four bands of plush at wide intervals, the lowest forming the wrist trimming, the upper an epaulet. A plush Polonaise is worn as wrapping. This is a long, loose sacque worn with a belt and sash. Wings simulating half sleeves are trimmed with inserted points of silk. The sash is silk bound with plush and fringed at the ends. A wide fringe surrounds the Polonaise and forms epaulets on the sleeves. Fanchon bonnet of the silk bound with plush.

Another more elaborate suit has two skirts. The material is maroon gros grain. The long train is left perfectly plain. A trimming of maroon satin, cut in castellated points at both edges, surrounds the upper skirt. This band is a quarter of a yard wide; in the centre is a black lace insertion, on which is a gilt Grecian band. Acorns of maroon and gilt are pendent from the points. The upper skirt is looped in two places on each side by a rosette formed of satin leaves. A loose paletot, worn with this dress, is cut square at the edge in the back and front, and trimmed with satin points and acorns. Buttons of maroon with gilt bands. Open sleeves. The whole garment is lined with white silk.

SWAN'S-DOWN OPERA CLOAKS.

Some Opera cloaks just imported are made of swan's-down. They are as warm as ermine, and hang more gracefully, as they have not the stiff skin of the animal beneath them, and are far more light and fleecy in appearance. Tufts of the down are sewn on muslin so closely together that it has the appearance of a woven fabric. They are circular-shaped, and ornamented with insertions of the down dyed a Bismarck color, arranged in diamonds and in vines. Lining of cherry-colored silk, wadded and quilted. White silk cord, with camel's-hair tassels. The prices vary from $150 to $200.

SKATING COSTUMES.

Toilettes Russe, or fur-trimmed costumes in imitation of the Russians, are fashionable for skating-suits. A pretty one of Bismarck ottoman-reps has a plain skirt reaching to the ankle. A loose redingote, falling below the knee, is lapped diagonally from throat to hem. Coat sleeves and belt with long sash. A two-inch border of mink fur, a lighter brown than the dress, surrounds the redingote and the edge of the skirt. Brown velvet toquet with band of fur. Brown cloth boots bordered with mink at the ankle, and gloves of undressed kid with fur wristlets.

Another fur-trimmed suit is of maroon velours. A high, round corsage and gored skirt just escaping the ground. Plain waist. Tight sleeves and skirt bordered by a wide band of seal-skin, dyed maroon. There is a belt of seal-skin, to which is attached a mouchoir bag of the same material. A jaunty, short basque of the fur is sufficiently tight-fitting to display the figure. Seal-skin toquet with a short, ostrich tuft on the side and brown lace veil merely covering the face. Black boots with seal-skin gaiters reaching to the knee. No crinoline. Gloves with back and gauntlet of seal.

Very gay colors in contrast with dark shades are chosen for skating-dresses. Gray with scarlet or blue is popular. Bright plaid poplins with plush jackets are pretty, but should be worn only by experienced skaters, who are not liable to accidents, as they are easily soiled. Cloth is the most fashionable material for these suits. Embroidery is sometimes used for trimming them, but is not so appropriate as fur or bands of plain velvet or plush. Heavy corded fringes are also used. Blue and green cloths are handsomely and inexpensively trimmed with bands of gray plush imitating chinchilla fur. Hats of the plush with aigrette of feathers.

PERSONAL.

DOUBTLESS our lady-readers will thank us for a "personal" of Mrs. DISRAELI, wife of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. In dedicating to her one of his later works he speaks of her as the "severest of critics and the best of wives." When the Chancellor was young he was a dandy, and went much with D'ORSEY and the ruling dandies of the day. The paternal DISRAELI kept him on short commons, which was a bore, so he went in for a rich wife. The lady whom he married was the widow of a member of Parliament. She was rich, but her wealth was so secured to herself that it was difficult to make it available for benefiting him; but extreme economy did much, and the legacy of £40,000 by an opulent Jewess enabled him to pay off all mortgages and stand clear. The splendid London residence, Grosvenor Gate, he loses at his wife's decease, but he retains his country seat, and even should he lose his official income of £5000 a year he will be entitled to the retiring pension of £2000. The affection between this singular man and his wife has been unaffected. The dangerous illness by which she was attacked was contracted by her desire to see him kindly received at Edinburgh, and this was stronger than her apprehension of the dangers of the journey. It is an interesting fact that at the worst moment of his fortunes DISRAELI would never listen to the idea of insuring his life. This step was often pressed upon him by his advisers, but he detested the notion, and became angry when it was mentioned.

DANA, the poet, now in his eighty-first year, is a regular attendant at the Church of the Advent, Boston (Rev. Dr. BOLLES's) where the Communion Service is held every Sunday. The venerable poet is not able to sit through the whole service, and therefore usually comes in at sermon-time, and remains until after the Communion Office.

The managing editor of the London Times, Mr. DELANE, the President of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, Mr. ALLAN McLANE, and the President of the United States each receive a salary of $25,000 a year; but the latter has his house-rent, coal, gas, and gardener free, while most of his servants, though purporting to be and receiving salaries as clerks in some of the Departments, are appointed with the understanding that they are to do menial duty at the White House. That is the way in which it is managed.

Some gentleman with a taste for figures and editors has ferreted out the incomes of a few New York newspaper men, and ciphers them up as follows: Horace Greeley, $87,000; Henry J. Raymond, $45,000; Erastus Brooks, $26,000; William C. Bryant, $81,000; Charles Nordhoff, $6100; Thurlow Weed, $62,000; Robert Bonner, $200,000; Frank Leslie, $91,000; John R. Young, $23,700; William Swinton, $18,000; Moses Beach, $71,000; William C. Prime, $32,000; James Gordon Bennett, $292,000; James Gordon Bennett, Jun., $7500; John D. Stockton, $18,000; G. W. Smalley, $5000; Theodore Tilton, $11,000; Kane O'Donnell, $9400; James McConnell, $6400; Benjamin Wood, $186,000; F. J. Ottarson, $19,000; Frank Belieu, $2800; Charles G. Halpine, $61,000; Manton Marble, $10,000; Charles A. Dana, $72,000.

Bishop QUINTARD, of Tennessee, proposes to remain abroad during the winter for the purpose of raising funds in aid of the University of the South, of which he is the official head. He is understood to have met with considerable success thus far, and seems to take admirably with Mr. Bull. On the occasion of the distribution of prizes to the successful students in the Oxford Diocesan Training College for Schoolmasters, the Bishop of Oxford presiding, he preached the sermon, a copy of which was asked for publication.

The following is the pleasantest romance in little which we can present to our fair readers this week: The Archduke HENRY, of Austria, will shortly marry a young actress, of Graz, named CLARA HOFFMANN, whose father is a poor locksmith. Their courtship was a highly romantic affair. Miss HOFFMANN did not encourage the Archduke at first, until he became desperate, and told her he would blow out his brains if she would not consent to marry him. "Marry you!" she exclaimed, wonderingly. "Your Imperial Highness mocks me! How can an Archduke marry a poor girl like me?" The enamored Archduke thereupon rushed frantically from the room; but he returned half an hour afterward with two footmen, who carried two large portraits in magnificent frames. After they had deposited them in the room of the amazed actress the Archduke said to her, in the most solemn tone, "Dear CLARA, these are the portraits of my august parents. I swear by their memory, and by all that is sacred to me, that I honestly intend to make you my wife! Will you consent to give me your hand?" She consented joyfully. The Emperor has conferred the title of COUNTESS OF BOTZEN on her.

The late THOMAS GARNER, of this city, amassed a large fortune as a merchant and manufacturer. He was the owner of large manufactories at Cohoes, near Albany. After certain large bequests to his family he gave $100,000 to charitable institutions: $10,000 to St. Luke's Hospital, $10,000 to the Nursery and Child's Hospital, $5000 to St. Luke's Home for Indigent Christian Females, $5000 to Episcopal Widows and Orphans, $5000 to St. Ann's Church for Deaf Mutes, $2000 to the House of Mercy, $2000 to St. Barnabas House, etc., etc., etc.

ADELINA PATTI gives charming little dinner-parties (presided over, of course, by PATTI, père). Not long since she exploited one of those pleasant affairs, and had among her guests Mustapha Pasha, Prince Poniatowski, Baron de Thal, wife, and daughter. Dinner was followed by an evening party, at which assisted Dr. Sims, the surgeon, Marquis de Caux, Signor Gardoni, Signor Tagliacoe, wife, etc. PATTI is going up north, to Russia, to sing in Ricci's new Opera—the Russian Government paying handsomely all the traveling expenses.

Miss OLIVE LOGAN has accepted engagements from Associations in Chicago, Cincinnati, and a few other large towns in the West, to tell them what she thinks and knows about Paris, under the title of "The City of Luxury." Miss L. is clever, spicy, and quite frank in her way of stating things.

The remains of Dr. LEVI SILLIMAN IVES and his wife REBECCA (who was a sister of the late Bishop HOBART), were removed a few days since from the vaults of the Cathedral to the burial-ground of the Protectory in Westchester. The Protectory is a large institution, originated and successfully carried to completion by Dr. IVES for the protection, education, etc., of orphan and homeless boys, about four hundred of whom are now enjoying its privileges.

VICTOR EMANUEL is not at all the cheery monarch he used to be. Lately he has shut himself up in his palace, looked himself thoroughly over, and seriously entertained the notion of retiring altogether from the Italian muddle. He sent 60,000 livres to the families of the wounded Garibaldians; but that wouldn't go far toward paying for his treachery to the crimson-shirted old patriot.

Miss LILY MAXWELL is the first woman ever allowed to vote in England for Member of Parliament, and she voted for Mr. JACOB BRIGHT. Her name had somehow been put on the register by mistake, probably for a man's, and the clerk had no choice but to accept her vote. It will gratify Mrs. CADY STANTON and Miss ANTHONY to know that Mr. BRIGHT noticed this anomalous accession to the strength of his adherents with special satisfaction. The voters were cheered as she left the poll.

The PRINCE OF WALES is very well off; has a salary of $500,000 and a house, from the government, and a large fortune besides from the revenue of Cornwall; but he is gay and spends it all. Like a spring lamb, he "gambols on the green" and makes nothing of losing a few thousands. Not so the "Royal ALFRED," as he is called—the sailor prince. He is the pet of the nation, and has talent. His ship was in a gale the other day. He was on deck and worked her himself, and did it splendidly. This fact has increased his popularity wonderfully. He is a great favorite with all who are about his person. He treats all dependents with great kindness, and in that imitates his father. It is the common faith that he will be king, and he never forgets apace. If he was in the place of his brother he would make all London rejoice at the sight of his face when they wanted to see him.

THE DOLLS' DRESS-MAKER AND HER CUSTOMERS.—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]

Muff and Reticule.

See illustration, page 164.

This convenient article is easily made, and will be found very useful. The reticule is made of Angora cloth, lined with silk, and furnished with a handle of the same and a steel clasp. Cut from the cloth, from Fig. 27 one piece, and from Fig. 28 two pieces. To one end of Fig. 27 sew both ends of the lining, to which wadding has previously been basted, and which reaches to X on Fig. 27; this must be of the same width as the lining, and be run from 55 to X on half the outside; this silk forms the lining of the muff. Join the muff, Fig. 28, from * to X with the muff lining, and from X to • with the outside of the reticule, Fig. 27. Line the reticule with silk, put on the handle, and finish with clasp.

Corset-Cover.

See illustration, page 164.

This cover, of which we give the pattern, is an excellent protection for corsets, which lose their shape by being often washed. The original is of linen, trimmed round the neck with tatted lace, the corset being trimmed in a similar manner. A narrow band is run through both edges. The cover is fastened in the back with buttons and cord loops. The front is laced with the corset. Cut from Figs. 51 to 54 each two pieces, allowing for the seam; in Figs. 51 and 54 allow besides an inch for the hem back and front. This hem being made, and the eyelets worked in the back and front as seen in the illustration, stitch the parts together, making the figures on the pattern correspond, and hem the top and bottom. The illustrations show the cover separate, and fitted on the corset.

Music-Holder.

See illustration, page 164.

This music-holder consists of two pasteboard rings, two inches in width and ten inches in length, covered with black velvet and lined with black silk. The outside is ornamented with card-board, on which gold and pearl beads are sewed, in the manner shown in the illustration. A strong silk cord passed through the rings serves as a handle.

Egg Basket.

See illustration, page 164.

This pretty egg basket can also be used for fruit, salads, etc. It is netted of cord on wooden needles, and fastened at the top and bottom to iron hoops, twelve inches in diameter. For the basket cast on 36 stitches, and net 22 rounds; draw the foundation stitches together and fasten them; then sew the net to the iron hoops by means of holes bored therein for the purpose. The handle consists of a three-strand braid of cord.

Lamp Mat.

See illustration, page 164.

This lamp mat, which consists of two rows of leaves, is made to cling round the bottom of the lamp by means of an elastic band. For its preparation, first cut a circular piece of pasteboard five and a half inches in diameter, and two pieces of enameled cloth of the same size. Then cut out of pasteboard, gray, and white cloth each ten leaves from Fig. 57, and ten somewhat smaller pieces, reaching only to the straight line on the same figure. Trim the gray leaves with gold cord, as seen in the illustration, and herring-bone stitch in green silk, and the smaller white leaves with gold cord and a figure of black velvet set on with gold beads and green silk. Set the smaller leaves together in pairs, with the pasteboard leaf between, button-holing the edges with green silk; then put the large leaves together in the same manner, button-holing the edges with white silk, and setting on one crystal and one gold bead with every stitch. Lastly, sew the leaves to the circular piece of pasteboard, which is then covered on both sides with the enameled cloth. A green silk elastic cord, fastened with a cross-stitch of green silk under the point of each of the large leaves, and finished at the end with two small tassels, holds the mat fast round the stem of the lamp.

Ladies' Overshoe.

See illustration, page 164.

This overshoe, which is designed to be worn over the gaiter, is of black cloth, with a scarlet top. The top part is stitched along the outside edge with black silk in small diamonds; the lower corners are ornamented with black silk tassels. Jet buttons and button-holes to correspond are used for fastening. For this gaiter, cut out of black cloth, and gray linen for lining, two pieces each from Fig. 24; and out of red cloth and gray linen one piece each from Fig. 25. The top part is cut according to Fig. 26. Double the pattern, and cut in one piece. The cloth must be bias. Join the halves of the gaiter at the middle of the back by lapping the cloth about a quarter of an inch, and stitching the two thicknesses together. All around the gaiter, excepting on the upper part, the edges of the lining and outside must be turned in, and sewed together over and over. After making the button-holes in the part that laps over, as shown in the illustration, this overlapping part must be stitched to the left side of the gaiter. The numbers on the pattern must correspond to each other. Bind the lower part, and the scallops by the side of the button-holes, with red worsted braid. The buttons must be sewed on to correspond to the button-holes. The lining and outside edges of the top part are sewed together over hand. Then stitch the top part, as shown in the illustration; join to the gaiter by turning in the upper edges of both the gaiter and the top part, and overhand them all together. Finally, fasten the tassels, which are about two inches long, to the gaiter; sew a strap of leather from *, and join it so that the figures on the pattern will correspond to each other.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.MORE ABOUT THE BLACK-AND-WHITE KITTEN.

"I LIKED my black-and-white kitten better than any of my other kittens," said Aunt Mary.

"Why?" asked Alice.

"Well, I don't know," replied Aunt Mary, "unless because she seemed to like me better than any of the others did. She was the only playmate I had for a whole winter."

"How did she play with you, Auntie?"

"Oh! she would watch to see if I was coming along, and spring suddenly out from under a table or a chair, where she had been hiding, and caper along by me, and coax me to play with her. Sometimes I would take a long string, and tie a spool on the end of it, and draw it along, and she would dance after it in the highest glee. Sometimes I would give her the spool to play with by herself. She would roll it around with her paw a while, and then sit down and watch it. In a moment she would pretend that it moved, and would pounce upon it as if it were a mouse. But I used to have the funniest time with her at night."

"What would she do?" asked Alice.

"I will tell you. One night—one cold winter night—I went to my room, and began to undress myself so as to go to bed. Presently I heard a sound, 'Purr—purr—rr!' 'Kitty is here somewhere,' I said to myself; 'I must look around and find her.' So I looked in all the corners, and under the table, and under the bed, but no Kitty could I find. Still I could hear her gently purring. Pretty soon I saw the bed-clothes, almost down to the foot of the bed, moving a very little up and down. 'There she is,' said I to myself. So I turned the bed-clothes down, and, sure enough, there she was, all curled up in the bed. Poor Kitty! She did look so warm and so nice that I wanted to let her stay all night. But grandma said it was not a good plan. So I tried to coax her out to her own bed in the shed. But she did not want to stir. She knew it was a very cold night, and she thought my bed was warmer than hers. But I took her up in my arms, and carried her out to her basket bed, and covered her up warm, and left her there."

"Did she get into your bed again, Auntie?"

"Yes, she did, several times. I used to look carefully every night to see that she was not in the bed. But one night she hid under the bed; and after I had got almost asleep she jumped softly upon the bed, and wanted to curl up beside me. I would not let her get into the bed; so she lay down over my feet on the outside, and a very nice warm blanket she was that cold night. She staid there all night, and the last thing I heard before I went to sleep was Kitty purring, purring."

"What a funny blanket!" said Alice.

MRS. JUDITH.

Should you ask me whence I stole this, Whence I stole this Christmas Carol, I should answer, I should tell you, From the song of Scrooge and Marley, From the book of the Great Master.

Should you ask me why I stole it, Why I stole Boz's Christmas Carol, I should answer, I should tell you, That this song of Scrooge and Marley Is a song for all the people; And its notes throughout the ages, May be set by lowly singers, Such as I am, to their verses. And the Thought of the Great Master Shall be to them (still the verses) As that candy loved of childhood, Sweet and brown, the short-stick toffy, By whose help you've often bolted Boneseet or the nauseous hoarhound.

AUNT DEB was dead, to begin with. There could be no doubt whatever about that. An undertaker, six carriages, a clergyman, a funeral sermon, and a tombstone are witnesses enough, I should hope; and if there could be any doubt, her niece, Mrs. Judith, was at the funeral: which settles it!

As for Snappe, he was asleep.

Mrs. Judith knew that he was asleep? Of course she did! How could it be otherwise? They had been married for—I don't know how many years, and Mrs. Judith was the sole judge and the sole law of whatever was done in that house. She had said to him, an hour before, that having taken his bowl of sage, he had better go to sleep. And I should like to have seen him keep awake after that!

Oh! but she was a straight-laced, prim-visaged, starched, and sour American matron; a model of frozen housewifery; an angry and unmerciful virtue; a perambulating straight line, reducing every thing to her own likeness; with never a curve or a fancy about her, as hard and unyielding as a blackboard. In fact very like a blackboard with a few precepts done on it in chalk, which should have been done, while the rest should not have been left undone. Argument and persuasion had little influence upon her. No truth could rouse, no inconsistency startle her out of her groove. She was a straight line, and a straight line is the shortest distance between two points; and what more would you have in a world of business, in which there is dinner to get and your soul to save? Mercy and tenderness never knew where to have her; and for fun, she was proof.

Nobody ever danced about in her house. Nobody drew her curtains or took up her books twice. No child ever crept up in her lap. There was no glee, and no mystery, and no whispering at Christmas. Nobody ever came to her with a secret. Her husband and children sat silent and deprecating before her, and slunk away from her as soon as possible; and for sinners, not one dared appear in her presence. I mean special sinners, who had been found out. Mrs. Judith herself admitted, in a general prayer-book way, that we are all miserable sinners on Sunday mornings. A hard, driving, joyless, rayless little woman was Judith Snappe.

On Christmas-eve Mrs. Judith sat in the basement of her house. She usually sat there to keep an eye on Bridget, who passed her days in shoveling coal into the pinched, low-spirited range, if you were to believe Mrs. Judith. But in that case Bridget's days must have been few and evil; for the temperature within was not a whit better than the biting cold without. Worse, rather—a subtle, crawling cold that had kept Bridget all day in a shiver, and did not sweeten Mrs. Judith's temper; and that was a pity, seeing that her temper was but curdled at the best of times.

There was no fire in the parlor, for Mrs. Judith, being a slave to her family already, was determined not to add one link to her chain by allowing it; and the wretched spark in the dining-room had gone out, in utter indignation at having its drafts turned off whenever it attempted to kindle into an honest fire. Mr. Snappe and the children had gone out too—to bed—partly to get away from the cold, and very much to get away from Mrs. Judith, which was an excellent move on their part. For what with Bridget, who had asked for a half-holiday of her, who never had a holiday; and what with the children, who had teased for a tree, as if it was not enough to clean up mud and snow, but she must sweep pine chips after them; and what with Mr. Snappe, who had hinted that it was well to observe days of rejoicing in an anxious world like this, meaning thereby that she should cook an extra dinner and wash the dishes afterward; and what with the charitable committee who had asked her to roast a chicken for the Working-Women's dinner, as if she were not a working-woman, with nobody to give her roast chickens; and what with her reflections on people who gave money that might have been given to the missionaries for toys and Christmas dinners, Mrs. Judith was stepping about in a quiet, curdled away, peculiar to her, that would have set your teeth on edge if you could have seen her.

It was very odd then that, from thinking of all these "whats," she should suddenly think that she saw—Aunt Deb.

Aunt Deb was dead; could be proved to be dead, as I said before, by numbers of respectable witnesses. And yet for a moment Mrs. Judith could have sworn that she saw Aunt Deb standing by the pining fire so close that she could have touched her.

Only for a moment; but it gave Mrs. Judith such a start that she bundled up her sewing in a hurry, drew the bolts nervously, and marched up stairs a full half hour before her time, not without a dreadful suspicion that a halting foot kept time with hers behind her on the stairs, which made her slip in at the chamber door, and fasten it in a tremble. This done she felt herself reassured, and looking at the sleeping Snappe and the familiar furniture of her bedroom, would have sneered at herself. But—it might be, the wind, or echoes, or the creaking of boards, or of shutters (doubtless it was), but the steps, one light, and the other slow and loud, with a pushing and dragging sound, as of a heavy weight—she heard them! halting on the stairs, coming along the hall, coming to her door.

Mrs. Judith fell on a chair, and tried to pray. They came in. The door was fast, and the bolt securely in its staples. But they came in!

The words died on Mrs. Judith's tongue, and she sat dumb with terror looking at—there could be no doubt about it—Aunt Deb. Mrs. Judith knew the figure as well as she knew herself. The same, even to the wide cap-strings and the close black gown, with the remarkable addition of something that looked like a distorted and grinning idol fastened to her left ankle, which she dragged laboriously after her.

Mrs. Judith stared at this apparition with the faint hope that we have in nightmares, that it might be a dream; and the apparition, who had been a cozy and pragmatical person in her life, stared in return with a look of pain and wild inquiry. As she looked a strange idea beset Mrs. Judith, and sent the scared blood tingling back to her fingers' ends. Aunt Deb had been a leading church-member! But did angels limp about with idols tied to their ankles? Amazement got the better of fright.

"Is it possible?" she commenced; but the question was too uncivil, and she stopped.

"Even so," returned the Apparition, answering her unspoken thought. "For these things I labored, and these things are my reward."

Mrs. Judith looked at the idol more carefully than her terror had suffered her at first to do, and saw that it was made up of trunks, mirrors, preserve-jars, pudding dishes, brooms, thimbles, and certain gowns and carpets that Mrs. Judith remembered perfectly in Aunt Deb's house-keeping; and, oddly enough, she thrilled with a deepening terror because these articles were so familiar.

"Of these things," pursued the Phantom, in a hollow voice, "I made for myself an idol. With these things I was so busy that I had not time to teach and comfort my children. Lest these should come to harm I drove them into the street to take their chances there. With penances for sins against my idol, and with rules about it too heavy to be borne, I darkened their young lives. With these things I was too busy to listen to the prayer for help from other women. Because of these things I despised the afflicted who had them not."

"And yet you were an exemplary woman," urged Mrs. Judith.

"Exemplary! yes!" replied the Phantom. "I made my idol in the name of duty, and worshiped it in the name of religion; and though where I was blind now I see—as it hindered me then it hinders me now."

"But why do you say these things to me?" asked Mrs. Judith, uneasily. "Can I do more than discharge the duties of a wife and mother?"

"Oh, fool!" returned the Phantom, groaning. "As if tenderness were not the duty of a wife. As if patience and love were not the duties of a mother. As if forgiveness, charity, smiles, and kind words were not the duties of a woman!"

Mrs. Judith listened unmoved. In fact, she was growing more and more composed. She was a determined woman, who disbelieved in ghosts on principle, and the natural stubbornness of her temper was beginning to assert itself. Besides, in Mrs. Judith's eyes, a ghost who preached a cheerful and light-hearted gospel savored less of the truth than of Dickens, in whose pages Mrs. Judith fancied that she had somehow tangled herself by some mysterious nightmare process, which she was unable to shake off.

The Spectre eyed her with its sad and chilling glance, and, answering her thoughts,

"For what do you take me, then?" it asked.

"For a bit of Scrooge and Marley, and an impudent piece of mince-pie," she answered, boldly. "One from the grave would not have preached the petty vanities of this life."

The Apparition raised its hands and eyes to heaven, and as it did so the clock struck twelve.

It had always a clear-toned bell, this tall, old clock, that had struck the hours for Judith's father, and grandfather, and great-grandfather before that. But whether it was the silence of the night or Mrs. Judith's excited fancy, each note rang out with such a sharp meaning that she began to quiver with a new apprehension.

The Ghost, that had never once removed its unwinking stare from Mrs. Judith, turned at the sound, and uttering the mysterious monosyllable "One!" fixed its eyes on the clock. At once its face glowed, first with a small point of brightness that widened finally into a broad, quivering circle of light; and the hands began to revolve—backward! faster and faster, as the Ghost watched and seemed to urge them (though no sound issued from its lips), till Mrs. Judith only saw them as swift-darting points of light, while the hours rang a continuous chime in her ears, and at intervals the waiting Spectre continued its mysterious counting.

Meantime a change had fallen upon Mrs. Judith herself. She was growing lighter of heart and clearer of brain. There was a new impulse in her blood. She was full of glee. She would have liked to giggle. She had feelings in the legs and toes that were temptations to skip and jump. Old songs, old stories, forgotten lessons, and long-past pleasures, came back freshly in her mind. The bleak, shivering bedroom vanished. She was in the very centre of the light! In a low-raftered kitchen, with a fire-place built in the days when fires were understood, with a back-log like a tree. The room was full of a generous warmth, and of the spicy odors of the forest. There were wreaths on the rough walls, and boughs over the low doors. A group of people sat at one end of the hearth, and a child, a slender little girl, was turning out a lumpy, misshapen stocking at the other.

Mrs. Judith's eyes sparkled. The people laughed, but she never listened. She was intent on the little one with the stocking; and if you could have seen how she entered into the child's emotions you would have said that respectable woman was beside herself. When the child cried "Oh!" Mrs. Judith cried "Oh!" also. When a great orange rolled out unexpectedly, Mrs. Judith giggled. When from the very bottom of the stocking she drew out something wrapped in brown paper, and every body began to guess about it, Mrs. Judith was as eager with her guess as the rest. When the wrapper was being untied, Mrs. Judith's heart beat so fast that she caught her breath! And when it was off at last and there came out a doll, Mrs. Judith clapped her hands and fairly shouted.

"You remember and are pleased with such trifles?" asked the Ghost.

"Remember it! Can I ever forget it? or the scent of the pine? or the great roaring fire? or that my mother sat up half the night to dress the doll in season for Santa Claus? I wish I knew any thing now that could make my heart beat with such delicious awe and wonder. Why, the very name of Christmas is a charm. Only to have had such happiness once makes this dark world better and lighter!" cried Mrs. Judith, in a glow, and her eyes wet and shining.

The Ghost turned and looked hard and meaningly at her, and, before she could recover from the confusion which its glance for some reason occasioned her, the child, the fire, and the kitchen blurred, blended, and rolled away like smoke, from a little room, where sat a young woman with a baby. It was the child grown to womanhood and married; and Mrs. Judith was even more interested and excited than she had been in the little girl and her stocking. While the young wife waited for her husband, Mrs. Judith watched as anxiously as she. When she heard his step, Mrs. Judith brightened. When he came in shivering and stamping, and presenting a wonderful likeness to Snappe, Mrs. Judith hovered about him as busy and officious as the young wife herself. For baby's tricks and wise remarks Mrs. Judith had them every one on her tongue's end; and when he went to a certain corner she was in such an agitation; and when he made three wishes, as his wife bade him, she actually turned pale; and when he said "dressing-gown" at the last, and the little wife proudly pulled away the curtain from the corner, and he stood admiring before it, Mrs. Judith's heart quite overflowed, and I really believe that she laughed and cried together.

Somewhere a clock struck twelve, and a chill fell on Mrs. Judith. It was broad day, so it must have been high noon; and it was Christmas-day. You need only to look at the people in the streets to know that; but you could never have guessed it from the house. There was a low-spirited fire in the basement, over which presided Bridget, wrathful and sulky, while her mistress went about with an icy grimace that she kept on purpose for holidays, as days that brought her extra work. There was a glimmering of fire in the dining-room, and Snappe had attempted blindman's-buff with the children; but Mrs. Judith, in alarm for her carpets, had seated them all primly on chairs, where, when they were not yawning, they quarreled in under-ones with each other. The parlor was shut up, gathering blackness and darkness; the bedrooms would have frozen out a ghost; and Mr. Snappe was strolling through the streets, his hands in his pockets, looking gloomily through the windows at the wreaths, the bright fires, and the smiling mothers and children, and wishing that every thing pleasant did not cost his wife so much trouble.

Mrs. Judith, her heart still beating fast and her eyes still moistened, sighed and shivered. There was a hopeless dreariness about this dark, sulky, stifling house that made even the streets and the cold outside seem more like home.

For some moments Mrs. Judith had been aware of a darkness that sprang like light from the clock. It spread, and deepened, and settled down about her. It thickened around her like a fog, till she saw the spectre dimly, as a shadow or mist, and heard the hours chime, as the clock-hands whirled forward, like muffled bells at a distance.

"What is this?" she asked in a fright.

"That which is to come," returned the spectre, solemnly.

"But I see nothing," she cried, straining her eyes into the darkness.

A laugh sounded close in her ears. She had not heard him laugh like that in years, but it was Mr. Snappe's laugh. He was smoking a cigar, in an abandoned manner, with his reckless feet on a chair, in the shut-up parlor. Shut up no longer. The curtains were drawn. Mrs. Judith never permitted that, for the sun faded the carpets, and you were apt to rumple the curtains. There were flowers in the window. Mrs. Judith never permitted them, for they brought more work for her. There was a fire in the grate—a glorious fire, heaped high and glowing down to the core. Mr. Snappe's eldest daughter and his sons sat at a table tying Christmas wreaths. Least of all would Mrs. Judith have permitted that.

"Ha! ha! ha!" laughed Mr. Snappe again.

"Not much like the old Christmas, eh, Meg?" It was a jolly laugh, and it was echoed by a whole chorus of laughs on the steps and a pull at the bell that should have snapped the wires, and that was followed by stamping and talking—every body all together—and a subdued rustling and fluttering of skirts, as of doves taking flight up stairs, and an appetizing smell that was turkey, if it was any thing, when the dining-room was left open. And Meg was wanted in fifty places all at once, and was ready wherever she was wanted, and was the admiration of the guests and the delight of her father. And only one thing was unthought of—Mrs. Judith, the mother of the house, the mistress of the mansion.

She listened keenly, but in all their talk there was no mention of her, and the very merriment of her husband and children, the guests, the fires, and the feasting were, as she could not but acknowledge to herself, so many proofs of her absence.

Where then was she?

Slowly, just before her, something began to glimmer. A fire in the grate. Gradually outlines shaped themselves around it. The room in which she was standing, the same furniture, older and more worn. A chair drawn close to the fire; a woman sitting in it, bent with disease, not age; a sour woman, with a fretful face, sitting alone, and below the laughing, and the merry voices, and the Christmas-wreaths, and the forgetfulness of her. "A living death in life. Not ill treated, but forgotten because she remembered nobody. Alone, let her years be few or many, because once it was too much trouble to have her friends and children near her!"

It was the Ghost who uttered these last words; its eyes intent on Mrs. Judith, and as it spoke it began to fade. A horror of the darkness around her seized upon Mrs. Judith. Better the Spectre than that. "Stop!" she cried; "I am not the woman I was," and woke sobbing and struggling, clinging fast to Mr. Snappe's hand.

"A merry Christmas to you, my dear!" observed Mr. Snappe, looking at her doubtfully.

"I am not the same woman I was," repeated Mrs. Judith, passionately; "and I won't drag an idol over you all, and sit alone by my fire; but I will make you all love me yet! And we will have a turkey and a tree, and Bridget shall have her half holiday, and Mr. Snappe, you may make as much trouble as you like."

After which she threw her arms around his neck and cried hysterically; after which she told him the whole story; after which they went out in a hurry to buy the turkey and toys before the shops should be shut; after which the young Snappes had, no doubt, a merry Christmas.

MRS. TYPESET'S DIARY.

Monday.—Went to the Central Park with the children this morning. Sleighing is a rarity in New York, and the scene was novel and exhilarating. Gay equipages, swiftly-flying horses, eager drivers, ladies with brilliant cheeks and dresses, and withal,

"The tintinnabulation that so musically wells
From the bells, bells, bells, bells,
Hear the sledges with their bells—
Silver bells!

What a world of merriment their melody foretells!"

The "snow season" has commenced early this winter, and is hailed with delight by every body who can obtain a ride on runners.

On returning home found a letter from Cousin E—, dated Paris; and really it was quite a stretch of imagination to step from our snow-bound Central Park to the Garden of the Tuileries. "We are," she says, "now enjoying charming weather—so warm and pleasant that the shady side of the street is preferable at mid-day. We spent most of our time to-day in the Garden of the Tuileries, Lucy with her skipping-rope and doll, making the acquaintance of the little French girls. The Garden is very large, containing several fountains, and some fine statuary; a portion is laid out with walks, passing through beds of flowers. Roses, dahlias, and chrysanthemums in great variety are now in blossom; and the grass is beautifully green. Two days since we saw men mowing there. One flower which seems to be a favorite is apparently the same as the white weed which flourishes so abundantly in our pastures. Long rows of it have adorned the borders of the Palace gardens for the past month. The walks on either side of the flower-gardens are very broad; and here each day gather children and nurses, with dolls, ropes, hoops, reins, little shovels, and tiny pails (to use in playing with the gravel), to spend hours in the air and sunshine. Some ladies take their work and accompany the older children, while others promenade, or sit on benches and watch the happy groups—the gentlemen promenading, reading, or smoking as suits them best."

Tuesday Eve.—What a sad tragedy the papers report! A mother, reduced to destitution in the heart of this great city—wary of life, distrustful of Providence, her children pining for bread, she sees no hope in the future, and makes a fearful attempt to send into eternity her own and her children's souls. The wretched mother and her family of four young children—the eldest a boy of thirteen—were discovered helpless and insensible from the effect of the poison they had taken. Restoratives were administered and they were brought back to life. The children were accustomed to gain a precarious subsistence during the warmer seasons by reciting poetry and singing songs on the ferry-boats, and in front of hotels at watering-places. They are represented to be exceedingly intelligent and well-bred. Alas for the poor during the cold winter! I can not help thinking of Proctor's lines—

"The winds are bitter; the skies are wild;
From the roof comes plunging the drowning rain;
Without, in tatters, the world's poor child
Sobbeth abroad her grief, her pain!
No one heareth her, no one heedeth her;
But Hunger, her friend, with his bony hand
Grasps her throat, whispering huskily—
'What dost Thou in a Christian land?'"

Wednesday Morn.—In Glasgow and Edinburgh (as well as in New York, and many cities of the United States) there are establishments for the purpose of teaching ladies practical cooking. There is not quite so much said about them in New York this winter as a year or two ago, but they are not out of fashion yet. In England they are flourishing. The "pupils" in Edinburgh are required to appear in a cotton dress and apron; minus crinoline, rings, and chains. As the teacher, who is a lady, has constant orders for dinners and suppers, there are always a variety of ornamental dishes to be made, as well as the plain standard ones. By the method adopted a thorough knowledge is imparted of all branches of cooking; as well as much useful information upon the economical arrangement and adaptation of dishes.

And this reminds me that, although I never heard of an establishment where young married ladies were practically taught how a husband ought to be "cooked," to make a good dish of him, I have lately seen a recipe which points out the "modus operandi." The writer of this recipe says some women keep their husbands in hot water, some in cold water, and others in pickle. Of course they can not be supposed to be tender and good managed in this way. They should be put into a large jar (of carefulness), placed near a hot fire (of love). Let the heat be regular and constant. Cover with equal quantities of affection and kindness. Add a little prudence, moderation, gentleness, and deference. Garnish with becoming familiarity and innocent pleasantry; and if you add kisses and other confectioneries, accompany them with sufficient secrecy.

A French writer says it is an incontestable fact that "in the New World woman is superior to man." He does not bring forward instances to prove this statement, but nobody doubts that it is true—in some respects! Certain young ladies, by-the-way, have been attempting to put themselves upon a footing with Weston. A couple who were very ambitious recently walked from Danvers to Boston. They started at half past ten A.M. and finished their journey about 5 P.M. One of them blistered her feet, but the other said she was ready to continue to Chicago. The distance over the route they traveled is about 18 miles. Another young lady, having taken the cars from Syracuse to Auburn, discovered she had left her muff in the depot waiting-room. She stopped at Camillus, seven or eight miles from Syracuse, intending to take the next train back. But finding she would have to remain there some hours she started for the city and accomplished the task in an hour and three quarters, and was repaid for her energy by finding her supposed loss undisturbed. The papers say that a female brass band, from Decatur, is electrifying New Orleans with "Yankee Doodle," "Dixie," "Star-Spangled Banner," "Bonnie Blue Flag," etc. And also that "a lady has appeared on the street in Burlington, Iowa, with a cigar in her mouth." Well, really, what next? Though, to be sure, to my thinking, any "lady" has as good a "right" to smoke a cigar on the street, on the platform of a car, or in her parlor, as a gentleman to do the same—it is a mere matter of taste!

An unusual number of "golden weddings" have been celebrated within the past two or three years. In explanation of this fact it is stated that the number of marriages in 1815 and the two years following just after the close of the war was very great, and a prediction is made that a similar phenomenon will occur in 1915 from a similar cause.

In Connecticut a novel wedding was recently celebrated. The happy pair were in haste to be married, as they desired to leave town in the next train. There was not much time to spare, so they started for the clergyman's residence, and by good chance met him on the road. In order that no time might be wasted, it was proposed to have the marriage ceremony performed then and there—right in the middle of the road. So the minister tied the knot, several people meantime arriving as passers-by on the road, who were accepted as competent witnesses. The married couple reached the cars in ample season.

Evening.—How delightful a fashionable dinner-party in Abyssinia must be—to the ladies! The company are so arranged that one gentleman sits between two ladies. This is not for the sake of their pleasant society, oh no! In Abyssinia no man of any fashion feeds himself or touches his own meat. The women cut the flesh into small square pieces. This they lay upon a portion of the tuff bread, strongly powdered with pepper and salt, and then wrap it up like a cartridge. The gentleman, with a hand resting upon each neighbor's knee, his body stooping, his head low and forward, and mouth open, very like an idiot, turns to the one whose cartridge is first ready, who stuffs the whole of it between his jaws at the imminent risk of choking him. This is a mark of grandeur. The greater the man would seem to be, the larger is the piece which he takes into his mouth; the more noise he makes in chewing it, the more polite does he prove himself. Having dispatched this morsel, which he does very expeditiously, his neighbor on the other hand holds forth a second pellet, which he devours in the same way, and so on till he is satisfied. He never drinks till he has finished eating; and before he begins, in gratitude to the fair ones who have fed him, he makes up two small rolls of the same kind and form, each of the ladies opens her mouth at once, while with his own hand he supplies a portion to both at the same moment. Abyssinian ladies are remarkable for the luxuriant growth of their hair; but not satisfied with nature's gift, they seek to improve it by shaving part of the head, or by the application of rancid butter. However, many among the beau monde allow their raven locks to fall over their dubiously-colored necks in not ungraceful neglect.

Some old heathen writer gives a most unromantic origin to the kiss. He was of opinion that kissing first began between kinsmen and kinswomen only to ascertain whether wives, daughters, or nieces, had tasted any wine. Was that Jacob's object when he "kissed Rachel?"

Worth remembering. "Never make that man your friend who hates music or the laugh of a child."

Paris papers relate a recent instance of magnificent hospitality. M. de Rochefoucauld, who has just been nominated member of the General Council of Loire-et-Cher, has built a chateau near Vendôme, costing about five million francs. To celebrate the house-warming he invited fifty guests to a succession of fetes which lasted a month. Gala carriages, drawn by six horses, were placed at the disposal of the guests, and concerts, balls, feasts, hunts, and theatricals diversified the hours of this enchanted month. A photographer was in attendance with orders to take pictures of the guests, their dogs, their horses, etc., on the occasion of any striking scene or festivity. At the close of the fetes each guest was presented with an album of these photographs.

The commercial gentleman, who, on looking over a newspaper last week, suddenly inquired, "Who is this Dickens they are making such a fuss about?" will be a good match for the lady who recently applied at a book-store for Dickens's novel, "David Copperhead."

Thursday Eve.—Strolled down Broadway this afternoon just to see the pretty things in the shop-windows. Every body likes to see pretty things, and they are now exhibited in such variety and beauty that it is well worth while to inspect them. Things rare, curious, useful, and ornamental, unfold themselves at every step; and I found myself more than once standing at a window, and wondering what some of the articles were for, and what they were called. I was not alone in my curiosity; ladies and children thronged the streets—really, gentlemen stood very little chance of seeing much beside the eager sight-seers. The toy-shop windows, piled with marvelous figures of every living thing—with dolls of every shape and size, with every strange device in miniature, with toys bright and dark, large and small, noisy and still, soft and hard—these windows drew the little folks around them, just as a magnet draws needles to itself. Such eager eyes, such expressive "Ohs!" and "Ahs!" such lingering, pleading glances, which said more plainly than words, "Now do buy that for me!" And every body carried a bag and a bundle; nobody is ashamed to carry bundles about Christmas time—it is highly respectable and altogether fashionable.

And I came home pleased and tired; and "Dot" met me at the door with wide-open blue eyes which plainly asked, "Have you bought something for me?" but with mouth most discreetly closed. The comical concealment of Christmas has come over her; she hides little packages in her tiny pocket when I unexpectedly appear, says "Hush!" and "Don't tell!" in a subdued tone to her brother, and smothering a gay laugh in her hand, while I feel called upon to look most unconsciously in an opposite direction. But she consults me confidently about buying this for Aunt Anne, and that for papa; "a doll I must get for Etta, and what can I put on the Christmas Tree for Lawrie?" And when I suggest that she may not have money enough to buy presents for every one, with a generous indignation she exclaims, "Haven't I got nine dollars?"—the sum total of her private property, which she evidently intends to expend in Christmas gifts.

By HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD.

As if a dryad should suddenly peer
Out of the cup of a morning lily,
Parting her hair with fingers fair,
Dripping from night-dews bright and chilly;
As if in a world of greenery
This face of radiant rosette splendour
Should silently rise with wondering eyes,
And a look such as gods alone engender;

As if while yet hovering half-revealed,
Startled at sight of the life around her,
As if when each line had grown divine,
And the beauty of primal nature crowned her,
The perfect vision should fall away
While yet the mist on the hills was hoary—
Should fade to a haze on our dazzled gaze,
And melt in a cloud of circumfluent glory:

Ah! but the dryads died with Pan,
Not any more do we behold them,
No forest nods to the walking gods,
Nor giant blossom again enfolds them.
They no longer from hollow air
Flash and madden the mountaineer,
A kinglier hand grasps their empire bland—
Hers is a holier atmosphere!

As if an angel should pause in flight,
Rest on the air's unchained dominions,
Winnowing the sight of Heaven's delight
Through the golden grain of his purple pinions,
Then, shedding some wreath of supernal song,
Should speed where God's smile is his own evangel,
And over the throng drop in light angel
From the face of archangel down to angel:

Dominations—princes—powers—
All the regalities throned in heaven—
What type are they in their solemn sway
Of her sweetness taken as soon as given!
Whither away with your idle words—
Sighing follows us after sighing—
She was the joy of our day's employ,
Each hour is a memory round us clinging!

Pansy and violet, looking down,
More like her starry eyes are growing,
Shaping her face with inward grace
All the lucid clouds are flowing.
What is there left of our darling here?—
Tenderly twining it round our fingers—
Only this tress, in whose loveliness
The sunshine of one brief summer lingers.

Only this picture, where she lies
Dreaming away immortal hours,
Frozen by death in a frosty breath,
Yet lost in the lap of myriad flowers.
One might deem that, this side heaven's gate,
Fallen perchance from the walls of jasper,
As the unrequited love of some sculptor's scope
These fields of amaranth shield and clasp her.

If, out of a silence pure and far,
God himself had clearly spoken
Words like balm, then to vibrant calm
Silverly hushed ere we knew it broken—
Scarce had we felt a want more strange,
Such soft sadness nor quiet weeping—
For this hope and fear of a single year
Make earth a desert by her still sleeping!

Jacket for Boy from 10 to 12 Years old.

See illustration on double page.

This jacket is of dark-brown doeskin, bound with black braid. Cut from Fig. 8 one piece, and from Fig. 9 two pieces. Face the front of the jacket with a strip of cloth five inches wide, cut a slit along the double line for the breast-pocket, bind the edge of the stuff with braid, and set in a circular pocket about five inches deep, faced with cloth. Sew up the stuff from 13 to 14, and bind the jacket with braid a little less than an inch wide. Sew up the sleeves from 15 to 16, bind the bottom and set them in the arm-holes from 17 to 17, holding the arm-hole a little full. Cut the button-hole lapel from Fig. 10, bind it, and fasten it with a button to the left side of the jacket, putting the other button at the corresponding place on the right side.

Under-Waist, Buttoning on the Side.

See illustration on double page.

This waist is designed to be worn under thin dresses, which show so plainly the buttons on under-waists that are fastened in front. Cut the front and back, each in one piece, from Figs. 43 and 44, of muslin or linen, allowing on each an inch for a hem at the sides. Cut the sleeves from Fig. 45. Lay the bosom pleats in the front from * to * and from x to x, and also lay a pleat as marked in the middle of the back. Hem the sides, put on the buttons and button-holes, as marked in Fig. 43, and sew up the shoulders from 23 to 24. Hem the sleeves on the bottom and sides and set on buttons and button-holes, as seen in the illustration, then sew them in the waist to correspond with the figures on the pattern. Lastly, bind the bottom of the waist with a strip of muslin or linen about an inch wide, through which run a piece of tape, which passes through an eyelet hole in the front and serves to tie the waist. Trim the neck and sleeves with lace, through which run a narrow black velvet ribbon. The waist of course must be drawn over the head.

Flannel Corset with Waistband for Girl from 10 to 12 Years old.

See illustration on double page.

This corset is of flannel, with whalebone only in the back. Cut from Figs. 46-50 each two pieces. Lay the pleats in the bottom of the fronts as marked in Fig. 46, run the backs together in the middle, back-stitch the corset, Figs. 46-48, together to correspond with the figures on the pattern, press the seams open and stitch them down on the right side. Join the fronts of the waistband in the same manner, sew the backs thereon, and stitch the waistband on the corset, making the figures correspond. Put eyelets or eyelet rings in the back and set on a band for the whalebone. Run the edges of the corsets together at the top and bottom, and trim it round the neck with a narrow needle-work band.

Hood for Girl from 12 to 14 Years old.

See illustration on double page.

This hood is of white cashmere, thinly wadded, and lined with white silk. The trimming consists of black bead lace, an inch wide, set on plain, and surmounted with a narrow bias fold of white satin. The hood is tied under the chin with narrow white ribbon. Cut of cashmere, wadding, and lining each one piece, from Figs. 55 and 56, Fig. 55 being bias. Baste the outside on the wadding and lining, and gather the bottom of hood, Fig. 55, to the width of the cape, which set on to correspond with the figures on the pattern, having first run the edges together, then cover the seam on the wrong side with a strip of silk. Trim the edge; pleat the front from x to *, and put on the rest of the trimming in the manner shown in the illustration.

Dolls' Dresses.

See illustration on double page.

We give a number of patterns for dolls' dresses, which will doubtless be especially interesting to our young folks at this holiday season, and which will enable them to array their miniature household in the fashionable styles of the day, or to send them masquerading in the picturesque costume of the peasants of Brittany. The patterns, of course, must be made larger or smaller to suit the respective dolls.

Fig. 1 represents a Breton peasant boy: height, 23 inches, without the head. His full trousers are made of white cashmere, and his jacket of blue cloth, trimmed with oxydized silver buttons and silver lace. His blue velvet belt is fastened with a silver clasp, and his gaiters and hat are of black velvet—the first trimmed up the sides with silver buttons, and the last adorned with a band and silver lace. His standing collar is of linen. Figs. 60-62 give the pattern of the jacket, which is lined with silk.

Fig. 2 represents a Breton peasant girl. Height, 21 inches, without the head. Her petticoat and jacket are of blue flannel, trimmed with broad strips of white cashmere, embroidered in bright colors, and narrow strips of black velvet. Her apron is of white cashmere, trimmed on the bottom with an embroidered band. Her Russian skirt and ruff are of batiste, and her embroidered cap of linen. Her shoes are black velvet. Figs. 63-64 give the pattern of half the jacket; the sleeves are cut like those in Fig. 67, only a little shorter and fuller.

Fig. 3 represents the doll in an elegant promenade dress. Height, 24 inches, without the head. The under-skirt is of blue poplin, pleated round the bottom and up the side to the waist, which is also of blue poplin. The over-skirt is short and open at the side; it is of light gray poplin, with blue spots, and is trimmed with a bias fold of blue silk, set on in points, with a heading of blue silk braid. The belt and bodice are of the same stuff as the over-skirt, and trimmed in the same manner. Lamballe bonnet of blue silk, with white lace scarf. Figs. 65-69 give the patterns for this dress.

Fig. 4 represents a doll in a short walking suit. Height, 18 inches, without the head. Under-skirt of red cashmere, trimmed round the bottom with a pleated flounce of the same material. Over-skirt of white alpaca, trimmed with red cashmere rouleaux. White bonnet, trimmed with rouleaux of red ribbon. Red boots. Figs. 58 and 59 give the patterns for this dress.

Hood for Girl from 10 to 12 Years old.

See illustration on double page.

This hood is of white cashmere, wadded and lined with white silk. It is cut from the same pattern as the preceding one; the cape, however, is to be cut along the straight line. The trimming of the hood, the style of which is shown in the illustration, consists of black and white lace, two and a half inches, and narrow blue satin ribbon, dotted and edged with black. The hood is fastened with a button and loop, over which is placed a rosette of cashmere covered with lace. The hood is trimmed besides with bands of cashmere, edged with lace, and covered with satin ribbon, in the manner shown in the illustration.

THE YEAR IS GROWING OLD.

THE year is growing old, love,
The sun has hid its light;
My life is growing dark, too,
And turning into night.

The flowers bloom no longer,
The birds have hushed their song,
And the music of the streamlet
No longer flows along.

But sweeter than the sweetest song
Of bird upon a tree
Is the music of your voice, love,
As you speak to me.

Come, love, and sit beside me,
And lay your hand in mine;
Look full into my heart, love,
With those true eyes of thine.

Is there aught changed within it—
Has it grown strange or cold;
And is my strong love dying,
Now that the year is old?

NO THOROUGHFARE.

BY CHARLES DICKENS AND WILKIE COLLINS.

IN FOUR ACTS.

THERE was a great accumulation of snow on the Bridge; and such enormous accumulations of snow overhanging them from projecting masses of rock, that they might have been making their way through a stormy sky of white clouds. Using his staff skillfully, sounding as he went, and looking upward, with bent shoulders, as it were to resist the mere idea of a fall from above, Obenreizer softly led. Vendale closely followed. They were yet in the midst of their dangerous way, when there came a mighty rush, followed by a sound as of thunder. Obenreizer clapped his hand on Vendale's mouth, and pointed to the track behind them. Its aspect had been wholly changed in a moment. An avalanche had swept over it, and plunged into the torrent at the bottom of the gulf below.

Their appearance at the solitary Inn not far beyond this terrible Bridge, elicited many expressions of astonishment from the people shut up in the house. "We stay but to rest," said Obenreizer, shaking the snow from his dress at the fire. "This gentleman has very pressing occasion to get across; tell them, Vendale."

"Assuredly, I have very pressing occasion. I must cross."

"You hear, all of you. My friend has very pressing occasion to get across, and we want no advice and no help. I am as good a guide, my fellow-countrymen, as any of you. Now, give us to eat and drink."

In exactly the same way, and in nearly the same words, when it was coming on dark and they had struggled through the greatly increased difficulties of the road, and had at last reached their destination for the night, Obenreizer said to the astonished people of the Hospice, gathering about them at the fire, while they were yet in the act of getting their wet shoes off and shaking the snow from their clothes—

"It is well to understand one another, friends all. This gentleman—"

"Has," said Vendale, readily taking him up with a smile, "very pressing occasion to get across. Must cross."

"You hear?—has very pressing occasion to get across, must cross. We want no advice and no help. I am mountain-born, and act as Guide. Do not worry us by talking about it, but let us have supper, and wine, and bed."

All through the intense cold of the night, the same awful stillness. Again at sunrise, no sunny tinge to gild or redder the snow. The same interminable waste of deadly white; the same immovable air; the same monotonous gloom in the sky.

"Travelers!" a friendly voice called to them from the door, after they were afoot, knapsack on back and staff in hand, as yesterday; "recollect! There are five places of shelter, near together, on the dangerous road before you; and there is the wooden cross, and there is the next Hospice. Do not stray from the track. If the Tourmente comes on, take shelter instantly!"

"The trade of these poor devils!" said Obenreizer to his friend, with a contemptuous backward wave of his hand toward the voice. "How they stick to their trade! You Englishmen say we Swiss are mercenary. Truly, it does look like it."

They had divided between the two knapsacks, such refreshments as they had been able to obtain that morning, and as they deemed it prudent to take. Obenreizer carried the wine as his share of the burden; Vendale, the bread and meat and cheese, and the flask of brandy.

They had for some time labored upward and onward through the snow—which was now above their knees in the track, and of unknown depth elsewhere—and they were still laboring upward and onward through the most frightful part of that tremendous desolation, when snow began to fall. At first, but a few flakes descended slowly and steadily. After a little while the fall grew much denser, and suddenly it began without apparent cause to whirl itself into spiral shapes. Instantly ensuing upon this last change, an icy blast came roaring at them, and every sound and force imprisoned until now was let loose.

the road is carried at that perilous point, a cave-cked out by arches of great strength, was near at hand. They struggled into it, and the storm raged wildly. The noise of the wind, the noise of the water, the thundering down of displaced masses of rock and snow, the awful voices with which not only that gorge, but every gorge in the whole monstrous range seemed to be suddenly endowed, the darkness as of night, the violent revolving of the snow which beat and broke it into spray and blinded them, the madness of every thing around insatiate for destruction, the rapid substitution of furious violence for unnatural calm, and hosts of appalling sounds for silence: these were things, on the edge of a deep abyss, to chill the blood, though the fierce wind, made actually solid by ice and snow, had failed to chill it.

Obenreizer, walking to and fro in the gallery without ceasing, signed to Vendale to help him unbuckle his knapsack. They could see each other, but could not have heard each other speak. Vendale complying, Obenreizer produced his bottle of wine, and poured some out, motioning Vendale to take that for warmth's sake, and not brandy. Vendale again complying, Obenreizer seemed to drink after him, and the two walked backward and forward, side by side; both well knowing that to rest or sleep would be to die.

The snow came driving heavily into the gallery by the upper end at which they would pass out of it, if they ever passed out; for greater dangers lay on the road behind them than before. The snow soon began to choke the arch. An hour more, and it lay so high as to block out half of the returning daylight. But it froze hard now, as it fell, and could be clambered through or over. The violence of the mountain storm was gradually yielding to a steady snow-fall. The wind still raged at intervals, but not incessantly; and when it paused, the snow fell in heavy flakes.

They might have been two hours in their frightful prison, when Obenreizer, now crunching into the mound, now creeping over it with his head bowed down and his body touching the top of the arch, made his way out. Vendale followed close upon him, but followed without clear motive or calculation. For the lethargy of Basle was creeping over him again, and mastering his senses.

How far he had followed out of the gallery, or with what obstacles he had since contended, he knew not. He became roused to the knowledge that Obenreizer had set upon him, and that they were struggling desperately in the snow. He became roused to the remembrance of what his assailant carried in a girdle. He felt for it, drew it, struck at him, struggled again, struck at him again, cast him off, and stood face to face with him.

"I promised to guide you to your journey's end," said Obenreizer, "and I have kept my promise. The journey of your life ends here. Nothing can prolong it. You are sleeping as you stand."

"You are a villain. What have you done to me?"

"You are a fool. I have drugged you. You are doubly a fool, for I drugged you once before upon the journey, to try you. You are trebly a fool, for I am the thief and forger, and in a few moments I shall take those proofs against the thief and forger from your insensible body."

The entrapped man tried to throw off the lethargy, but its fatal hold upon him was so sure that, even while he heard those words, he stupidly wondered which of them had been wounded, and whose blood it was that he saw sprinkled on the snow.

"What have I done to you," he asked, heavily and thickly, "that you should be—so base—a murderer?"

"Done to me? You would have destroyed me, but that you have come to your journey's end. Your cursed activity interposed between me and the time I had counted on in which I might have replaced the money. Done to me? You have come in my way, not once, not twice, but again and again and again. Did I try to shake you off in the beginning, or no? You were not to be shaken off. Therefore you die here."

Vendale tried to think coherently, tried to speak coherently, tried to pick up the iron-shod staff he had let fall; failing to touch it, tried to stagger on without its aid. All in vain, all in vain! He stumbled, and fell heavily forward on the brink of the deep chasm.

Stupefied, dozing, unable to stand upon his feet, a veil before his eyes, his sense of hearing deadened, he made such a vigorous rally that, supporting himself on his hands, he saw his enemy standing calmly over him, and heard him speak.

"You call me murderer," said Obenreizer, with a grim laugh. "The name matters very little. But at least I have set my life against yours, for I am surrounded by dangers, and may never make my way out of this place. The Tourmente is rising again. The snow is on the whirl. I must have the papers now. Every moment has my life in it."

"Stop!" cried Vendale, in a terrible voice, staggering up with a last flash of fire breaking out of him, and clutching the thief's hands at his breast in both of his. "Stop! Stand away from me! God bless my Marguerite! Happily she will never know how I died. Stand off from me and let me look at your murderous face. Let it remind me—of something—left to say."

The sight of him fighting so hard for his senses, and the doubt whether he might not for the instant be possessed by the strength of a dozen men, kept his opponent still. Wildly glaring at him, Vendale faltered out the broken words—

"It shall not be—the trust—of the dead—betrayed by me—reputed parents—misinherited fortune—see to it!"

As his head dropped on his breast, and he stumbled on the brink of the chasm as before, the thievish hands went once more, quick and busy, to his breast. He made a convulsive attempt to cry "No!" desperately rolled himself over into the gulf, and sank away from his enemy's touch, like a phantom in a dreadful dream.

The mountain storm raged again, and passed again. The awful mountain-voices died away, the moon rose, and the soft and silent snow fell.

Two men and two large dogs came out at the door of the Hospice. The men looked carefully around them, and up at the sky. The dogs rolled in the snow, and took it into their mouths, and cast it up with their paws.

One of the men said to the other: "We may venture now. We may find them in one of the five Refuges." Each fastened on his back a basket; each took in his hand a strong spiked pole; each girded under his arms a looped end of a stout rope, so that they were tied together.

Suddenly the dogs desisted from their gambols in the snow, stood looking down the ascent, put their noses up, put their noses down, became greatly excited, and broke into a deep, loud bay together.

The two men looked in the faces of the two dogs. The two dogs looked, with at least equal intelligence, in the faces of the two men.

"Au secours, then! Help! To the rescue!" cried the two men. The two dogs, with a glad, deep generous bark, bounded away.

"Two more mad ones!" said the men, stricken motionless, and looking away into the moonlight. "Is it possible in such weather! And one of them a woman!"

Each of the dogs had the corner of a woman's dress in its mouth, and drew her along. She fondled their heads as she came up, and she came up through the snow with an accustomed tread. Not so the large man with her, who was spent and winded.

"Dear guides, dear friends of travelers! I am of your country. We seek two gentlemen crossing the Pass, who should have reached the Hospice this evening."

"They have reached it, ma'amselle."

"Thank Heaven! O thank Heaven!"

"But unhappily, they have gone on again. We are setting forth to seek them even now. We had to wait until the Tourmente passed. It has been fearful up here."

"Dear guides, dear friends of travelers! Let me go with you. Let me go with you, for the love of God! One of those gentlemen is to be my husband. I love him, O so dearly. O so dearly! You see I am not faint, you see I am not tired. I am born a peasant-girl. I will show you that I know well how to fasten myself to your ropes. I will do it with my own hands. I will swear, to be brave and good. But let me go with you, let me go with you! If any mischance should have befallen him, my love would find him, when nothing else could. On my knees, dear friends of travelers! By the love your dear mothers had for your fathers!"

The good rough fellows were moved. "After all," they murmured to one another, "she speaks but the truth. She knows the ways of the mountains. See how marvelously she has come here! But as to Monsieur there, ma'amselle?"

"Dear Mr. Joey," said Marguerite, addressing him in his own tongue, "you will remain at the house, and wait for me; will you not?"

"If I know'd which o' you two recommended it," growled Joey Ladle, eying the two men with great indignation, "I'd fight you for sixpence, and give you half a crown for your expenses. No, miss, I'll stick by you as long as there's any sticking left in me, and I'll die for you when I can't do better."

The state of the moon rendering it highly important that no time should be lost, and the dogs showing signs of great uneasiness, the two men quickly took their resolution. The rope that yoked them together was exchanged for a longer one; the party were secured, Marguerite second, and the Cellarman last; and they set out for the Refuges. The actual distance of those places was nothing; the whole five and the next Hospice to boot, being within two miles; but the ghastly way was whitened out and sheeted over.

They made no miss in reaching the Gallery where the two had taken shelter. The second storm of wind and snow had so wildly swept over it since, that their tracks were gone. But the dogs went to and fro with their noses down, and were confident. The party stopping, however, at the farther arch, where the second storm had been especially furious, and where the drift was deep, the dogs became troubled, and went about and about, in quest of a lost purpose.

The great abyss being known to lie on the right, they wandered too much to the left, and had to regain the way with infinite labor through a deep field of snow. The leader of the line had stopped it, and was taking note of the landmarks, when one of the dogs fell to tearing up the snow, a little before them. Advancing and stooping to look at it, thinking that some one might be overwhelmed there, they saw that it was stained, and that the stain was red.

The other dog was now seen to look over the brink of the gulf, with his forelegs straightened out, lest he should fall into it, and to tremble in every limb. Then the dog who had found the stained snow joined him, and then they ran to and fro, distressed and whining. Finally, they both stopped on the brink together, and setting up their heads, howled dolefully.

"There is some one lying below," said Marguerite.

"I think so," said the foremost man. "Stand well inward, the two last, and let us look over."

The last man kindled two torches from his basket, and handed them forward. The leader taking one, and Marguerite the other, they looked down; now shading the torches, now moving them to the right or left, now raising them, now depressing them, as moonlight far below contended with black shadows. A piercing cry from Marguerite broke a long silence.

"My God! On a projecting point, where a wall of ice stretches forward over the torrent, I see a human form!"

"Where, ma'amselle, where?"

"See, there! On the shelf of ice below the dogs!"

The leader, with a sickened aspect, drew inward, and they were all silent. But they were not all inactive, for Marguerite, with swift and skillful fingers, had detached both herself and him from the rope in a few seconds.

"Show me the baskets. These two are the only ropes?"

"The only ropes here, ma'amselle; but at the Hospice—"

"If he is alive—I know it is my lover—he will be dead before you can return. Dear Guides! Blessed friends of travelers! Look at me. Watch my hands. If they falter or go wrong, make me your prisoner by force. If they are steady and go right, help me to save him!"

She girded herself with a cord under the breast and arms, she formed it into a kind of jacket, she drew it into knots, she laid its end side by side with the end of the other cord, she twisted and twined the two together, she knotted them together, she set her foot upon the knots, she strained them, she held them for the two men to strain at.

"She is inspired," they said to one another.

"By the Almighty's mercy!" she exclaimed. "You both know that I am by far the lightest here. Give me the brandy and the wine, and lower me down to him. Then go for assistance and a stronger rope. You see that when it is lowered to me—look at this about me now—I can make it fast and safe to his body. Alive or dead, I will bring him up, or die with him. I love him passionately. Can I say more?"

They turned to her companion, but he was lying senseless on the snow.

"Lower me down to him," she said, taking two little kegs they had brought, and hanging them about her, "or I will dash myself to pieces! I am a peasant, and I know no giddiness or fear; and this is nothing to me, and I passionately love him. Lower me down!"

"Ma'amselle, ma'amselle, he must be dying or dead."

"Dying or dead, my husband's head shall lie upon my breast, or I will dash myself to pieces."

They yielded, overborne. With such precautions as their skill and the circumstances admitted, they let her slip from the summit, guiding herself down the precipitous icy wall with her hand, and they lowered down, and lowered down, and lowered down, until the cry came up: "Enough!"

"Is it really he, and is he dead?" they called down, looking over.

The cry came up: "He is insensible; but his heart beats. It beats against mine."

"How does he lie?"

The cry came up: "Upon a ledge of ice. It has thawed beneath him, and it will thaw beneath me. Hasten. If we die, I am content."

One of the two men hurried off with the dogs at such topmost speed as he could make; the other set up the lighted torches in the snow, and applied himself to recovering the Englishman. Much snow-chafing and some brandy got him on his legs, but delirious and quite unconscious where he was.

The watch remained upon the brink, and his cry went down continually: "Courage! They will soon be here. How goes it?" And the cry came up: "His heart still beats against mine. I warm him in my arms. I have cast off the rope, for the ice melts under us, and the rope would separate me from him; but I am not afraid."

The moon went down behind the mountain-tops, and all the abyss lay in darkness. The cry went down: "How goes it?" The cry came up: "We are sinking lower, but his heart still beats against mine."

At length, the eager barking of the dogs, and a flare of light upon the snow, proclaimed that help was coming on. Twenty or thirty men, lamps, torches, litters, ropes, blankets, wood to kindle a great fire, restoratives and stimulants, came in fast. The dogs ran from one man to another, and from this thing to that, and ran to the edge of the abyss, dumbly entreating Speed, speed, speed!

The cry went down: "Thanks to God, all is ready. How goes it?"

The cry came up: "We are sinking still, and we are deadly cold. His heart no longer beats against mine. Let no one come down, to add to our weight. Lower the rope only."

The fire was kindled high, a great glare of torches lighted the sides of the precipice, lamps were lowered, a strong rope was lowered. She could be seen passing it round him, and making it secure.

The cry came up into a deathly silence: "Raise! Softly!" They could see her diminished figure shrink, as he swung into the air.

They gave no shout when some of them laid him on a litter, and others lowered another strong rope. The cry again came up into a deathly silence: "Raise! Softly!" But when they caught her at the brink, then they shouted, then they wept, then they gave thanks to Heaven, then they kissed her feet, then they kissed her dress, then the dogs caressed her, licked her icy hands, and with their honest faces warmed her frozen bosom!

She broke from them all, and sank over him on his litter, with both her loving hands upon the heart that stood still.

ACT IV.

THE CLOCK-LOCK.

THE pleasant scene was Neuchâtel; the pleasant month was April; the pleasant place was a notary's office; the pleasant person in it was the notary: a rosy, hearty, handsome old man, chief notary of Neuchâtel, known far and wide in the canton as Maître Voigt. Professionally and personally, the notary was a popular citizen. His innumerable kindnesses and his innumerable oddities had for years made him one of the recognized public characters of the pleasant Swiss town. His long brown frock-coat and his black skull-cap were among the institutions of the place; and he carried a snuff-box which, in point of size, was popularly believed to be without a parallel in Europe.

There was another person in the notary's office, not so pleasant as the notary. This was Obenreizer.

An oddly pastoral kind of office it was, and one that would never have answered in England. It stood in a neat back yard, fenced off from a pretty flower-garden. Goats browsed in the door-way, and a cow was within half a dozen feet of keeping company with the clerk. Maître Voigt's room was a bright and varnished little room, with paneled walls, like a toy-chamber. According to the seasons of the year, roses, sun-flowers, hollyhocks, peeped in at the windows. Maître Voigt's bees hummed through the office all the summer, in at this window and out of that, taking it frequently in their day's work, as if honey were to be made from Maître Voigt's sweet disposition. A large musical box on the chimney-piece often thrilled away at the Overture to Fra Diavolo, or a selection from William Tell, with a chirruping liveliness that had to be stopped by force on the entrance of a client, and irrepressibly broke out again the moment his back was turned.

"Courage, courage, my good fellow!" said Maître Voigt, patting Obenreizer on the knee, in a fatherly and comforting way. "You will begin a new life to-morrow morning in my office here."

Obenreizer—dressed in mourning and subdued in manner—lifted his hand, with a white handkerchief in it, to the region of his heart. "The gratitude is here," he said: "But the words to express it are not here."

"Ta-ta-ta! Don't talk to me about gratitude!" said Maître Voigt. "I hate to see a man oppressed. I see you oppressed, and I hold out my hand to you by instinct. Besides, I am not too old yet to remember my young days. Your father sent me my first client. (It was on a question of half an acre of vineyard that seldom bore any grapes.) Do I owe nothing to your father's son? I owe him a debt of friendly obligation, and I pay it to you. That's rather neatly expressed, I think," added Maître Voigt, in high good-humor with himself. "Permit me to reward my own merit with a pinch of snuff!"

Obenreizer dropped his eyes to the ground, as though he were not even worthy to see the notary take snuff.

"Do me one last favor, sir," he said, when he raised his eyes. "Do not act on impulse. Thus far, you have only a general knowledge of my position. Hear the case for and against me, in its details, before you take me into your office. Let my claim on your benevolence be recognized by your sound reason as well as by your excellent heart. In that case, I may hold up my head against the bitterness of my enemies, and build myself a new reputation on the ruins of the character I have lost."

"As you will," said Maître Voigt. "You speak well, my son. You will be a fine lawyer one of these days."

"The details are not many," pursued Obenreizer. "My troubles begin with the accidental death of my late traveling companion, my lost dear friend, Mr. Vendale."

"Mr. Vendale," repeated the notary. "Just so. I have heard and read of the name, several times within these two months. The name of the unfortunate English gentleman who was killed on the Simplon. When you got that scar upon your cheek and neck."

"—From my own knife," said Obenreizer, touching what must have been an ugly gash at the time of its infliction.

"From your own knife," assented the notary, "and in trying to save him. Good, good, good. That was very good. Vendale. Yes. I have several times, lately, thought it droll that I should once have had a client of that name."

"But the world, sir," returned Obenreizer, "is so small!" Nevertheless, he made a mental note that the notary had once had a client of that name.

"As I was saying, sir, the death of that dear traveling comrade begins my troubles. What follows? I save myself. I go down to Milan. I am received with coldness by Defresnier & Company. Shortly afterward, I am discharged by Defresnier & Company. Why? They give no reason why. I ask, do they assail my honor? No answer. I ask, what is the imputation against me? No answer. I ask, where are their proofs against me? No answer. I ask, what am I to think? The reply is, 'M. Obenreizer is free to think what he will. What M. Obenreizer thinks, is of no importance to Defresnier & Company.' And that is all."

"Perfectly. That is all," assented the notary, taking a large pinch of snuff.

"But is that enough, sir?"

"That is not enough," said Maître Voigt. "The House of Defresnier are my fellow-townsmen,—much respected, much esteemed,—but the House of Defresnier must not silently destroy a man's character. You can rebut assertion. But how can you rebut silence?"

"Your sense of justice, my dear patron," answered Obenreizer, "states in a word the cruelty of the case. Does it stop there? No. For, what follows upon that?"

"True, my poor boy," said the notary, with a comforting nod or two; "your ward rebels upon that."

"Rebels is too soft a word," retorted Obenreizer. "My ward revolts from me with horror. My ward defies me. My ward withdraws herself from my authority, and takes shelter (Madame Dor with her) in the house of that English lawyer, Mr. Bintrey, who replies to your summons to her to submit herself to my authority, that she will not do so."

"—And who afterward writes," said the notary, moving his large snuff-box to look among the papers underneath it for the letter, "that he is coming to confer with me."

"Indeed?" replied Obenreizer, rather checked. "Well, sir. Have I no legal rights?"

"Assuredly, my poor boy," returned the notary. "All but felons have their legal rights."

"And who calls me felon?" said Obenreizer, fiercely.

"No one. Be calm under your wrongs. If the House of Defresnier would call you felon, indeed, we should know how to deal with them."

While saying these words, he had handed Bintrey's very short letter to Obenreizer, who now read it and gave it back.

"In saying," observed Obenreizer, with recovered composure, "that he is coming to confer with you, this English lawyer means that he is coming to deny my authority over my ward."

"You think so?"

"I am sure of it. I know him. He is obstinate and contentious. You will tell me, my dear sir, whether my authority is unassailable, until my ward is of age?"

"Absolutely unassailable."

"I will enforce it. I will make her submit herself to it. For," said Obenreizer, changing his angry tone to one of grateful submission, "I owe it to you, sir; to you, who have so confidently taken an injured man under your protection, and into your employment."

"Make your mind easy," said Maître Voigt. "No more of this now, and no thanks! Be here to-morrow morning before the other clerk comes—between seven and eight. You will find me in this room; and I will myself initiate you in your work. Go away! go away! I have letters to write. I won't hear a word more."

Dismissed with this generous abruptness, and satisfied with the favorable impression he had left on the old man's mind, Obenreizer was at leisure to revert to the mental note he had made that Maître Voigt once had a client whose name was Vendale.

"I ought to know England well enough by this time," so his meditations ran, as he sat on a bench in the yard; "and it is not a name I ever encountered there, except"—he looked involuntarily over his shoulder—"as his name. Is the world so small that I can not get away from him, even now when he is dead? He confessed at the last that he had betrayed the trust of the dead and misinherited a fortune. And I was to see to it. And I was to stand off, that my face might remind him of it. Why my face, unless it concerned me? I am sure of his words, for they have been in my ears ever since. Can there be any thing bearing on them, in the keeping of this old idiot? Any thing to repair my fortunes, and blacken his memory? He dwelt upon my earliest remembrances, that night at Basle. Why, unless he had a purpose in it?"

Maître Voigt's two largest he-goats were butting at him to butt him out of the place, as if for that disrespectful mention of their master. So he got up and left the place. But he walked alone for a long time on the border of the lake, with his head drooped in deep thought.

Between seven and eight next morning he presented himself again at the office. He found the notary ready for him, at work on some papers which had come in on the previous evening. In a few clear words, Maître Voigt explained the routine of the office, and the duties Obenreizer would be expected to perform. It still wanted five minutes to eight when the preliminary instructions were declared to be complete.

"I will show you over the house and the offices," said Maître Voigt, "but I must put away these papers first. They come from the municipal authorities, and they must be taken special care of."

Obenreizer saw his chance, here, of finding out the repository in which his employer's private papers were kept.

"Can't I save you the trouble, sir?" he asked. "Can't I put those documents away under your directions?"

Maître Voigt laughed softly to himself; closed the portfolio in which the papers had been sent to him; handed it to Obenreizer.

"Suppose you try," he said. "All my papers of importance are kept yonder."

He pointed to a heavy oaken door, thickly studded with nails, at the lower end of the room. Approaching the door with the portfolio, Obenreizer discovered to his astonishment that there were no means whatever of opening it from the outside. There was no handle, no bolt, no key, and (climax of passive obstruction!) no key-hole.

"There is a second door to this room?" said Obenreizer, appealing to the notary.

"No," said Maître Voigt. "Guess again."

"There is a window?"

"Nothing of the sort. The window has been bricked up. The only way in is the way by that door. Do you give it up?" cried Maître Voigt, in high triumph. "Listen, my good fellow, and tell me if you hear nothing inside?"

Obenreizer listened for a moment, and started back from the door.

"I know!" he exclaimed. "I heard of this when I was apprenticed here at the watch-maker's. Perrin Brothers have finished their famous clock-lock at last—and you have got it."

"Bravo!" said Maître Voigt. "The clock-lock it is! There, my son! There, you have one more of what the good people of this town call, 'Daddy Voigt's follies.' With all my heart! Let those laugh who win. No thief can steal my keys. No burglar can pick my lock. No power on earth, short of a battering-ram or a barrel of gunpowder, can move that door, till my little sentinel inside—my worthy friend who goes 'Tick, Tick,' as I tell him—says, 'Open!' The big door obeys the little Tick, Tick, and the little Tick, Tick, obeys me. That!" cried Daddy Voigt, snapping his fingers, "for all the thieves in Christendom!"

"May I see it in action?" asked Obenreizer. "Pardon my curiosity, dear sir! You know that I was once a tolerable worker in the clock trade."

"Certainly you shall see it in action," said Maître Voigt. "What is the time now? One minute to eight. Watch, and in one minute you will see the door open of itself."

In one minute, smoothly and slowly and silently, as if invisible hands had set it free, the heavy door opened inward, and disclosed a dark chamber beyond. On three sides, shelves filled the walls, from floor to ceiling. Arranged on the shelves, were rows upon rows of boxes made in the pretty inlaid wood-work of Switzerland, and bearing inscribed on their fronts (for the most part in fanciful colored letters) the names of the notary's clients.

Maître Voigt lighted a taper, and led the way into the room.

"You shall see the clock," he said, proudly. "I possess the greatest curiosity in Europe. It is only a privileged few whose eyes can look at it. I give the privilege to your good father's son,—you shall be one of the favored few who enter the room with me. See! here it is, on the right-hand wall at the side of the door."

"An ordinary clock," exclaimed Obenreizer. "No! Not an ordinary clock. It has only one hand."

"Aha!" said Maître Voigt. "Not an ordinary clock, my friend. No, no. That one hand goes round the dial. As I put it, so it regulates the hour at which the door shall open. See! The hand points to eight. At eight the door opened, as you saw for yourself."

"Does it open more than once in the four-and-twenty hours?" asked Obenreizer.

"More than once?" repeated the notary with great scorn. "You don't know, my good friend, Tick, Tick! He will open the door as often as I ask him. All he wants is his directions, and he gets them here. Look below the dial. Here is a half-circle of steel let into the wall, and here is a hand (called the regulator) that travels round it, just as my hand chooses. Notice, if you please, that there are figures to guide me on the half-circle of steel. Figure I. means: Open once in the four-and-twenty hours. Figure II. means: Open twice; and so on the end. I set the regulator every morning, after I have read my letters, and when I know what my day's work is to be. Would you like to see me set it now? What is to-day? Wednesday. Good! This is the day of our rifle-club; there is little business to do; I grant a half-holiday. No work here to-day, after three o'clock. Let us first put away this portfolio of municipal papers. There! No need to trouble 'Tick, Tick' to open the door until eight to-morrow. Good! I leave the dial-hand at eight; I put back the regulator to 'I.' I close the door; and closed the door remains, past all opening by any body, till to-morrow morning at eight."

Obenreizer's quickness instantly saw the means by which he might make the clock-lock betray its master's confidence, and place its master's papers at his disposal.

"Stop, sir!" he cried, at the moment when the notary was closing the door. "Don't I see something moving among the boxes,—on the floor there?"

"There is nothing!" said Maître Voigt. "Your troubles have shaken your nerves, my son. Some shadow thrown by my taper; or some poor little beetle, who lives among the old lawyer's secrets, running away from the light. Hark! I hear your fellow-clerk in the office. To work! to work! and build to-day the first step that leads to your new fortunes!"

He good-humoredly pushed Obenreizer out before him; extinguished the taper, with a last fond look at his clock which passed harmlessly over the regulator beneath; and closed the oaken door.

At three the office was shut up. The notary and every body in the notary's employment, with one exception, went to see the rifle-shooting. Obenreizer had pleaded that he was not in spirits for a public festival. Nobody knew what had become of him. It was believed that he had slipped away for a solitary walk.

The house and offices had been closed but a few minutes, when the door of a shining wardrobe, in the notary's shining room, opened, and Obenreizer stepped out. He walked to a window, unclosed the shutters, satisfied himself that he could escape unseen by way of the garden, turned back into the room, and took his place in the notary's easy-chair. He was locked up in the house, and there were five hours to wait before eight o'clock came.

He wore his way through the five hours: sometimes reading the books and newspapers that lay on the table, sometimes thinking, sometimes walking to and fro. Sunset came on. He closed the window-shutters before he kindled a light. The candle lighted, and the time drawing nearer and nearer, he sat, watch in hand, with his eyes on the oaken door.

At eight, smoothly and softly and silently the door opened.

One after another, he read the names on the outer rows of boxes. No such name as Vendale! He removed the outer row, and looked at the row behind. These were older boxes, and shabbier boxes. The four first that he examined, were inscribed with French and German names. The fifth bore a name which was almost illegible. He brought it out into the room, and examined it closely. There, covered thickly with time-stains and dust, was the name: "Vendale."

The key hung to the box by a string. He unlocked the box, took out four loose papers that were in it, spread them open on the table, and began to read them. He had not so occupied a minute, when his face fell from its expression of eagerness and avidity, to one of haggard astonishment and disappointment. But, after a little consideration, he copied the papers. He then replaced the papers, replaced the box, closed the door, extinguished the candle, and stole away.

As his murderous and thievish footfall passed out of the garden, the steps of the notary and some one accompanying him stopped at the front door of the house. The lamps were lighted in the little street, and the notary had his door-key in his hand.

"Pray do not pass my house, Mr. Bintrey," he said. "Do me the honor to come in. It is one of our town half-holidays—our Tir—but my people will be back directly. It is droll that you should ask your way to the Hotel of me. Let us eat and drink before you go there."

"Thank you: not to-night," said Bintrey.

"Shall I come to you at ten to-morrow?"

"I shall be enchanted, sir, to take so early an opportunity of redressing the wrongs of my injured client," returned the good notary.

"Yes," retorted Bintrey; "your injured client is all very well—but a word in your ear."

He whispered to the notary, and walked off. When the notary's housekeeper came home, she found him standing at his door motionless, with the key still in his hand, and the door unopened.

OBENREIZER'S VICTORY.

The scene shifts again—to the foot of the Simplon, on the Swiss side.

In one of the dreary rooms of the dreary little inn at Brieg, Mr. Bintrey and Maître Voigt sat together at a professional council of two. Mr. Bintrey was searching in his dispatch-box. Maître Voigt was looking toward a closed door, painted brown to imitate mahogany, and communicating with an inner room.

"Isn't it time he was here?" asked the notary, shifting his position, and glancing at a second door at the other end of the room, painted yellow to imitate deal.

"He is here," answered Bintrey, after listening for a moment.

The yellow door was opened by a waiter, and Obenreizer walked in.

After greeting Maître Voigt with a cordiality which appeared to cause the notary no little embarrassment, Obenreizer bowed with grave and distant politeness to Bintrey. "For what reason have I been brought from Neuchâtel to the foot of the mountain?" he inquired, taking the seat which the English lawyer had indicated to him.

"You shall be quite satisfied on that head before our interview is over," returned Bintrey. "For the present, permit me to suggest proceeding at once to business. There has been a correspondence, Mr. Obenreizer, between you and your niece. I am here to represent your niece."

"In other words, you, a lawyer, are here to represent an infraction of the law."

"Admirably put!" said Bintrey. "If all the people I have to deal with were only like you, what an easy profession mine would be! I am here to represent an infraction of the law,—that is your point of view. I am here to make a compromise between you and your niece,—that is my point of view."

"There must be two parties to a compromise," rejoined Obenreizer. "I decline, in this case, to be one of them. The law gives me authority to control my niece's actions, until she comes of age. She is not yet of age; and I claim my authority."

At this point Maître Voigt attempted to speak. Bintrey silenced him with a compassionate indulgence of tone and manner, as if he was silencing a favorite child.

"No, my worthy friend, not a word. Don't excite yourself unnecessarily; leave it to me." He turned, and addressed himself again to Obenreizer. "I can think of nothing comparable to you, Mr. Obenreizer, but granite,—and even that wears out in course of time. In the interests of peace and quietness,—for the sake of your own dignity,—relax a little. If you will only delegate your authority to another person whom I know of, that person may be trusted never to lose sight of your niece, night or day!"

"You are wasting your time and mine," returned Obenreizer. "If my niece is not rendered up to my authority within one week from this day, I invoke the law. If you resist the law, I take her by force."

He rose to his feet as he said the last word. Maître Voigt looked round again toward the brown door which led into the inner room.

"Have some pity on the poor girl," pleaded Bintrey. "Remember how lately she lost her lover by a dreadful death! Will nothing move you?"

"Nothing."

Bintrey in his turn rose to his feet, and looked at Maître Voigt. Maître Voigt's hand, resting on the table, began to tremble. Maître Voigt's eyes remained fixed, as if by irresistible fascination, on the brown door. Obenreizer, suspiciously observing him, looked that way too.

"There is somebody listening in there!" he exclaimed, with a sharp backward glance at Bintrey.

"There are two people listening," answered Bintrey.

"Who are they?"

"You shall see."

With that answer, he raised his voice and spoke the next words,—the two common words which are on every body's lips, at every hour of the day: "Come in!"

The brown door opened. Supported on Marguerite's arm—his sunburnt color gone, his right arm bandaged and thrown over his breast—Vendale stood before the murderer, a man risen from the dead.

In the moment of silence that followed, the singing of a caged bird in the court-yard outside was the one sound stirring in the room. Maître Voigt touched Bintrey, and pointed to Obenreizer. "Look at him!" said the notary, in a whisper.

The shock had paralyzed every movement in the villain's body, but the movement of the blood. His face was like the face of a corpse. The one vestige of color left in it was a livid purple streak which marked the course of the scar, where his victim had wounded him on the cheek and neck. Speechless, breathless, motionless alike in eye and limb, it seemed as if, at the sight of Vendale, the death to which he had doomed Vendale had struck him where he stood.

"Somebody ought to speak to him," said Maître Voigt. "Shall I?"

Even at that moment, Bintrey persisted in silencing the notary, and in keeping the lead in the proceedings to himself. Checking Maître Voigt by a gesture, he dismissed Marguerite and Vendale in these words: "The object of your appearance here is answered," he said. "If you will withdraw for the present, it may help Mr. Obenreizer to recover himself."

It did help him. As the two passed through the door, and closed it behind them, he drew a deep breath of relief. He looked round him for the chair from which he had risen, and dropped into it.

"Give him time!" pleaded Maître Voigt.

"No," said Bintrey. "I don't know what use he may make of it, if I do." He turned once more to Obenreizer, and went on. "I owe it to myself," he said,—"I don't admit, mind, that I owe it to you,—to account for my appearance in these proceedings, and to state what has been done under my advice, and on my sole responsibility. Can you listen to me?"

"I can listen to you."

"Recall the time when you started for Switzerland with Mr. Vendale," Bintrey began. "You had not left England four-and-twenty hours before your niece committed an act of imprudence which not even your penetration could foresee. She followed her promised husband on his journey, without asking any body's advice or permission, and without any better companion to protect her than a Cellarman in Mr. Vendale's employment."

"Why did she follow me on the journey? and how came the Cellarman to be the person who accompanied her?"

"She followed you on the journey," answered Bintrey, "because she suspected there had been some serious collision between you and Mr. Vendale, which had been kept secret from her; and because she rightly believed you to be capable of serving your interests, or of satisfying your enmity, at the price of a crime. As for the Cellarman, he was one, among the other people in Mr. Vendale's establishment to whom she had applied (the moment your back was turned) to know if any thing had happened between their master and you. The Cellarman alone had something to tell her. A senseless superstition, and a common accident which had happened to his master in his master's cellar, had connected Mr. Vendale in this man's mind with the idea of danger by murder. Your niece surprised him into a confession, which aggravated tenfold the terrors that possessed her. Aroused to a sense of the mischief he had done, the man, of his own accord, made the one atonement in his power. 'If my master is in danger, Miss,' he said, 'it's my duty to follow him, too; and it's more than my duty to take care of you.' The two set forth together,—and, for once, a superstition has had its use. It decided your niece on taking the journey; and it led the way to saving a man's life. Do you understand me, so far?"

"I understand you, so far."

"My first knowledge of the crime that you had committed," pursued Bintrey, "came to me in the form of a letter from your niece. All you need know is that her love and her courage recovered the body of your victim, and aided the after-efforts which brought him back to life. While he lay helpless at Brieg, under her care, she wrote to me to come out to him. Before starting, I informed Madame Dor that I knew Miss Obenreizer to be safe, and knew where she was. Madame Dor informed me, in return, that a letter had come for your niece, which she knew to be in your handwriting. I took possession of it, and arranged for the forwarding of any other letters which might follow. Arrived at Brieg, I found Mr. Vendale out of danger, and at once devoted myself to hastening the day of reckoning with you. Defresnier & Company turned you off on suspicion; acting on information privately supplied by me.

Having stripped you of your false character, the next thing to do was to strip you of your authority over your niece. To reach this end, I not only had no scruple in digging the pitfall under your feet in the dark,—I felt a certain professional pleasure in fighting you with your own weapons. By my advice, the truth has been carefully concealed from you, up to this day. By my advice, the trap into which you have walked was set for you (you know why, now, as well as I do) in this place. There was but one certain way of shaking the devilish self-control which has hitherto made you a formidable man. That way has been tried, and (look at me as you may) that way has succeeded. The last thing that remains to be done," concluded Bintrey, producing two little slips of manuscript from his dispatch-box, "is to set your niece free. You have attempted murder, and you have committed forgery and theft. We have the evidence ready against you in both cases. If you are convicted as a felon, you know as well as I do what becomes of your authority over your niece. Personally, I should have preferred taking that way out of it. But considerations are pressed on me which I am not able to resist, and this interview must end, as I have told you already, in a compromise. Sign those lines, resigning all authority over Miss Obenreizer, and pledging yourself never to be seen in England or in Switzerland again; and I will sign an indemnity which secures you against further proceedings on our part."

Obenreizer took the pen in silence, and signed his niece's release. On receiving the indemnity in return, he rose, but made no movement to leave the room. He stood looking at Maître Voigt with a strange smile gathering at his lips, and a strange light flashing in his filmy eyes.

"What are you waiting for?" asked Bintrey.

Obenreizer pointed to the brown door. "Call them back," he answered. "I have something to say in their presence before I go."

"Say it in my presence," retorted Bintrey.

"I decline to call them back."

Obenreizer turned to Maître Voigt. "Do you remember telling me that you once had an English client named Vendale?" he asked.

"Well," answered the notary. "And what of that?"

"Maître Voigt, your clock-lock has betrayed you."

"What do you mean?"

"I have read the letters and certificates in your client's box. I have taken copies of them. I have got the copies here. Is there, or is there not, a reason for calling them back?"

For a moment the notary looked to and fro, between Obenreizer and Bintrey, in helpless astonishment. Recovering himself, he drew his brother-lawyer aside, and hurriedly spoke a few words close at his ear. The face of Bintrey—after first faithfully reflecting the astonishment on the face of Maître Voigt—suddenly altered its expression. He sprang, with the activity of a young man, to the door of the inner room, entered it, remained inside for a minute, and returned followed by Marguerite and Vendale. "Now, Mr. Obenreizer," said Bintrey, "the last move in the game is yours. Play it."

"Before I resign my position as that young lady's guardian," said Obenreizer, "I have a secret to reveal in which she is interested. In making my disclosure, I am not claiming her attention for a narrative which she, or any other person present, is expected to take on trust. I am possessed of written proofs, copies of originals, the authenticity of which Maître Voigt himself can attest. Bear that in mind, and permit me to refer you, at starting, to a date long past,—the month of February, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six."

"Mark the date, Mr. Vendale," said Bintrey.

"My first proof," said Obenreizer, taking a paper from his pocket-book. "Copy of a letter, written by an English lady (married) to her sister, a widow. The name of the person writing the letter I shall keep suppressed until I have done. The name of the person to whom the letter is written I am willing to reveal. It is addressed to 'Mrs. Jane Ann Miller, of Groombridge Wells, England.'"

Vendale started, and opened his lips to speak. Bintrey instantly stopped him, as he had stopped Maître Voigt. "No," said the pertinacious lawyer. "Leave it to me."

Obenreizer went on:

"It is needless to trouble you with the first half of the letter," he said. "I can give the substance of it in two words. The writer's position at the time is this. She has been long living in Switzerland with her husband,—obliged to live there for the sake of her husband's health. They are about to move to a new residence on the Lake of Neuchâtel in a week, and they will be ready to receive Mrs. Miller as visitor in a fortnight from that time. This said, the writer next enters into an important domestic detail. She has been childless for years—she and her husband have now no hope of children; they are lonely; they want an interest in life; they have decided on adopting a child. Here the important part of the letter begins; and here, therefore, I read it to you word for word."

He folded back the first page of the letter and read as follows:

"... Will you help us, my dear sister, to realize our new project? As English people, we wish to adopt an English child. This may be done, I believe, at the Foundling; my husband's lawyers in London will tell you how. I leave the choice to you, with only these conditions attached to it,—that the child is to be an infant under a year old, and is to be a boy. Will you pardon the trouble I am giving you, for my sake; and will you bring our adopted child to us, with your own children, when you come to Neuchâtel?"

"I must add a word as to my husband's wishes in this matter. He is resolved to spare the child whom we make our own, any future mortification and loss of self-respect which might be caused by a discovery of his true origin. He will bear my husband's name, and he will be brought up in the belief that he is really our son. His inheritance of what we have to leave will be secured to him,—not only according to the laws of England in such cases, but according to the laws of Switzerland also; for we have lived so long in this country, that there is a doubt whether we may not be considered as 'domiciled' in Switzerland. The one precaution left to take is to prevent any after-discovery at the Foundling. Now, our name is a very uncommon one; and if we appear on the Register of the Institution, as the persons adopting the child, there is just a chance that something might result from it. Your name, my dear, is the name of thousands of other people; and if you will consent to appear on the Register, there need be no fear of any discoveries in that quarter. We are moving, by the doctor's orders, to a part of Switzerland in which our circumstances are quite unknown; and you, as I understand, are about to engage a new nurse for the journey when you come to see us. Under these circumstances, the child may appear as my child, brought back to me under my sister's care. The only servant we take with us from our old home is my own maid, who can be safely trusted. As for the lawyers in England and in Switzerland, it is their profession to keep secrets,—and we may feel quite easy in that direction. So there you have our harmless little conspiracy! Write by return of post, my love, and tell me you will join it."

"Do you still conceal the name of the writer of that letter?" asked Vendale.

"I keep the name of the writer till the last," answered Obenreizer, "and I proceed to my second proof—a mere slip of paper, this time, as you see. Memorandum given to the Swiss lawyer, who drew the documents referred to in the letter I have just read, expressed as follows: 'Adopted from the Foundling Hospital of England, 3d March, 1836, a male infant, called, in the Institution, Walter Wilding. Person appearing on the register, as adopting the child, Mrs. Jane Ann Miller, widow, acting in this matter for her married sister, domiciled in Switzerland.' Patience!" resumed Obenreizer, as Vendale, breaking loose from Bintrey, started to his feet. "I shall not keep the name concealed much longer. Two more little slips of paper, and I have done. Third proof! Certificate of Dr. Ganz, still living in practice at Neuchâtel, dated July, 1838. The doctor certifies (you shall read it for yourselves directly), first, that he attended the adopted child in its infant maladies; second, that, three months before the date of the certificate, the gentleman adopting the child as his son died; third, that on the date of the certificate, his widow and her maid, taking the adopted child with them, left Neuchâtel on their return to England. One more link now added to this, and my chain of evidence is complete. The maid remained with her mistress till her mistress's death, only a few years since. The maid can swear to the identity of the adopted infant, from his childhood to his youth,—from his youth to his manhood, as he is now. There is her address in England,—and there, Mr. Vendale, is the fourth, and final proof!"

"Why do you address yourself to me?" said Vendale, as Obenreizer threw the written address on the table.

Obenreizer turned on him, in a sudden frenzy of triumph.

"Because you are the man! If my niece marries you, she marries a bastard, brought up by public charity. If my niece marries you, she marries an impostor, without name or lineage, disguised in the character of a gentleman of rank and family."

"Bravo!" cried Bintrey. "Admirably put, Mr. Obenreizer! It only wants one word more to complete it. She marries,—thanks entirely to your exertions, a man who inherits a handsome fortune, and a man whose origin will make him prouder than ever of his peasant-wife. George Vendale, as brother-executors, let us congratulate each other! Our dear dead friend's last wish on earth is accomplished. We have found the lost Walter Wilding. As Mr. Obenreizer said just now,—you are the man!"

The words passed by Vendale unheeded. For the moment he was conscious of but one sensation; he heard but one voice. Marguerite's hand was clapping his. Marguerite's voice was whispering to him: "I never loved you, George, as I love you now!"

THE CURTAIN FALLS.

MAY-DAY. There is merry-making in Cripple Corner, the chimney smokes, the patriarchal dining-hall is hung with garlands, and Mrs. Goldstraw, the respected housekeeper, is very busy. For, on this bright morning, the young master of Cripple Corner is married to its young mistress, far away: to wit, in the little town of Brieg, in Switzerland, lying at the foot of the Simplon Pass, where she saved his life.

The bells ring gayly in the little town of Brieg, and flags are stretched across the street, and rifle shots are heard, and sounding music from brass instruments. Streamer-decorated casks of wine have been rolled out under a gay awning in the public way before the Inn, and there will be free feasting and revelry. What with bells and banners, draperies hanging from windows, explosion of gunpowder, and reverberation of brass music, the little town of Brieg is all in a flutter, like the hearts of its simple people.

It was a stormy night last night, and the mountains are covered with snow. But the sun is bright to-day, the sweet air is fresh, the tin spires of the little town of Brieg are burnished silver, and the Alps are ranges of far-off white cloud in a deep blue sky.

The primitive people of the little town of Brieg have built a greenwood arch across the street, under which the newly married pair shall pass in triumph from the church. It is inscribed, on that side, "HONOR AND LOVE TO MARGUERITE VENDELE!" for the people are proud of her to enthusiasm. This greeting of the bride under her new name is affectionately meant as a surprise, and therefore the arrangement has been made that she, unconscious why, shall be taken to the Church by a tortuous back way. A scheme not difficult to carry into execution in the crooked little town of Brieg.

So all things are in readiness, and they are to go and come on foot. Assembled in the Inn's best chamber, festively adorned, are the bride and bridegroom, the Neuchâtel notary, the London lawyer, Madame Dor, and a certain large mysterious Englishman, popularly known as Monsieur Zhoe-Ladelle. And behold Madame Dor, arrayed in a spotless pair of gloves of her own, with no hand in the air, but both hands clasped round the neck of the bride; to embrace whom Madame Dor has turned her broad back on the company, consistent to the last.

"Forgive me, my beautiful," pleads Madame Dor, "for that I ever was his she-cat!"

"She-cat, Madame Dor?"

"Engaged to sit watching my so charming mouse," are the explanatory words of Madame Dor, delivered with a penitential sob.

"Why, you were our best friend! George, dearest, tell Madame Dor. Was she not our best friend?"

"Undoubtedly, darling. What should we have done without her?"

"You are both so generous," cries Madame Dor, accepting consolation, and immediately relapsing. "But I commenced as a she-cat."

"Ah! But like the cat in the fairy-story, good Madame Dor," says Vendale, saluting her cheek, "you were a true woman. And, being a true woman, the sympathy of your heart was with true love."

"I don't wish to deprive Madame Dor of her share in the embraces that are going on," Mr. Bintrey puts in, watch in hand, "and I don't presume to offer any objection to your having got yourselves mixed together, in the corner there, like the three Graces. I merely remark that I think it's time we were moving. What are your sentiments on that subject, Mr. Ladle?"

"Clear, sir," replies Joey, with a gracious grin. "I'm clearer altogether, sir, for having lived so many weeks upon the surface. I never was half so long upon the surface afore, and it's done me a power of good. At Cripple Corner, I was too much below it. Atop of the Simpleton, I was a deal too high above it. I've found the medium here, sir. And if ever I take it in convivial, in all the rest of my days, I mean to do it this day to the toast of 'Bless 'em both.'"

"I, too!" says Bintrey. "And now, Monsieur Voigt, let you and me be two men of Mar-seilles, and allons, marchons, arm-in-arm!"

They go down to the door, where others are waiting for them, and they go quietly to the church, and the happy marriage takes place. While the ceremony is yet in progress, the notary is called out. When it is finished, he has returned, is standing behind Vendale, and touches him on the shoulder.

"Go to the side door, one moment, Monsieur Vendale. Alone. Leave Madame to me."

At the side door of the church are the same two men from the Hospice. They are snow-stained and travel-worn. They wish him joy, and then each lays his broad hand upon Vendale's breast, and one says in a low voice, while the other steadfastly regards him—

"It is here, Monsieur. Your litter. The very same."

"My litter is here? Why?"

"Hush! For the sake of Madame. Your companion of that day—"

"What of him?"

The man looks at his comrade, and his comrade takes him up. Each keeps his hand laid earnestly on Vendale's breast.

"He had been living at the first Refuge, Monsieur, for some days. The weather was now good, now bad."

"Yes?"

"He arrived at our Hospice the day before yesterday, and, having refreshed himself with sleep on the floor before the fire, wrapped in his cloak, was resolute to go on, before dark, to the next Hospice. He had a great fear of that part of the way, and thought it would be worse to-morrow."

"Yes?"

"He went on alone. He had passed the Gallery, when an avalanche,—like that which fell behind you near the Bridge of the Ganthier—"

"Killed him?"

"We dug him out, suffocated and broken all to pieces! But, Monsieur, as to Madame. We have brought him here on the litter, to be buried. We must ascend the street outside. Madame must not see. It would be an accursed thing to bring the litter through the arch across the street, until Madame has passed through. As you descend, we who accompany the litter will set it down on the stones of the street the second to the right, and will stand before it. But do not let Madame turn her head toward the street the second to the right. There is no time to lose. Madame will be alarmed by your absence. Adieu!"

Vendale returns to his bride and draws her hand through his unmaimed arm. A pretty procession awaits them at the main door of the church. They take their station in it, and descend the street amidst the ringing of the bells, the firing of the guns, the waving of the flags, the playing of the music, the shouts, the smiles, and tears, of the excited town. Heads are uncovered as she passes, hands are kissed to her, all the people bless her. "Heaven's benediction on the dear girl! See where she goes in her youth and beauty; she who so nobly saved his life!"

Near the corner of the street the second to the right he speaks to her, and calls her attention to the windows on the opposite side. The corner well passed, he says: "Do not look round, my darling, for a reason that I have," and turns his head. Then, looking back along the street, he sees the litter and its bearers passing up alone under the arch, as he and she and their marriage train go down toward the shining valley.

CORD AND CREESE;

OR,

THE BRANDON MYSTERY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE DODGE CLUB."

CHAPTER XVIII.

INQUIRIES.

So many years had elapsed since Brandon had last been in the village which bore the family name that he had no fear of being recognized. He had been a boy then, he was now a man. His features had passed from a transition state into their maturer form, and a thick beard and mustache, the growth of the long voyage, covered the lower part of the face like a mask. His nose which, when he left, had a boyish roundness of outline, had since become refined and chiseled into the straight, thin Grecian type. His eyes alone remained the same, yet the expression had grown different, even as the soul that looked forth through them had been changed by experience and by suffering.

He gave himself out at the inn as an American merchant, and went out to begin his inquiries. Tearing two buttons off his coat, he entered the shop of the village tailor.

"Good-morning," said he, civilly.

"Good-morning, Sir; fine morning, Sir," answered the tailor, volubly. He was a little man, with a cast in his eye, and on looking at Brandon he had to put his head on one side, which he did with a quick, odd gesture.

"There are two buttons off my coat, and I want to know if you can repair it for me?"

"Certainly, Sir; certainly. Take off your coat, Sir, and sit down."

"The buttons," said Brandon, "are a little odd; but if you have not got any exactly like them, any thing similar will do."

"Oh, I think we'll fit you out, Sir. I think we'll fit you out," rejoined the tailor, briskly.

He bustled about among his boxes and drawers, pulled out a large number of articles, and finally began to select the buttons which were nearest like those on the coat.

"This is a fine little village," said Brandon, carelessly.

"Yes, Sir; that's a fact, Sir; that's just what every body says, Sir."

"What old Hall is that which I saw just outside the village?"

"Ah, Sir, that old Hall is the very best in the whole county. It is Brandon Hall, Sir."

"Brandon Hall?"

"Yes, Sir."

"I suppose this village takes the name from the Hall—or is it the Hall that is named after the village?"

"Well, neither, Sir. Both of them were named after the Brandon family."

"Is it an old family? It must be, of course."

"The oldest in the county, Sir."

"I wonder if Mr. Brandon would let a stranger go through his grounds? There is a hill back of the house that I should like to see."

"Mr. Brandon!" exclaimed the tailor, shaking his head; "Mr. Brandon! There ain't no Mr. Brandon now!"

"How is that?"

"Gone, Sir—ruined—died out."

"Then the man that lives there now is not Mr. Brandon?"

"Nothing of the kind, Sir! He, Sir! Why he isn't fit to clean the shoes of any of the old Brandons!"

"Who is he?"

"His name, Sir, is Potts."

"Potts! That doesn't sound like one of your old county names."

"I should think not, Sir. Potts! Why, Sir, he's generally believed in this here community to be a villain, Sir," said the little tailor, mysteriously, and with the look of a man who would like very well to be questioned further.

Brandon humored him. "How is that?"

"It's a long story, Sir."

"Oh, well—tell it. I have a great curiosity to hear any old stories current in your English villages. I'm an American, and English life is new to me."

"I'll bet you never heard any thing like this in all your born days."

"Tell it then, by all means."

The tailor jumped down from his seat, went mysteriously to the door, looked cautiously out, and then returned.

"It's just as well to be a little careful," said he, "for if that man knew that I was talking about him he'd take it out of me quick enough, I tell you."

"You seem to be afraid of him."

"We're all afraid of him in the village, and hate him; but I hope to God he'll catch it yet!"

"How can you be afraid of him? You all say that this is a free country."

"No man, Sir, in any country, is free, except he's rich. Poor people can be oppressed in many ways; and most of us are in one way or other dependent on him. We hate him all the worse, though. But I'll tell you about him."

"Yes, go on."

"Well, Sir, old Mr. Brandon, about twenty years ago, was one of the richest men in the county. About fifteen years ago the man Potts turned up, and however the old man took a fancy to him I never could see, but he did take a fancy to him, put all his money in some tin mines that Potts had started, and the end of it was Potts turned out a scoundrel, as every one said he would, swindled the old man out of every penny, and ruined him completely. Brandon had to sell his estate, and Potts bought it with the very money out of which he had cheated the old man."

"Oh! impossible!" said Brandon. "Isn't that some village gossip?"

"I wish it was, Sir—but it ain't. Go ask any man here, and he'll tell you the same."

"And what became of the family?" asked Brandon, calmly.

"Ah, Sir! that is the worst part of it."

"Why?"

"I'll tell you, Sir. He was ruined. He gave up all. He hadn't a penny left. He went out of the Hall and lived for a short time in a small house at the other end of the village. At last he spent what little money he had left, and they all got sick. You wouldn't believe what happened after that."

"What was it?"

"They were all taken to the alms-house."

A burst of thunder seemed to sound in Brandon's ears as he heard this, which he had never even remotely imagined. The tailor was occupied with his own thoughts, and did not notice the wildness that for an instant appeared in Brandon's eyes. The latter for a moment felt paralyzed and struck down into nothingness by the shock of that tremendous intelligence.

"The people felt dreadfully about it," continued the tailor, "but they couldn't do any thing. It was Potts who had the family taken to the alms-house. Nobody dared to interfere."

"Did none of the county families do any thing?" said Brandon, who at last, by a violent effort, had regained his composure.

"No. They had all been insulted by the old man, so now they let him suffer."

"Had he no old friends, or even acquaintances?"

"Well, that's what we all asked ourselves,

"YOU ARE, SIR. JOHN POTTS OF POTTS HALL."

Sir; but at any rate, whether he had or not, they didn't turn up—that is, not in time. There was a young man here when it was too late."

"A young man?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Was he a relative?"

"Oh no, Sir, only a lawyer's clerk; wanted to see about business I dare say. Perhaps to collect a bill. Let me see; the lawyer who sent him was named Thornton."

"Thornton!" said Brandon, as the name sank into his soul.

"Yes; he lived at Holby."

Brandon drew a long breath.

"No, Sir; no friends came, whether he had any or not. They were all sick at the alms-house for weeks."

"And I suppose they all died there?" said Brandon, in a strange, sweet voice.

"No, Sir. They were not so happy."

"What suffering could be greater?"

"They do talk dreadfully in this town, Sir; and I dare say it's not true, but if it is it's enough to make a man's blood run cold."

"You excite my curiosity. Remember I am an American, and these things seem odd to me. I always thought your British aristocrats could not be ruined."

"Here was one, Sir, that was, any how."

"Go on."

"Well, Sir, the old man died in the alms-house. The others got well. As soon as they were well enough they went away."

"How did they get away?"

"Potts helped them," replied the tailor, in a peculiar tone. "They went away from the village."

"Where did they go?"

"People say to Liverpool. I only tell what I know. I heard young Bill Potts, the old fellow's son, boasting one night at the inn where he was half-drunk, how they had served the Brandons."

He said they wanted to leave the village, so his father helped them away to America."

"To America?"

"Yes, Sir."

Brandon made no rejoinder.

"Bill Potts said they went to Liverpool and then left for America to make their fortunes."

"What part of America?" asked Brandon, indifferently. "I never saw or heard of them."

"Didn't you, Sir?" asked the tailor, who evidently thought that America was like some English county, where every body may hear of every body else. "That's odd, too. I was going to ask you if you had."

"I wonder what ship they went out in?"

"That I can't say, Sir. Bill Potts kept dark about that. He said one thing, though, that set us thinking."

"What was that?"

"Why, that they went out in an emigrant ship as steerage passengers."

Brandon was silent.

"Poor people!" said he at last.

By this time the tailor had finished his coat and handed it back to him. Having obtained all the information that the man could give Brandon paid him and left.

Passing by the inn he walked on till he came to the alms-house. Here he stood for a while and looked at it.

Brandon alms-house was small, badly planned, badly managed, and badly built, every thing done there was badly and meanly done. It was whitewashed from the topmost point of every chimney down to the lowest edge of the basement. A whitened sepulchre. For there was foulness there, in the air, in the surroundings, in every thing. Squalor and dirt reigned. His heart grew sick as those hideous walls rose before his sight.

Between this and Brandon Hall there was a difference, a distance almost immeasurable; to garden. A little cove gave shelter to small vessels, and around this cove was the village of Brandon.

Brandon Hall was one of the oldest and most magnificent of the great halls of England. As Brandon looked upon it it rose before him amidst the groves of six hundred years, its many-gabled roof rising out from amidst a sea of foliage, speaking of wealth, luxury, splendor, power, influence, and all that men hope for, or struggle for, or fight for; from all of which he and his had been cast out; and the one who had done this was even now occupying the old ancestral seat of his family.

Brandon entered the gate, and walked up the long avenue till he reached the Hall. Here he rang the bell, and a servant appeared. "Is Mr. Potts at home?"

"Yes," said the man, brusquely.

"I wish to see him."

"Who shall I say?"

"Mr. Hendricks, from America."

The man showed him into the drawing-room. Brandon seated himself and waited. The room was furnished in the most elegant manner, most of the furniture being old, and all familiar to him. He took a hasty glance around, and closed his eyes as if to shut it all out from sight.

In a short time a man entered.

He appeared to be between fifty and sixty years of age, of medium size, broad-shouldered and stout. He had a thoroughly plebeian air; he was dressed in black, and had a bunch of large seals dangling from beneath his waistcoat. His face was round and fleshy, his eyes were small, and his head was bald. The general expression of his face was that of good-natured simplicity. As he caught sight of Brandon a frank smile of welcome arose on his broad, fat face.

Brandon rose and bowed.

"Am I addressing Mr. John Potts?"

"You are, Sir. John Potts of Potts Hall."

"Potts of Potts Hall!" repeated Brandon. Then, drawing a card from his pocket he handed it to Potts. He had procured some of these in London. The card read as follows:

BEAMISH & HENDRICKS,
FLOUR MERCHANTS & PROVISION DEALERS,
88 FRONT STREET, CINCINNATI, OHIO.

"I, Sir," said Brandon, "am Mr. Hendricks, junior partner in Beamish & Hendricks, and I hope you are quite well."

"Very well, thank you," answered Potts, smiling and sitting down. "I am happy to see you."

"Do you keep your health, Sir?"

"Thank you, I do," said Potts. "A touch of rheumatism at odd times, that's all."

Brandon's manner was stiff and formal, and his voice had assumed a slight nasal intonation. Potts had evidently looked on him as a perfect stranger.

"I hope, Sir, that I am not taking up your valuable time. You British noblemen have your valuable time, I know, as well as we business men."

"No, Sir, no, Sir, not at all," said Potts, evidently greatly delighted at being considered a British nobleman.

"Well, Sir John—or is it my lord?" said Brandon, interrogatively, correcting himself, and looking inquiringly at Potts.

"Sir John'll do," said Potts.

"Well, Sir John. Being in England on business, I came to ask you a few questions about a matter of some importance to us."

"Proceed, Sir!" said Potts, with great dignity.

"There's a young man that came into our employ last October whom we took a fancy to, or rather my senior did, and we have an idea of promoting him. My senior thinks the world of him, has the young man at his house, and he is even making up to his daughter. He calls himself Brandon—Frank Brandon."

At this Potts started from an easy lounging attitude, in which he was trying to "do" the British noble, and with startling intensity of gaze looked Brandon full in the face.

"I think the young man is fairish," continues Brandon, "but nothing extraordinary. He is industrious and sober, but he ain't quick, and he never had any real business experience till he came to us. Now, my senior from the very first was infatuated with him, gave him a large salary, and, in spite of my warnings that he ought to be cautious, he wants to make him head-clerk, with an eye to making him partner next year. And so bent on this is he that I know he would dissolve partnership with me if I refused, and leave him all his money when he dies. That's no small sum, for old Mr. Beamish is worth in real estate round Cincinnati over two millions of dollars. So, you see, I have a right to feel anxious, more especially as I don't mind telling you, Sir John, who understand these matters, that I thought I had a very good chance myself with old Beamish's daughter."

Brandon spoke all this very rapidly, and with the air of one who was trying to conceal his feelings of dislike to the clerk of whom he was so jealous. Potts looked at him with an encouraging smile, and asked, as he stopped,

"And how did you happen to hear of me?"

"That's just what I was coming to, Sir John!"

Brandon drew his chair nearer, apparently in deep excitement, and in a more nasal tone than ever, with a confidential air, he went on:

"You see, I mistrusted this young man who was carrying every thing before him with a high hand, right in my very teeth, and I watched him. I pumped him to see if I couldn't get him to tell something about himself. But the fellow was always on his guard, and always told the same story. This is what he tells: He says that his father was Ralph Brandon of Brandon Hall, Devonshire, and that he got very poor—he was ruined, in fact, by—I beg your pardon, Sir John, but he says it was you, and that you drove the family away. They then came over to America, and he got to Cincinnati. The old man, he says, died before they left, but he won't tell what became of the others. I confess I believed it was all a lie, and didn't think there was any such place as Brandon Hall, so I determined to find out, naturally enough, Sir John, when two millions were at stake."

Potts winked.
"Well, I suddenly found my health giving way, and had to come to Europe. You see what a delicate creature I am!"

Potts laughed with intense glee.
"And I came here after wandering about, trying to find it. I heard at last that there was a place that used to be Brandon Hall, though most people call it Potts Hall. Now, I thought, my fine young man, I'll catch you; for I'll call on Sir John himself and ask him."

"You did right, Sir," said Potts, who had taken an intense interest in this narrative. "I'm the very man you ought to have come to. I can tell you all you want. This Brandon is a miserable swindler."

"Good! I thought so. You'll give me that, Sir John, over your own name, will you?" cried Brandon, in great apparent excitement.

"Of course I will," said Potts, "and a good deal more. But tell me, first, what that young devil said as to how he got to Cincinnati? How did he find his way there?"

"He would never tell."

"What became of his mother and sister?"

"He wouldn't say."

"All I know," said Potts, "is this, I got official information that they all died at Quebec."

Brandon looked suddenly at the floor and gasped. In a moment he had recovered.

"Curse him! then this fellow is an impostor?"

"No," said Potts, "he must have escaped. It's possible. There was some confusion at Quebec about names."

"Then his name may really be Frank Brandon?"

"It must be," said Potts. "Anyhow, the others are all right."

"Are what?"

"All right; dead you know. That's why he don't like to tell you about them."

"Well, now, Sir John, could you tell me what you know about this young man, since you think he must be the same one?"

"I know he must be, and I'll tell you all about him and the whole cursed lot. In the first place," continued Potts, clearing his throat, "old Brandon was one of the cursedest old fools that ever lived. He was very well off but wanted to get richer, and so he speculated in a tin mine in Cornwall. I was acquainted with him at the time and used to respect him. He persuaded me—I was always off-handed about money, and a careless, easy fellow—he persuaded me to invest in it also. I did so, but at the end of a few years I found out that the tin mine was a rotten concern, and sold out. I sold at a very high price, for people believed it was a splendid property. After this I found another mine and made money hand over fist. I warned old Brandon, and so did every body, but he didn't care a fig for what we said, and finally, one fine morning, he waked up and found himself ruined."

"He was more utterly ruined than any man I ever knew of, and all his estates were sold. I had made some money, few others in the county had any ready cash, the sale was forced, and I bought the whole establishment at a remarkably low figure. I got old Brandy—Brandy was a nickname I gave the old fellow—I got him a house in the village, and supported him for a while with his wife and daughter and his great lubberly boy. I soon found out what vipers they were. They all turned against their benefactor, and dared to say that I had ruined their father. In fact, my only fault was buying the place, and that was an advantage to old Brandy rather than an injury. It shows, though, what human nature is."

"They all got sick at last, and as they had no one to nurse them, I very considerably sent them all to the alms-house, where they had good beds, good attendance, and plenty to eat and drink. No matter what I did for them they abused me. They reviled me for sending them to a comfortable home, and old Brandy was the worst of all. I used to go and visit him two or three times a day, and he always cursed me. Old Brandy did get awfully profane, that's a fact. The reason was his infernal pride. Look at me, now! I'm not proud. Put me in the alms-house, and would I curse you? I hope not."

"At last old Brandy died; and of course I had to look out for the family. They seemed thrown on my hands, you know, and I was too good-natured to let them suffer, although they treated me so abominably. The best thing I could think of was to ship them all off to America, where they could all get rich. So I took them to Liverpool."

"Did they want to go?"

"They didn't seem to have an idea in their heads. They looked and acted just like three born fools."

"Strange!"

"I let a friend of mine see about them, as I had considerable to do, and he got them a passage."

"I suppose you paid their way out?"

"I did, Sir," said Potts, with an air of munificence; "but, between you and me, it didn't cost much."

"I should think it must have cost a considerable sum."

"Oh no! Clark saw to that. Clark got them places as steerage passengers."

"Young Brandon told me once that he came out as cabin passenger."

"That's his cursed pride. He went out in the steerage, and a devilish hard time he had too."

"Why?"

"Oh, he was a little crowded, I think! There were six hundred emigrants on board the Tecumseh."

"The what?"

"The Tecumseh. Clark did that business neatly. Each passenger had to take his own provisions, so he supplied them with a lot. Now what do you think he gave them?"

"I can't imagine."

"He bought them some damaged bread at one quarter the usual price. It was all mouldy, you know," said Potts, trying to make Brandon see the joke. "I declare Clark and I roared over it for a couple of months, thinking how surprised they must have been when they sat down to eat their first dinner."

"That was very neat," rejoined Brandon.

"They were all sick when they left," said Potts; "but before they got to Quebec they were sicker, I'll bet."

"Why so?"

"Did you ever hear of ship-fever?" said Potts, in a low voice which sent a sharp thrill through every fibre of Brandon's being. He could only nod his head.

"Well, the Tecumseh, with her six hundred passengers, afforded an uncommon fine field for the ship-fever. That's what I was going to observe. They had a great time at Quebec last summer; but it was unanimously voted that the Tecumseh was the worst ship of the lot. I sent out an agent to see what had become of my three friends, and he came back and told me all. He said that about four hundred of the Tecumseh's passengers died during the voyage, and ever so many more after landing. He obtained a list of the dead from the quarantine records, and among them were those of these three youthful Brandons. Yes, they joined old Cognac pretty soon—lovely and pleasant in their lives, and in death not divided. But this young devil that you speak of must have escaped. I dare say he did, for the confusion was awful."

"But couldn't there have been another son?"

"Oh no. There was another son, the eldest, the worst of the whole lot, so infernally bad that even old Brandy himself couldn't stand it, but packed him off to Botany Bay. It's well he went of his own accord, for if he hadn't the law would have sent him there at last transported for life."

"Perhaps this man is the same one."

"Oh no. This eldest Brandy is dead."

"Are you sure?"

"Certain—best authority. A business friend of mine was in the same ship with him. Brandy was coming home to see his friends. He fell overboard and my friend saw him drown. It was in the Indian Ocean."

"When was that?"

"Last September."

"Oh, then this one must be the other of course!"

"No doubt of that, I think," said Potts, cheerily.

Brandon rose. "I feel much obliged, Sir John," said he, stiffly, and with his usual nasal tone, "for your kindness. This is just what I want. I'll put a stop to my young man's game. It's worth coming to England to find out this."

"Well, when you walk him out of your office, give him my respects and tell him I'd be very happy to see him. For I would, you know. I really would."

"I'll tell him so," said Brandon, "and if he is alive perhaps he'll come here."

"Ha! ha! ha!" roared Potts.

"Ha! ha!" laughed Brandon, and pretending not to see Potts's outstretched hand, he bowed and left. He walked rapidly down the avenue. He felt stifled. The horrors that had been revealed to him had been but in part anticipated. Could there be any thing worse?

He left the gates and walked quickly away, he knew not where. Turning into a by-path he went up a hill and finally sat down. Brandon Hall lay not far away. In front was the village and the sea beyond it. All the time there was but one train of thoughts in his mind. His wrongs took shape and framed themselves into a few sharply defined ideas. He muttered to himself over and over the things that were in his mind: "Myself disinherited and exiled! My father ruined and broken-hearted! My father killed! My mother, brother, and sister banished, starved, and murdered!"

He, too, as far as Potts's will was concerned, had been slain. He was alone and had no hope that any of his family could survive. Now, as he sat there alone, he needed to make his plans for the future. One thing stood out prominently before him, which was that he must go immediately to Quebec to find out finally and absolutely the fate of the family.

Then could any thing else be done in England? He thought over the names of those who had been the most intimate friends of his father—Thornton, Langhetti, Despard. Thornton had neglected his father in his hour of need. He had merely sent a clerk to make inquiries after all was over. The elder Langhetti, Brandon knew, was dead. Where were the others? None of them, at any rate, had interfered.

There remained the family of Despard. Brandon was aware that the Colonel had a brother in the army, but where he was he knew not nor did he care. If he chose to look in the army register he might very easily find out; but why should he? He had never known or heard much of him in any way.

There remained Courtenay Despard, the son of Lionel, he to whom the MS. of the dead might be considered after all as chiefly devolving. Of him Brandon knew absolutely nothing, not even whether he was alive or dead.

For a time he discussed the question in his mind whether it might not be well to seek him out so as to show him his father's fate and gain his co-operation. But, after a few moments' consideration, he dismissed this thought. Why should he seek his help? Courtenay Despard, if alive, might be very unfit for the purpose. He might be timid, or indifferent, or dull, or indolent. Why make any advances to one whom he did not know? Afterward it might be well to find him, and see what might be done with or through him; but as yet there could be no reason whatever why he should take up his time in searching for him or in winning his confidence.

The end of it all was that he concluded whatever he did to do it by himself, with no human being as his confidant.

Only one or two persons in all the world knew that he was alive, and they were not capable, under any circumstances, of betraying him. And where now was Beatrice? In the power of this man whom Brandon had just left. Had she seen him as he came and went? Had she heard his voice as he spoke in that assumed tone? But Brandon found it necessary to crush down all thoughts of her.

One thing gave him profound satisfaction, and this was that Potts did not suspect him for an instant. And now how could he deal with Potts? The man had become wealthy and powerful. To cope with him needed wealth and power. How could Brandon obtain these? At the utmost he could only count upon the fifteen thousand pounds which Compton would remit. This would be as nothing to help him against his enemy. He had written to Compton that he had fallen overboard and been picked up, and had told the same to the London agents under the strictest secrecy, so as to be able to get the money which he needed. Yet after he got it all, what would be the benefit? First of all, wealth was necessary.

Now more than ever there came to his mind the ancestral letter which his father had inclosed to him—the message from old Ralph Brandon in the treasure-ship. It was a wild, mad hope; but was it unattainable? This he felt was now the one object that lay before him; this must first be sought after, and nothing else could be attempted or even thought of till it had been tried. If he failed, then other things might be considered.

Sitting there on his lonely height, in sight of his ancestral home, he took out his father's last letter and read it again, after which he once more read the old message from the treasure-ship.

"One league due north of a small islet north of the Islet of Santa Cruz north of San Salvador—I, Ralph Brandon in my ship Phoenix am becalmed and surrounded by a Spanish fleet. My ship is filled with spoyle the Plunder of III galleons—wealth the wh myghte purchase a kyngdom—treasure equal to an Emper's revenue—Gold and jewels in countless store—and God forbydde that it shall fall into y^e hands of y^e Enemye—I therefore Ralphe Brandon out of mine owne good wyl and intente and that of all my men sink this shippe rather than be taken alyve—I send this by my trusty seaman Peter Leggit who with IX others tolde off by lot will trye to escape in y^e Boate by nighte—If this cometh haply into y^e hands of my sonne Philip let him herebye knowe that in this place is all this treasure—y^e wh haply may yet be gathered from y^e sea—y^e Islet is knowne by III rockes that y^e pushed up like III needles from y^e sande—Ralph Brandon"

Five days afterward Brandon, with his Hindu servant, was sailing out of the Mersey River on his way to Quebec.

CHARLES LAMB'S WIT.

LAMB'S jests," says Hazlitt, "scald like tears; and he probes a question with a play upon words. Charles was frequently merry; but even at the back of his merriment there reposed a grave depth, in which rich colors and tender lights were inlaid. For his jests sprang from his sensibility, which was as open to pleasure as to pain."

On all occasions Lamb was equal to the emergency. "Once while waiting in the Highgate stage, a woman came to the door and inquired, in a stern voice, 'Are you quite full inside?' 'Yes, ma'am,' said Charles, in meek reply, 'quite; that plateful of Mrs. Gilman's pudding has quite filled us.'"

To Coleridge, "Bless you, old sophist, who next to human nature taught me all the corruption I was capable of knowing."

To Mrs. K., after expressing her love for her young children, and adding, tenderly, "And how do you like babies, Mr. Lamb?" "Boi-boi-boi, ma'am," was his reply. (Something in this latter breathes the spirit of another humorist, the funny Sydney Smith.)

Of an eccentric person he once said, "Why does not his guardian angel look to him? He deserves one; maybe he has tired him out."

It would be impossible in our space to draw attention to the fullness of thought, the variety, the quaint humor that characterize the "Essays of Elia." Who that knows the writings of Charles Lamb has not laughed over the "Dissertation upon Roast Pig," the ecstasy of Bobo when he tasted crackling for the first time, or "The Rejoicings upon the New Year's coming of Age," to which upon Pay-day came late, as he always does, and Doooms-day sent word "he might be expected?" Who has not felt a sympathy for those "poor blots, innocent blacknesses, those little Africans of our own growth, those almost clergy imps, who from their little pulpits (the tops of chimneys) preach a lesson of patience to all mankind," while reading the "Praise of Chimney-sweepers?" Or in more sober mood we have studied Hogarth afresh in his essay on that wonderful caricaturist; or had "Lear" presented to us outside the page of Shakspeare in that fine passage which occurs in the Essay on the Tragedies of the Poet.

Lamb once said of himself that his history "would go into an epigram." When we recall to mind the universal sympathy of the man, his boundless wit (never was wit less stinging—"the jests and conceits with which his brain was busy his heart turned into flowers"), his extensive friendships with all creeds and classes, we may perhaps sum up his whole character in this one sentence—Lamb the humanist.

AMERICAN TEA COMPANY
have just received
TWO FULL CARGOES
of the
FINEST NEW CROP TEAS.
22,000 Half Chests by Ship Golden State.
12,000 Half Chests by Ship George Shotton.

In addition to these large cargoes of Black and Japan Teas the Company are constantly receiving large invoices of the finest quality of Green Teas from the Moyune districts of China, which are unrivaled for fineness and delicacy of flavor, which they are selling at the following prices:

Oolong (black), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 per lb.

Mixed (green and black), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 per lb.

English Breakfast, 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10, $1 20 per lb.

Imperial (green), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.

Young Hyson (green), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.

Uncolored Japan, 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.

Gunpowder, $1 25; best, $1 50 per lb.

Coffees roasted and ground daily.

Ground Coffee, 20 cents, 25 cents, 30 cents, 35 cents; best, 40 cents per pound.

Hotels, saloons, boarding-house keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our

FRENCH BREAKFAST AND DINNER COFFEE, which we sell at the low price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 50 cents to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St., (Post-Office Box 5643), N. Y.

To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea Trade (previous to the establishment of the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,) we will start with the American Houses, leaving out of the account entirely the profits of the Chinese factors.

First. The American House in China or Japan makes large profits on their sales or shipments—and some of the richest retired merchants in this country have made their immense fortunes through their houses in China.

Second. The Banker makes large profits upon the foreign exchange used in the purchase of Teas.

Third. The Importer makes a profit of 30 to 50 per cent. in many cases.

Fourth. On its arrival here it is sold by the cargo, and the Purchaser sells it to the Speculator in invoices of 1000 to 2000 packages, at an average profit of about 10 per cent.

Fifth. The Speculator sells it to the Wholesale Tea Dealer in lines at a profit of 10 to 15 per cent.

Sixth. The Wholesale Tea Dealer sells it to the Wholesale Grocer in lots to suit his trade at a profit of about 10 per cent.

Seventh. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail Dealer at a profit of 15 to 25 per cent.

Eighth. The Retailer sells it to the Consumer for ALL THE PROFIT HE CAN GET.

When you have added to these EIGHT profits as many brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, and add the original cost of the Tea, it will be perceived what the consumer has to pay. And now we propose to show why we can sell so very much lower than small dealers.

We propose to do away with all these various profits and brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, with the exception of a small commission paid for purchasing to our correspondents in China and Japan, one cartage, and a small profit to ourselves—which, on our large sales, will amply pay us.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city. Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a Club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a Club say how much Tea or Coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price-List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete, send it to us by mail. We will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost—so that there need be no confusion in their distribution: each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the Club can divide equally among themselves.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford.

We send no complimentary package for clubs of less than thirty dollars.

COUNTRY CLUBS, Hand and Wagon Peddlers, and small stores (of which class we are supplying many thousands, all of which are doing well), can have their orders promptly and faithfully filled, and in case of Clubs, can have each party's name marked on their package and directed, by sending their orders to Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey street.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than thirty dollars had better send post-office drafts, or money, with their orders, to save the expense of collecting by express; but larger orders we will send by express, to collect on delivery.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third by sending directly to

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.

Beware of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are

BOGUS or IMITATIONS.

We have no branches, and do not in any case authorize the use of our name.

Post-Office Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York,

Have just Published:

THE HUGUENOT FAMILY. A Novel. By SARAH

TYTLER, Author of "Citoyenne Jacqueline," &c., &c.

12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

At once the warmest, richest, and sincerest of recent novels. The story is bright with skillfully-contrasted pictures, and full of mellow wisdom. Miss Tytler's rare merit of softly tempering between the domestic element in her story and the historical one is only matched by the rare power she has shown in the dramatic interpretation of nature—a point on which we speak the more fully and the more admiringly, that she has in certain passages called to our mind Tennyson and Browning, and has, in one or two instances at least, surpassed the former in truthfulness and breadth of rendering.—Spectator.

Such a book as "The Huguenot Family" ought to be called by a nobler name than "a novel." It claims analysis as a historical study of great value and beauty; and as a story—as an example of character-painting, of the close and delicate representation of the gifts and graces, the struggles and triumphs of the human heart—it has few, if any, superiors. Grand-mère Dupuy is the finest creation of English fiction since Romola. The Parson's daughters would do no discredit to Oliver Goldsmith.—Morning Post.

"The Huguenot Family" is well written, and there is originality and power displayed throughout the story.—Athenaeum.

This story is thoroughly charming and original—written in the pure and forcible language which has gained for the author a thoroughly appreciative circle of admirers.—Observer.

The author of "The Huguenot Family" is a writer of true, sweet, and original genius, and her book is one of permanent value, the interest of which repeated readings will not exhaust. We can recommend it, without any reserve, as sweet, and pure, and lofty. Among serious readers of all classes it will be a friend, not a passing acquaintance; while critical readers will be glad to note the steadiness with which the light of the author's faculty continues to shine.—Pall Mall Gazette.

It is full of well-drawn characters, has many situations that are original, and much excellent writing. It is, in fact, a beautiful story—pure, touching, and elevated in tone; one which any cultivated reader must peruse with interest and admiration.—Star.

TWO MARRIAGES. By DINAH MARIA

MULOCK (Mrs. CRAIK), Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," "Christian's Mistake," "A Noble Life," &c., &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

We have no hesitation in affirming the "Two Marriages" to

WHAT I SAW AFTER THE CHRISTMAS PUDDING.

I DREW this vision on a block of wood, To make my meaning clearly understood. For words I found were quite inadequate To paint my feelings in the dreaming state. I really can't make out now what could do it—The plums? the currants? or perhaps the suet? But altogether, I at once declare I don't know how I got to bed or where; This dawned upon me as I tried to think, And from the water-bottle vainly drink. I knew I'd stood, with latch-key in my hand, Staring at what I could not understand; In vain I tried to find the proper place—A hundred keyholes stared me in the face. I waited patiently until they'd done, And all resolved themselves back into one. The passage gained—I firmly do declare I saw a pudding bounding up the stair: A blue flame rose upon his greasy brow—I think I see him grinning at me now. I seized him quickly—he was just as quick, And changed himself into my candlestick. At last to bed I rolled—I don't know how, Sirs: Next morning I had on my boots and trousers; But oh! my bed, it seemed to be in motion, Heaving and rolling, like a troubled ocean; I felt, oh dear! while lying on my back, Exactly what I felt when in a smack Out fishing, with a party from the beach Who were made wretched—at a quarter each. When just upon the sheets, where they turn down, I saw the pudding with his visage brown, With currant eyes, and nose all made of plums, And almond teeth, with lemon-peel for gums; I shuddered, as I smelt him steaming hot, As if he'd risen boiling from the pot. "Begone!" said I, "you thing detestable, Beyond all things so indigestible!" "Ungrateful fool!" said he, with horrid grin, "Now you leave off, 'tis time I should begin: I am King Pudding! prince of all good feasts! Welcomed by all, except your gourmand beasts; And yet you dare to lay all at my door, Not counting up the feast you made before. 'Tis all put down upon your dinner card, And you shall hear it read before we part. The turtle soup was good, the punch all ice: I think, my friend, you took the turtle twice? Next came the turbot, firm as any rock, With which you took the Champagne and some hock; Next came the turkey—quite a monster bird! With sausage stomach, stuffed till quite absurd; And you were helped, Sir, to the very best—I mean the long, white slices from the breast. And then you turned your all-devouring gaze To all the entrées and the entrées; Then with the lady with the dark-blue eyes, You kept dividing sundry rich mince-pies; Saying, each pie had happiness in store, And pressed her on to take a little more. Next I appeared in burning brandy bed, Crowned with bright Christmas and his berries red; Didn't I yield you up a thumping slice, That quite precluded any helping twice? With blushing honors came the rich dessert—You peeled, and pared, and cracked, I assert; You drank the wines—they're all upon the carte—And were the last of all the gentlemen to start; You didn't know your hat, when you would go; The boy in buttons laughed—for you must know You bolted from the door, with frantic run, As if you had been fired from a gun. You've lost your watch, your purse, and umbrella, And there you be, a poor dyspeptic fellow, Defaming me, the king of all the feast, As if I, poor pudding, made you such a beast. I will not have the scandal laid to me, But will have great revenge—as you shall see." Quickly my room was filled with rabble rout, So much confused I could not make them out: A spectroscopic now gamboled in the air Close to my face—now here—now there. At last the pudding with his plummy snout Made a high bound, and put the candle out. Like a beef-steak, or good St. Lawrence, I Upon a gridiron continually did fry: Until the morning brought a sad reflection About the pudding, and his strong objection. At last I thought it might have been the wine—The fault I laid to pudding might be mine—The mince—the soup—in fact no one can say What was the fault upon that Christmas-day.

FACETIÆ.

THE BEST THING OUT—An aching tooth.

In a French translation of Shakespeare the passage, "Frailty, thy name is woman," is translated, "Made-moiselle Frailty is the name of the lady."

FOOD FOR THE IMAGINATION—Fancy Bread.

A fop at a theatre was staring at a man's wife the other evening with a lorgnette, when the married man took the printed card "Taken," which lay on a reserved seat near by, and held it up before his wife. The fellow looked no more.

WHAT I SAW AFTER EATING MY CHRISTMAS PUDDING.

Seal-skin waistcoats are undoubtedly warm, but for the cold weather we prefer the (h)otter-skin.

NOVEL DIETARY.

Dancers should make a light supper of fish-balls and pigeons' wings. Land surveyors need stakes and perch. Skaters must have iced water, and may occasionally have souse. Men of intemperate habits must avoid corned meat and alewives. Teachers of languages may be said to live on tongues and sounds. Carpenters should have plane food. Dentists like something that's filling. Chiropodists are fond of toe-martys. Jewelers often dispose of twelve to eighteen carats at one time. Paper-hangers always have rolls on their tables.

Some five-and-twenty years ago, when the West was but sparsely settled, it was a work of some difficulty to get a jury together, especially as the inhabitants were notoriously disinclined to the pleasures of litigation. The court had been forced to adjourn many times from day to day, because the sheriff as often came in and reported an incomplete panel. Finally things came to a crisis. The judge fixed a day beyond which no further forbearance could be exercised; and when that day arrived the enthusiastic sheriff rushed into the court-room, and exclaimed, "It's all right, your Honor. We'll have the jury by twelve o'clock. I've got eleven of them locked up in a barn, and we are running the twelfth with dogs!"

Some one tells a story of a steamboat passenger watching a revolving light of a light-house on the coast, and exclaiming, "Gosh! the wind blows that light out as fast as the man can strike it."

FASHIONS FOR THE STREET AFTER NIGHT-FALL.

A Wig—To come off at the least pull. A False Nose—That may be torn to shreds in the first onset. A False Eye—That may drop out when struck freely. A Cork Leg—That may fall off when kicked heartily. False Teeth—That may scatter at a convenient moment.

Two young ladies and Mr. Thaddeus O'Grady were conversing on age when one of them put the home question, "Which of us do you think the elder, Mr. G.?" "Sure," replied the gallant Irishman, "you both look younger than each other."

OPERA HATS.—We see it is proposed to make Opera hats of the cheap and durable stuff called "rep." Should this idea be carried out, our fashionable young men will be walking about the streets like snake-charmers with rep-tiles on their heads.

The superintendent of one of the Western railways lately discharged a conductor belonging to the road for giving a free pass. "What made you such a fool as to give a free pass?" asked a friend of the latter. "Well, you see," replied the conductor, "I got tired of riding alone, and gave a friend of mine a free pass to get him to go along for company."

MODERN DICTIONARY.

Water—A clear fluid once used as a drink. Honesty—An excellent joke. Tongue—A little horse that is continually running away. My Dear—An expression used by man and wife at the commencement of a quarrel. Police-man—A man employed by the corporation to sleep in the open air. Bargain—A ludicrous transaction, in which each party thinks he cheated the other. Doctor—A man who kills you to-day to save you from dying to-morrow. Editor—A poor wretch who empties his brain to fill his stomach. Wealth—The most respectable quality of men. Bonnet—The female head-dress for the front seats of the Opera. Esquire—Every body, yet nobody, equal to Colonel. Jury—Twelve prisoners in a box, to try one or more at the bar. State's Evidence—A wretch who is pardoned for being baser than his comrades. Modesty—A beautiful flower that flourishes in secret places. Lawyer—A learned gentleman who rescues your estate from your enemy and keeps it himself. The Grave—An ugly hole in the ground which lovers and poets wish they were in but take uncommon means to keep out of. Money—The god of the nineteenth century.

When is a literary work like a smoke?—When it comes in volumes.

The Grand Jury in the county of Tipperary, in Ireland, passed the following resolutions: Resolved, That the present jail is insufficient, and that another ought to be built. Resolved, That the materials of the old jail be employed in constructing the new one. Resolved, That the old jail shall not be taken down until the new one is finished.

What is the military definition of a kiss?—Report at head-quarters.

Sitting in a dining-saloon the other morning, daintily worrying the remains of a mutton-chop, a stranger entered and took a seat at one of the little white-covered tables. We knew him at a glance—one of those thin, angular, cadaverous, obstinate fellows, who delight in being contrary, short, snappish, and disagreeably eccentric. "I want a cup of coffee and some sausages," "It's the wrong season for sausages," blandly replied the urbane landlord; "they put the flesh of mad dogs in sausages now." "That's the kind I want, Sir," roared the sallow savage. "Wouldn't a nice plate of ham and eggs answer?" "No!" he belated, "if I can't get sausage I won't have anything." And the last we saw of the landlord he was earnestly inquiring at a neighboring shop for a few links of Bologna to feed his savage customer who preferred the flesh of mad dogs to ham and eggs.

A LASTING DOCUMENT—An iron will.

A wag, strolling with a friend through a country church-yard, called his attention to a grave, the stone of which had no name nor inscription on it.

"This," said H—, "is the grave of the notorious gambler, Mr. B—. You observe that there is no name recorded on the head-stone; but I think I could suggest an appropriate epitaph." "What would you suggest?" inquired his friend. "Waiting for the last trump!" was the reply.

Little Carrie, hearing her mother talking about naming the baby, said: "Mamma, why don't you name him Hallowed? It says in my prayer, 'Hallowed be thy name,' and I think it's a very pretty name, too."

TOO SMART FOR THE MINISTER.—An acquaintance of ours, who has a bright, keen little girl in her family, related to us yesterday the following incident:

The family were dining, when the conversation turned upon an excursion about to take place. A clergyman at the table spoke to the little girl, and asked her if she could repeat the alphabet backward. She said, "No, Sir," when the gentleman remarked, "Then you can't go on the excursion." She looked very demure for a moment, when she asked, "Can you say the Lord's Prayer backward?" "No, dear." "Then," replied the girl, "you can't go to heaven." Her interrogator stopped.

A WALKER'S DICTIONARY.—The mile-stones.

THE REASON WHY.

A lady once, whose love was sold, Asked if a reason could be told Why wedding-rings were made of gold. I venture to instruct her: Love and lightning are the same—On earth they glance, from heaven they came. Love is the soul's electric flame, And gold its best conductor.

"Shan't I see you hum from singing skule to-night, Jerushy?" "No, you shan't do no such thing; I don't want you nor your company, Reuben." "Praps you didn't exactly understand what I said?" "Yes, I did; you asked me if you mightn't see me hum." "W'y, no, I didn't; I only asked you how your marm was!"

"TWO OF A TRADE CAN NEVER AGREE."—This does not apply to gin and bitters.

THE BEST POSSESSION—Self-Possession.

Why is a bed the ground-work of endless falsehood?—You may lie and re-lie on it.

GOING TO SCHOOL—THE END OF THE HOLIDAYS.

"Come along, Master Charles! Oh dear, I thought the holidays would never be over."

The room on the morning of going back to school. Looks as if there had been some trouble in persuading the young gentleman to leave home.

"Well, my daughter, you are going to school to-day." "Yes, mamma; but not to study. You told Charles to study hard, so as to be a man. I don't want to be a man."

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1868, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

Home, Walking, and Children's Dresses.

Fig. 1.—Dress for girl 10 years old. Under-skirt of red cashmere. Over-skirt and high-necked waist of black and red velours. Trimming, rouleaux of red cashmere.

Fig. 2.—Dress for boy from 5 to 7 years old. Trowsers and frock of dark-blue cloth. Long-sleeved blouse of red cashmere. Hungarian boots. Round cap of blue cloth, trimmed with fur.

Fig. 3.—Skirt and short dress of dark-gray cloth, elaborately trimmed with black silk cord. Paletot of the same material.

Fig. 4.—Dress for little girl 2 years old. Frock of white cashmere, trimmed with blue silk. Hood and cloak of the same material.

Fig. 5.—Lady's walking dress. Dress and paletot of brown Empress cloth, trimmed with black silk rouleaux. Black velvet bonnet, with lace strings, and trimming of brown foliage.

See illustration, page 180.

This lamp mat is easily made, of simple materials. It consists of seven rosettes of red worsted cord, about one-fifth of an inch wide. Six of these rosettes, about three inches in diameter, are arranged around a rosette somewhat larger. The edge of the mat is ornamented with red worsted fringe. The rosettes are made separately. Begin in the centre; take a piece of cord and wind it around, sewing it together, then surround it with a row of loops. The beginning and end of the cord must be well fastened on the wrong side. The six outside rosettes, as is seen in the illustration, have four wound rows and ten loops on the edge. The larger rosette in the centre has five rows and eleven loops. The rosettes, when finished, are overhanded together on the wrong side, as shown in the illustration. A tuft of fringe, composed of five or six strands of red worsted, six inches long, is fastened to each loop of the outer edge.

Crochet Bell-Rope.

MATERIALS: 14 yards of hemp rope $1\frac{1}{4}$ inches wide; 5 oz. of 12-fold zephyr; 5 wooden rings, each $2\frac{1}{4}$ inches in diameter; 1 porcelain ring, $3\frac{1}{4}$ inches in diameter; some strong sewing silk.—This simple and durable bell-rope can be made of any color, to match the furniture of the room. It is worked over strong hemp rope with 12-fold zephyr. At intervals of eight inches a rope is knotted into three pairs of loops, while to the right and left another rope is put through these loops; at regular intervals the three ropes are also put through a ring. The original is about $2\frac{1}{4}$ yards long. To make this, cut the rope in two pieces, one of which should be five, and the other nine yards long. Then crochet over them in slip stitch, as shown in the illustration. Wind the thread around the rope, carrying it down behind the rope and bringing it up in front; then pull it through the loop as seen in the engraving. The shorter rope is bent at the middle, so as to appear like two ropes. Around this wind the larger rope, beginning about one and a third yards from the end. The width of the bell-rope, where the knots are made, is about seven inches. The knots are about six inches long, four inches above each knot. Carry all three of the ropes through a wooden ring that has been crocheted over in the same manner as the rope. Leave four inches again after the second knot, etc. Fasten the lower end of the rope to a wooden ring; at the same time attach the porcelain ring, which has also been covered over with crochet work.

This embroidery is executed on black or white lace, in whatever colored silk may be preferred. The coarseness of the silk must correspond with the thickness of the lace. Draw the silk through the holes of the lace, by taking one thread in the needle and passing over the next two holes. The \bullet and \times in the design indicate the places for inserting and taking out the needle. This kind of embroidery is well suited to cravats, tidies, doyleys, mats, etc.

Lamp Shade.

MATERIALS: String beads in three shades of green—white lace. This lamp shade is made of white lace covered with three shades of green beads, each one shade darker than the other. Each bead must be large enough to cover a hole of the lace. The upper and lower edges of the lamp shade are ornamented by bead stitches put on obliquely and close together. Those on the upper edge are sewed over something laid under to make it larger. Cut the lamp shade from lace the required size. Draw on this curved lines, as shown in the illustration, and turn the edge down, making a narrow hem; then sew the beads on the lace in oblique rows, following the rows of lace, leaving one or two holes between. The accompanying illustration distinctly shows the manner in which these beads are to be sewed on. Be careful to notice the curved lines which mark the limit of the different shades. Set a strand consisting of ten threads of green zephyr worsted and fine wire in the upper edge of the lamp shade, and cover this with beads put on obliquely and close together; and at the same time stitch over the narrow hem. The lower edge is surrounded by beads in the same way, but nothing is set therein, for which reason fewer beads are needed. For this border all the three shades are required.

Knitted Cover for Flat-Iron.

This cover is made of red and white worsted and white enameled buttons, and is intended to protect the iron from rust and dust when not in use. The original is made of red and white zephyr worsted, in the so-called clasp stitch. The following six rows are knitted back and forth as follows: 1st row of red worsted, all in purl stitch. 2d row in plain knitting; these two rows both look like purl stitch on the right side. 3d row of white worsted; knit four stitches plain, and slip two alternately; the thread must be behind the two slip stitches. From the 4th to the 6th row knit like the 3d row. Attention must be paid to the right and left side of the work, so that the rows knitted of white worsted appear on the right side like plain knitting. The two slip stitches in the former row are also slipped in these three rows, but on the wrong side the thread under these must be in front of the stitches. After the 6th row, two other rows like the 1st and 3d must be worked; then the design is changed, so that the two stitches are now in the middle of those worked with white worsted. The cover must be of the same size as the iron for which it is designed. To knit the bottom, cast on a row of stitches corresponding with the square side of the iron, and knit as has been before described. To make the point of the bottom, narrow, by knitting (on both sides) after the beginning and before the last stitch—two stitches in one. The upper cover of the iron, which is afterward sewed to the bottom, is knitted half-way in two parts. Begin each half on the wide side with the necessary amount of stitches; knit till sufficiently long; then take the whole number of stitches on one needle and finish the parts together, narrowing according to the shape of the iron. The edges of the opening are provided with small enameled buttons and loops, for fastening at the middle of the upper part. The part which covers the opening at the back is worked last. Take up the stitches from the bottom, and knit a piece as long as wanted, shaping it to fit to the iron. The upper part of the cover is sewed to the bottom; this seam, as well as the outer edge of the cover, is ornamented by single crochet, which is worked alternately with red and white worsted.

HOME, WALKING, AND CHILDREN'S DRESSES.

See illustration, page 180.

This embroidery is wrought with black or colored worsted on strong black or white lace, for ties, covers, etc. The illustration shows the manner of working, a kind of cross-stitch being employed. One stitch is seen half completed. To finish the same, put the needle in at ●, and draw it through at ×.

Crochet Cord Fringe.

This fringe may be used for trimming bed and cradle covers, curtains, etc. The original is made of round cotton cord, of the size shown in the illustration, and of knitting cotton (Estremadura, No. 4). For the first pattern of fringe work the lower row of loops. With the cord form a loop, and fasten it by means of a slip-stitch in crochet. Then work in this row two rows of button-hole stitch. The first row is made close and the second row loose, as is shown in the illustration. The last row is crocheted over in single crochet. The tufts of fringe, composed of six threads each seven inches long, are knotted in the lower row of loops. For the second pattern of fringe make a four-strand braid of the cord. On one side the cord is wound as is seen in the illustration; the other side is crocheted over with single crochet. The tufts of fringe are the same as in the first pattern of fringe.

Mirror for Completing Embroidery Patterns.

MANY embroidered patterns represent only a part of the whole, making it difficult to obtain an idea of the general effect of the design. The mirror shown in the illustration remedies this, and by means of an optical illusion reproduces the whole pattern from the small section given. For this two plates of fine looking-glass, each about $9\frac{1}{2}$ inches long, and $5\frac{1}{2}$ inches wide, are covered on the wrong side with linen, and joined together at the two narrow sides. A narrow binding is put on the outer edge. If these glasses are placed in the position shown in the engraving, close to the unfinished embroidery pattern, at an angle, the parts wanting will appear in the mirror, and the complete picture will be seen.

A LOAF OF BREAD.

BREAD deserves its metaphorical appellation of the stuff of life. The experience of ages has proved, and modern chemistry shows, that alone it is capable of nourishing the human body. It contains the three constituents, gluten, sugar, and oil, which are essential to the support of animal existence.

The ordinary process of making wheat bread consists of grinding the grains of wheat into powder, which, after sifting out the bran or husks of the seed, forms what is known as flour. This is then mixed with water and yeast into dough, and, after having been vigorously moved or kneaded, is placed in a warm situation to rise as it is called. It is then put into a hot oven and baked, after which it is ready for eating. The rising is nothing but a mechanical action, and consists of the separation of the particles of the dough by the gas, engendered by the fermentation, pushing its way through the yielding substance in its natural effort to escape.

The gas which produces this effect is generated by the action of the yeast upon the natural starch of the flour, which it converts first into sugar and then into alcohol and carbonic acid. The alcohol, or spirit, is almost entirely dissipated in the course of baking. The carbonic acid is the gas which performs the essential function of separating the particles of dough, or causing it to rise, and thus renders the bread light.

The separation of the bran or the husks of the grain is an unwise concession, according to science, to the daintiness of human taste. Its caprice demands what is pleasing to the eye as well as agreeable to the palate, and therefore prefers white to brown bread. The latter, however, made of unbolted flour, or of wheat with its bran or husks, is more nutritious than the former. A great waste of wholesome food is the consequence of the common rejection of the bran, which, moreover, is useful to digestion, acting mechanically, as the pebbles in a fowl's gizzard, by aiding in the trituration of the food.

It is generally supposed that fresh is less wholesome than stale bread. This may be true of the bread, as generally made in the United States, which ordinarily is not sufficiently kneaded, and is formed into too large loaves to be thoroughly baked. The French knead their bread much more thoroughly than we do, and by this process facilitating the movement of the gas, render it very light. Their forms of loaves, though often as long as a walking-stick, are never so thick as ours, and they thus become more thoroughly baked. Bread fresh from the oven is generally eaten in France, and while it is more palatable than the stale, produces no ill effect upon the eater.

Rye has almost the same composition as wheat, and is equally adapted for common use. This grain, however, is sometimes diseased, when it is known as "spurred rye." In the poorer districts of France, where a famishing want often prevents the discrimination of choice, the rye is frequently consumed even in the state of disease, and the most disastrous consequences ensue. Wholesome rye, however, though not so agreeable to the general taste, as a nutritious article of food is in no respect inferior to wheat.

Indian meal, or the flour of the maize, has nutritious qualities equal to those of wheat and rye, and has in addition a much larger proportion of oil. It is, therefore, particularly well adapted for food in cold weather, as its oil supplies a goodly proportion of the carbon or charcoal, essential to the combustion on which depends the heat of the body. The practice of mixing it with wheaten flour in making bread is a good one. As it can not by itself be made into a light, spongy loaf, it will never be received by the general palate as a constant substitute for wheat and rye.

Oats, which crusty Dr. Johnson defined in his dictionary as "food for men in Scotland and horses in England," is not only good equine provender, but a most excellent article of human diet. The only wholesome way, however, in which it can be consumed is in the form of what the Scotch call parrich or porridge. When formed into cakes or loaves it requires the stomach of a horse or a North-countryman to digest.

Buckwheat is almost the equal of wheaten flour in nutritious qualities, and when mixed, if well mixed, and made into light cakes may be eaten, as these are daily eaten with us, to the full capacity of the human stomach. They are not only delicious, but wholesome.

PRECOCITY.

OUR Western civilization lives in a very stimulating atmosphere. Its lungs feed on rather more than the usual twenty per cent. of oxygen, so that its highly arterialized blood floats an unwonted degree of fire to its brain and nerves. Fast thinking and fast living seem to be closely connected with life upon a new continent. Young people naturally catch the contagious joy, and to them there is something fascinating in the open privilege of anticipating their years. Tradition fixes a certain limit of time, on arriving at which young men are supposed to be of age. It undertakes the same good office for young ladies. But outside of legal technicalities it is merely a gratuitous suggestion. Let our youngsters are not inclined to let us not think, however, that the germ of this evil is found in our civilization. Evelyn speaks of "divers forward and precocious youths." All the American modesty can claim is, that it has carried the art of precocity to a perfection not hitherto deemed attainable. This originality ought to content the very moderate vanity in which we allow ourselves to indulge on exceptional occasions.

Yet it is noteworthy that this precocity among us is something specific. The genus is of the race; the species exclusively ours. Since we never consider any thing ours until we Americanize it, precocity must share the common fate by submitting to the process of transformation. Across the Atlantic they seem to have no trouble of this sort, except in the item of intellectual precocity. The old philologists tell us that the word "precocity" comes from præ and coquere, which mean to ripen or to cook beforehand; and as our transatlantic friends neither have as much sunshine nor do as much cooking as we, the reason is obvious why precocity is at a minimum on their half of the globe. But even in the matter of intellect we are more than a match for them—we mean in precocious intellect—and it is doubtful if the aggregate of Europe in this respect would equal the sum total in our States of premature genius. Thoughtful men in England are alarmed at the idea of "a generation of prigs." The new degree of "A.A.," which has been instituted at Oxford, is sharply criticised; and it is urged that "this dubious mark of superiority is attained, be it remembered, not at the comparatively mature age of twenty-one or twenty-two, at which university men, as a rule, meet in the final race which often fixes a man's lot for life. Sixteen or seventeen is, we believe, the outside term of years at which competitors come within the pale of these new-fangled distinctions." But we can assure them that "a generation of prigs" soon disposes of itself by the natural laws of exhaustion; or if these fail, a host of enemies swarm for its ruin. Too early blossoms invite frost, and the frost is pretty sure to accept the invitation. Or, to vary the figure, young colts that are put to a very free use of their legs are certain to spend their subsequent days in neglected stables or in bleak pastures.

How far the young mind may be safely stimulated is yet an open question. No rule can be laid down for all cases. Early in life some minds show wonderful power, take instant leadership among their fellows, and vindicate their title to the elect among men. To repress such is cruelly ruinous. But while every generation has intellects that, like Alexander, Watts, and Bonaparte, prophesy greatness from childhood, others, like Wellington, Walter Scott, Patrick Henry, and Webster, give no special promise of splendid success. Then, too, there is a third class of minds that blossom in amazing fertility and expire in the effort. But, as a general principle, mind waits on time and excites no large expectations until it is prepared to fulfill them.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

A Letter to Camilla.

MY DEAR CAMILLA,—I called upon you on New-Year's Day. You did not know it, but I was there; and I came especially to study your manners upon such an occasion. Don't try to recall me, because you did not look behind the orange-tree in the corner of the hall where I stood and watched you, and of course, therefore, you did not see me. Perhaps you did not even see the orange-tree! But you will see it some day. Yes: yes, some day you yourself will be a more beautiful orange-tree than the one that sheltered me, and its flowers will bloom upon your head, and you, too, dear girl, far on in the years that I may not see, will stand erect and many-branching, and superb with your golden fruit clustered about you.

You will think that I have not recovered from my complimentary, holiday tone, and that I imagine myself to be still under the orange-tree whispering between the glistening leaves to the "fairer flowers" who float down the stairs—or how is it that a beautiful woman descends a staircase, floating and gliding and rustling?—and pass into the drawing-room. But no; I am not complimenting. What is complimenting? That is a very fundamental question in manners. If I had said to Jenny Lind in those incredible days when I was sometimes admitted to dine with her, and when, after dinner, she sat at the piano and sang the songs of the North, "Dear lady, how exquisitely you sing!" should I have been flattering or complimenting? Is truth-telling flattery? Is it a compliment to say to my young neighbor who goes so blithely along the street upon her morning walk, "Miss Clara, you carry your rosebuds in your cheeks?" She certainly does carry them; and you, my dear Camilla, may hunt through the Fulton Market or any other of the sweet city gardens, and you will not find so rosy a rose as I find under Clara's little hat.

And yet if my young nephew the collegian, of whom I spoke in a letter to a person whom I presume you do not know—a certain young missionary—had met any Miss Clara when he was a fine young senior of twenty-one, and had said, "Good-morning, Miss Clara, with the beautiful rose in your cheek," I confess that I should have whispered, very decidedly, "Hush, you rascal!" And if my nephew had turned upon me my own battery, and had said, "Uncle Bach, is truth-telling flattery? She certainly has a beautiful rose in her cheek," what do you think I should have said to him? I should have said merely, "My dear nephew, there are things which a man of threescore may say to a young woman of a score which a youth of the same age should not say."

Don't ask me for a reason, Camilla. You understand it quite as well as I do. If I had whispered to you out of the orange-tree on New-Year's morning, "Camilla, how beautiful you are to-day!" you would have smiled pleasantly and have said to me, "Good-morning, Mr. Bachelor, a happy New-Year to you!" And I think you would have added, "and a great many of them," if you had not thought down in the bottom of your tender heart that perhaps I did not care for a great, great many more; or that, at any rate, being an—an—an elderly man, it might not be altogether pleasant to suggest the lapse of time. And that, dear Camilla, I call, under the circumstances, the best of manners. But as I was saying—if that young man who came at about half past one o'clock, that handsome, frank-faced, manly fellow—if, in a word, Edward had planted himself behind the orange-tree and had whispered as you passed by, "Camilla, how beautiful you are to-day!" why, my dear child, I think you would at that moment have more than justified what he said, but I do not believe you would have spoken a word. The same words would have meant one thing from me and a very different thing from Edward.

Good-manners, then, require not only that what we say be in itself true, but that it be said in a manner and under circumstances that will not deceive. If it is meant to deceive—if it is not intended to mean all that it may naturally be supposed to mean, then it is a compliment merely, and it is not in the highest sense generous or kind. When old Blatherskite turns round at table to the charming young woman whom heavenly fate has permitted him (because some Edward failed to appear) to hand in to dinner, and says to her, in a kind of hoarse shout, "My dear Miss Lucy, you look like an angel, and I feel like a peri feasting in Paradise," neither Miss Lucy nor any body else supposes that it is more than a compliment. It is a pretty speech in which Mr. Blatherskite says that he thinks Lucy is a pretty girl. No harm is done, nobody is deceived; and every body sips his soup and smiles a little ridiculous old Blatherskite.

But when Edward from behind the orange-tree whispers to you, dear Camilla, that you look beautifully—ah! ah! that is a very different thing. His speech is a vocal palimpsest. (Do you know that a palimpsest is an old parchment manuscript written over with later letters and another meaning?) Beneath his words there is a significance which does not appear. He means something that he does not say. More than that, he intends that you shall understand him to mean something else than he says. Now, if he means also to stand truly to what he wishes you to believe, it is all right, and he is in the right place to say it when he is under the orange-tree. But if he is merely complimenting—if he is saying something which he knows you can not help thinking means what he does not intend, and shelters himself under the plea that his words do not necessarily have any further significance—then he is a mere flirt; he is playing with you, Camilla; he sees that you care more for him than he cares for you, and he is base enough to entrap you into the confession.

For you do confess. The rose on your cheek, as it deepens and deepens its hue, says more and more truly, "Yes, yes, I do." And the silence which you keep shouts out, until to my heart it rings through the house, and I wonder it does not interrupt the drivel of "compliments of the season" in the parlor, "Yes, yes, I do." And the smile that steals over your face, until your very soul seems smiling through all your body, whispers to Edward and to me, "Yes, yes, I do." That is the response which he gets from you for saying to you the very same words to which, when I said them, you merely and pleasantly answered, "Good-morning, Mr. Bachelor, a happy New-Year to you!"

However, don't be troubled. I am very sure that Edward will never say any thing to you merely as a compliment. If he ever should stand behind that orange-tree and say that you are beautiful, he will mean that of all women you are the most beautiful to him, and that he does not dare to say more, because he is not sure what the rose in your cheek would answer. But if Tom says it, then the more sentimentally he insists upon it, the more must you laugh at him. When he says, "Miss Camilla, how beautiful you are to-day," reply to him, "Yes, Mr. Tom, how handsome you are to-day!" You and your friends can very easily muzzle these fine young gentlemen if you choose. Remember, Camilla, that no man compliments—in the sense we have now given to the word—a woman whom he truly respects. He means something or nothing. If the former, it is not a compliment; if the latter, it is almost an insult.

My old friend, the Reverend Doctor Blunt, one of the kindest and most courteous of men, used to tell me, when we spoke of this momentous subject, that he offered himself to his wife in a compliment.

"Pooh! Blunt," said I, "you are a minister of the Gospel!"

"And therefore I tell the truth," replied Blunt; "and I told it to my wife. For I said to her one lovely evening in June fifty-two years ago"—and thereupon the Reverend Doctor went into details which I will not now repeat—"Jane," said I, "when I was in Venice I used to feel that the height of earthly happiness would be to float about the canals of Venice with the head of a virtuous woman whom I loved in my lap; and oh! Jane, I wish that you were floating with me about the canals of Venice, and that your head were in my lap! You see," said my friend the Reverend Doctor Blunt, "I called her a virtuous woman. To most women," and here his sweet old eyes twinkled, "that might have been a compliment, but to Mrs. Blunt it was merely the truth."

Dear Camilla, I see that I am as garrulous as the late Reverend Doctor Blunt. But who wouldn't be garrulous talking to you from under an orange-tree! Don't forget that no man merrily "compliments" a woman whom he truly respects; and when Edward asks you when you will put the orange flowers from the old tree in your hair and you have answered him, don't forget also to tell your New Year and Old Year friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

MISS MULOCH'S NEW NOVEL.

IN the January Number of Harper's Magazine, among many good things, is the beginning of "The Woman's Kingdom," by the author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," a story which she promises us shall be "a thorough love story." Indeed, she declares that she does not pretend to make it any thing else. "There are other things in life besides love," says our delightful author, telling the truth in every word; "but every body who has lived at all knows that love is the very heart of life, the pivot upon which its whole machinery turns; without which no human existence can be complete; and with which, however broken and worn in part, it can still go on working somehow, and working to a comparative useful and cheerful end." Fully penetrated with this truth, the author of "A Noble Life" has here begun a most sweet and charming prose idyl of domestic life, and with all the grace and facility of her accomplished hand. The scenes are very natural and of the utmost interest, nor will any reader make himself acquainted with Edna and Letty without resolving to follow their fortunes to the end.

"THE MOONSTONE."

THOSE of our readers who have perused the opening chapters of "The Moonstone," by WILKIE COLLINS, in Harper's Weekly for January 4, will probably agree with us that it is in the very best manner of the author. The spell begins at once; mystery and superstition; the strange and vivid contrast of ancient India and modern England; the working out in the events of common life to-day of the traditional powers of a yellow diamond—all these are precisely the material for the curiously analytical genius and vivid pictorial talent of COLLINS, and promise us one of the most skillful and exciting of recent stories. The scenes and characters in the first Number are admirably managed. Gabriel Batteredge, the house-steward of Lady Verinder, tells the inmost secret of himself in telling the family history; and the appearance of the three Hindoos upon the warm terrace of the English country house, softly beating their drums and carefully looking about, is a master-touch. Like all WILKIE COLLINS'S stories, the "Moonstone" is written to be published serially, and should so be read.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

BONNETS have at length settled themselves into shape for the winter. They are not increased in size, indeed are rather abridged in some particulars. The Fanchon is exceedingly small, and is still a favorite. The Marie Antoinette, shorn of some of its disagreeable features, is also worn; but the most popular hat is a medium between these. It is short at the ears like the Empire bonnet, is fitted snugly to the head, has a brim and the upper half of a crown, and is exceedingly comfortable. Black velvet bonnets of this shape, the material laid plain on the frame, trimmed with folds of the same or of satin, are neat and stylish. A band of scarlet velvet is over the forehead, with a cluster of rose-buds on the left. Narrow satin strings and Spanish veils are worn with these shapes as well as the Fanchon. A few of the feather and fur bonnets, now so fashionable in Europe, have just been imported. The feathers used are those of the grebe and pheasant. The white and pearl-gray grebes are bound with green, or scarlet, or blue velvet, while bonnets of dark pheasants' feathers have a fall of brown lace, and are trimmed with ornaments of gold and cut-steel. Seal-skin is the handsomest fur for bonnets. When the best quality of the fur is used it rivals velvet in elegance, and is warm and comfortable without being heavy. The weight of fur bonnets has hitherto been the great barrier to their success. Chinchilla is also another smooth, light fur much used. Some Astrakhan and Persian bonnets are imported, with cloaks and muffs to correspond; but they look clumsy and heavy. Flat round toquets and turbans, both of fur and feathers, are worn with short promenade suits. They are also well adapted for skating costumes.

STREET SUITS.

Among some walking suits just completed is a pretty one with petticoat of blue silk. Around this skirt are two bias ruffles, five inches wide, bound on both sides, and gathered by a cord an inch from the top. The peplum over-skirt is cut in scalloped leaves and bound. It is left open at the sides and caught together by rosettes, or dahlias of silk, each petal showing separately. A half-fitting sacque of blue plush is worn for wrapping. Black silk is furnished to the purchaser for waist and sleeves. The price is $150. Another is a visiting dress of purple silk. The skirt just escapes the floor. In the centre of each width is a long tab of black velvet, embroidered with fine jet. An apron of velvet almost covers the upper part of the front width. A long pelisse of black corded silk, worn over this skirt, is made loose and confined at the waist by a belt and sash. The body and skirt are both turned back en revers, disclosing the velvet apron. A band of bias velvet, headed by guipure passementerie, surrounds the pelisse, and trims the sleeves. With material for waist and sleeves of this dress the price is also $150.

Silk skirts, black and colored, are imported ready-made and trimmed in Parisian style. They are to be worn beneath over-dresses made to order. One of black has two bias flounces trimmed with gay Persian ribbon. Large medallions of Persian embroidery are set on the ruffles at intervals. Another of blue gros grain has folds of blue satin arranged in squares around the skirt. Large rosettes are in the centres of the squares.

Suits of black satin and of silk velvet are used for church and for visiting. These dresses are not so extravagant as they appear at the first glance. Very little material is required to make them, and that is sufficiently handsome to dispense with elaborate trimming. On satin dresses folds of the same arranged in Greek blocks, or crocheted passementerie without jet, is a handsome trimming. Belts over the paletot or redingote are formed of folds, to which are attached three large jet rings. A wide satin sash, ornamented with passementerie, is looped through the rings. Bands of fur are most suitable for velvet. Gray and black Astrakhan, seal-skin, or chinchilla are preferred.

The new figured velveteens are much admired, and are much less expensive than velvet. Dark shades of purple and brown are striped with satin of the same shade; others are spotted with small dots, and again there is a latticed pattern. Maroon is a favorite color in these goods, but we see more purple costumes at present than any other color.

For plainer suits cloth and serge are the most acceptable material. Sailor's blue, Humboldt purple, and olive green are fashionably worn. The trimming is embroidery in silk or a wide black worsted braid. These costumes are suitable for shopping and morning walks, and should be made plainly, without any effort at display. The bonnet and gloves should be of the same shade.

LACE AND INDIA MUSLIN.

White toilettes are very fashionable this winter for evening. We have in previous numbers described models in tulle, tarletane, poplin, silk, and satin. In addition to these we have seen some ball-dresses in India muslin and lace. At a children's party, given during the holidays, it was the pretty conceit of the hostess to dress her little daughter of five years old in a dress like her own. The under-dresses were of pink satin, low-necked, round corsage, and skirts gored alike with the difference only of a train for the mamma and a quilled border around the demoiselle's short skirt. The over-dress was of Valenciennes lace; the whole garment, body, sleeves, and skirt, formed by alternate rows of plain Valenciennes insertion, and others on which were medallions of embroidery. The exquisite needle-work designed for these dresses was made here, and is as handsome as if imported from Paris. The insertion on the large dress is six inches wide and the lace bordering the skirt is wider still. A pink satin sash with fringed ends fastened behind with three large loops.

A pretty and inexpensive dress of India muslin is to be worn over a gored under-dress of blue silk. The low-necked full bodice is gathered into a belt. Bretelles, which, by-the-way, are again in vogue, of cambric insertion and Valenciennes lace, begin at the belt in front, passing over the shoulders to the belt in the back. The space between the bretelles is filled in with puffs of muslin separated by cambric insertion, with fluted Valenciennes around the neck. Through embroidered eyelets in the insertion is passed narrow blue velvet ribbon, three rows on each band. The sleeves are short puffs, covered by the lace bretelles. The skirt is shaped by cutting out triangular pieces from the belt to the knee. The bias seams are joined by insertion with narrow lace on each side. Below the knee are two wide puffs separated by similar bands. A fluted ruffle six inches wide finishes the skirt. Blue belt with long sash.

A simple evening dress for a child is composed entirely of Victoria lawn. The bell-shaped skirt is formed of puffs separated by tucked bands, five narrow tucks on each band. A fitted flounce around the edge is also tucked. The puffed yoke is very high about the throat and pointed in front and back. Coat sleeves puffed around the wrist and up the outer seam. This is worn over a gored slip of cherry-colored glacé silk. The price is $30.

A handsome dinner dress is of green silk shot with white; demi-train, two yards and a quarter from the belt to the floor, bordered with white velvet leaves, the veins of which are embroidered with silk. A wide white fringe below the leaves reaches almost to the edge of the skirt. Three bands of white satin run down the front seams to the knee where they are finished by leaves and fringe. Low round waist with bertha of leaves and long sash. The trimming on this dress is peculiarly elegant and appropriate.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.

For the convenience of dancers short ball dresses are coming into favor. The trains now so necessary for full dress are objects of censure to gentlemen, and occasion a good deal of annoyance to their wearers. The new Pompadour trains are more easily managed, as they are left open in front and may be thrown over the arm in a crowd.

Dresses for demi-toilette are lapped at the waist in the redingote style. A velvet ribbon or the fashionable jeweled collar with a locket is worn around the neck.

Bretelles of black velvet and guipure lace are fashionably worn with self-colored dresses of empress cloth or velours. Sailor collars of fine linen, deeply pointed at the side, are pretty for morning wear.

A morning dress for sea-voyages is of Petersham cloth, a kind of tufted French flannel, in alternate blocks of purple and white, with a purple tuft, somewhat resembling Astrakhan cloth. The garment is cut in a loose Gabrielle, confined at the waist with a belt of the same material. A pointed hood, lined with purple silk, is attached to this wrapper, making it a comfortable dress for deck-promenades on ship-board. The price is $30.

An India mull christening robe is worn over pale-blue satin. The garment is a yard and a half long. The first width and half a yard around the skirt is entirely formed of embroidery and Valenciennes lace. Large, needle-worked medallions are surrounded with fluted lace, and Valenciennes medallions are set in bands of mull. The lace around the skirt is four inches wide. A narrow belt of folds of blue satin is ornamented with leaves of lace and a long sash bordered with narrow Valenciennes. $250 is the price.

An infant's cloak, handsome enough to accompany this dress, is marked $125. The material is white French merino. The large, square upper cape is entirely covered with embroidery in white floss. A wide white fringe surrounds the cape, and meets a needle-worked border on the cloak proper. It is lined throughout with soft white silk.

A black velvet paletot of a new design is pointed like a shawl in front and back. It folds over the arm, and conceals coat sleeves that are made for warmth, and not display. It is trimmed with a wide flounce of thread lace, headed by crocheted passementerie.

An ingenious and useful novelty just introduced is a new cloth plate attached to the Wheeler & Wilson sewing-machine, which will produce a lock-stitch, a double-loop stitch, and an ornamental stitch for braiding or embroidery. Three threads of different colors may be introduced into the braiding pattern if desired, and it can be easily adjusted to materials of every thickness, from the sheerest muslin to heavy cloth or velvet. The work when finished resembles star-braiding. The price is $10.

A new and decided improvement in the putting up of needles has just been introduced. The best English needles are packed in small cylinders lined with tin, which protect the needles from rust, and these cylinders again are set into small fancy caskets, which are portable and convenient. Each cylinder contains the same number of needles as an ordinary paper, and is cheaper withal.

A word about merino under-garments. The best articles of this kind are the Norfolk and New Brunswick goods of American manufacture, which possess the advantage of being knit by an automatic machine that widens and narrows of itself, and thus makes an almost seamless garment. In the English flannels the widened parts are knit separately, and afterward sewed on. It is a singular fact, and one creditable to American ingenuity, that, after the construction of an effective automatic machine that should widen and narrow had been experimented on for a hundred and fifty years and finally pronounced a mechanical impossibility in England, it should have been successfully achieved by an American inventor.

For the information given we are indebted to the courtesy of Madame DIEDEN, Madame FERRERO, Madame FLAMME, Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co., LORD & TAYLOR, C. G. GUNTHER & Sons, J. J. HINCHMAN, and many others of the leading modistes and merchants of New York.

PERSONAL.

MR. WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT receives from MR. ROBERT BONNER $3000 for three poems for the Ledger—the largest sum ever paid any author for the same number of words. We have often wondered if the following lines, written by one of the best poets of the time, were not intended for MR. BONNER:

"I would not have the horse I drive
So fast that folks must stop and stare;
An easy gait—two, forty-five—
Suits me; I do not care;—
Perhaps for just a single spur,
Some seconds less would do no hurt."

—We hear that Mr. WM. C. PRIME, for some years past managing editor of the Journal of Commerce, has withdrawn from routine duty, though retaining his proprietary interest in that paper. Mr. PRIME is one of the ablest and most conscientious of American journalists, and richly deserves the handsome pecuniary results that have come to the establishment while under his direction.

—It is said that the lady who has become Mrs. Indian Chief PARKER was not Miss SACKETT, after all, but a daughter of AMODIO, the singer. After AMODIO's death Mrs. A. married Colonel SACKETT, of Oneida county, and is now a widow for the second time. Colonel S. having been killed while leading a charge at Trevallion Station, Virginia, during SHERIDAN's raid up the Valley. Mrs. PARKER is nineteen, and quite handsome. Colonel P. is head chief of the Senecas. The writer has known him from childhood. He succeeded old JOHN BLACKSMITH (a very able man) as head of the tribe, and always wears around his neck, though usually not in sight, the silver medal given by WASHINGTON to RED JACKET, who was the immediate predecessor of BLACKSMITH. The council house of the tribe, a neat wooden building, painted white, is at Tonawanda, Genesee county, New York, about eight miles from Batavia. Most of the "noble red men" of the tribe who are left are well-to-do farmers. Their lands are of unsurpassed fertility. Although in the main intelligent, and somewhat educated, and surrounded by wealthy and educated neighbors, they are a people by themselves. By the laws of the State they are not allowed to vote nor serve as jurors.

—REV. MONSIEUR D. CONWAY, formerly of this country, but now a Unitarian clergyman in London, is one of the literary notables of that town. Besides his pastorate of a church he is on the staff of Fraser's Magazine, writes for the Fortnightly Review, the Atlantic Monthly, and corresponds for several newspapers. He is the author of the clever papers on the Paris Exhibition that appeared in Harper's Magazine, and is a lean, active, genial gentleman.

—ELLIOTT, the painter, and PALMER, the sculptor, reside at Albany, and are great cronies. Both have advanced the prices of their wares. ELLIOTT declines to furnish a good article of portrait for less than $500 (bust, simply), $1000 for bust and hands, and $5000 for the total person. PALMER has marked up his prices to $1500 and $2000 for busts. He uses about one hundred and fifty tools, made by himself—his own inventive powers being remarkable. Both artists are fine talkers.

—MRS. HENRIETTA FIELD, wife of the editor of the Evangelist, has been writing neat letters to that paper from Paris, where she has had chatty interviews with Miss MULOCK (now Mrs. CRAIK), author of "John Halifax," and with Mrs. CHARLES, author of the "Schönberg-Cotta Family." She says that "Mrs. CHARLES is still young and eminently English, of small, slight figure, whose modest, timid manners at once engage interest and sympathy." And she says that "Miss MULOCK, before her marriage, supported by her pen her little domestic circle, an aged father and a beloved brother, whom she educated only to see him cut down by the reaper Death."

—Emulating the success that has attended the labors of General Upton, in his book of "Tactics," recently ordered to be used in the armies of the United States, the KING of SWEDEN has in press a pamphlet, entitled "Ideas About Modern Tactics," in which he proposes to show that a small and good army is preferable to a large one imperfectly trained. That is just what General Upton has demonstrated. The profits of the King's book go to the establishment of primary schools in Lapland. The profits of General U.'s book go into the porte-monnaie of General U.

—They tell many droll stories of GEORGE FRANCIS TRAIN, but none more absurd than this: Mrs. ELLETT, one of our eminent authors, when in London some years since, was astonished one day to get a card from Mr. TRAIN with his compliments, asking if he could do any thing for her. She replied that she wanted to travel on the Continent, and would like to find a small party to go with. G. F. T. immediately advertised for a "small party" to travel with Mrs. ELLETT on the Continent, and the poor woman was actually alarmed at having several infants sent to her residence as traveling companions.

—BISHOP QUINTARD, of Tennessee, recently administered the rite of confirmation for the Archbishop of York—the first time such a service was ever performed in England by an American bishop. Bishop QUINTARD is having great success in raising funds to endow the University of the South. It seems to be taking the form of a testimonial of brotherly feeling from England to the people of the Southern States.

—Mrs. RONALDS, well known in New York society for her varied accomplishments, is creating a marked sensation in the salons of Paris by her splendid singing, and is pronounced, as an amateur, to be without a rival. Mr. VANZANT, an amateur tenor, is also the subject of laudatory paragraphs.

—It was an unlucky day, for her, on which Mrs. MOLYNEUX, of Allerton Hall, England, became a shareholder in the Royal Bank, which recently failed. The call for £10 a share amounted in her case to £120,000. She had also £30,000 on deposit in the bank, and was the largest shareholder. She has just deceased.

—Fresh little items concerning the late FRIZ-GREENE HALLOCK are constantly finding their way into type. "BERLEIGH," one of the cleverest of the New York correspondents for outlying portions of the country, says that he found him "genial, pleasant, full of information and anecdote, with no shade of pedantry, and making every one feel very much at home in his society. He was very partial to the company of young people, and they, in turn, were strongly attracted to him. He lived with a maiden sister, older than himself, in a large frame-house a good deal older than either, shadowed by stately trees and surrounded by flowering shrubs—a quiet, dreamy home, just fitted to a poet's musings mood—but in spite of its venerable shadows, often made luminous and musical with the bright faces and ringing laughter of children. I do not know which he enjoyed the most, the visits of his young friends or the companionship, necessarily infrequent, of his former literary associates, or the perusal of his favorite authors. Between these, and an occasional visit to the city, he passed his time.

—MR. JOSEPH JEFFERSON, the cleverest comedian that this country has produced, having come to the conclusion that "The world well tried—the sweetest thing in life Is the unclouded welcome of a wife," proceeded to act upon it on the 20th ult., by persuading Miss MARY A. WARREN, of Chicago, to become his wife. The lady who thus

"Changed her local habitation and her name," is the daughter of the late treasurer of M. NICKER'S theatre and niece of JOHN B. RICE (an old actor), Mayor of Chicago.

—People view things differently. The popular notion is that a wife has greater intrinsic value than a sewing-machine. A contrary notion seems to prevail at East Haddam, Connecticut, where a few days ago LYDIA HOLMES, while her husband was asleep, took $200 from his pocket, went to the barn, harnessed the horses, took several sewing-machines, watches, etc., and started for New London. Next day her disgruntled lord followed, with an officer, but wife had got off to Boston. ELIJAH (that is the husband) says he should like to recover the goods, but would be willing to part with the wife. The proceeding is in all respects irregular.

—LONGFELLOW, HOLMES, LOWELL, and other book people of Boston, are to give dinners to DICKENS before he leaves the country. Instead of "a feast of reason and flow of soul" they will have a regular freshet.

—A full, life-size statue of EDWARD EVERETT is being chiseled by POWERS. It represents him in the attitude of delivering his oration upon WASHINGTON. It is understood that POWERS proposes to present this to some public body that will prepare a suitable place for it.

—THE EMPRESS EUGENIE received not long since a birthday present from the Emperor of Austria that would have extorted the admiration of SIR CHARLES CHICKERING or MR. STEINWAY. It was a piano-forte in rosewood, elaborately carved, adorned with mosaics, and valued at 20,000 francs. When the instrument arrived Prince PONIATOWSKI and Count LATOUR MAUBOURG, two eminent musical virtuosi, who happened to be in the Empress's apartments, were at once requested to test the musical powers of the piano, and found its tone to be superb.

—OFFENBACH, the "Grolstein" man, realizes much coin from his works, and lives in fine style. His new opera, "Robinson Crusoe," is a great success. The first four representations produced 21,070 francs. The "Grand Duchesse" was played more nights consecutively by BATEMAN'S company in this city than any opera yet presented in this country.

—THE LONDON Examiner thus neatly polishes off the most well-to-do of the Old World's crowned heads—the Viceroy of Egypt: "He is a plump and prosperous prince, and incomparably the richest trader in the world. ROTHSCHILD is not to be named the same day with him. All that wonderful firm, collected together from England, France, Austria, Prussia, and Italy, could not show such vast profits upon their business as his Highness the Vali of Egypt. Perhaps his Highness is, all things considered, the only really pleasantly-situated monarch known among men of the present generation. He is an absolute sovereign, in the best sense of the word. He could chop off an able editor's head, if troublesome, or make a delicate roast of any refractory member of council, with all the ease in life. He has a sort of puppet ministry that he can take to pieces and put together again at pleasure; but it signifies nothing."

—MR. CORCORAN, formerly the banker, of Washington, and father of Mrs. GEORGE EUSTIS, who died recently at Cannes, has built a beautiful villa at Cannes, where he proposes to pass his future winters. Mr. EUSTIS was formerly a Member of Congress from Louisiana, and at the outbreak of the late war went to France as Secretary of Legation to the Confederate Minister, MR. SLIDELL. Mrs. EUSTIS was beautiful, accomplished, and altogether a most fascinating lady.

—THE Etandard announces the marriage of M. LEO GOETZ, of the house of WEBER GOETZ, with Miss STONE, daughter of Mr. HARRY STONE, formerly of this city, but now a banker at Paris.

—DR. S. AUSTIN ALLIBONE, author of the "Dictionary of Authors," has been appointed editor of the publications of the American Sunday-school Union.

—THE death is announced of the young and celebrated cantatrice, MME. NANTIER DIME, at Madrid.

—LORD LYONS has carried with him to Paris the same practical common-sense that characterized his personal and official conduct in this country. On assuming the functions of Ambassador at the French Court, he caused it to be announced that he was "in Paris to attend to business, and not to arrange fêtes."

—When the Manchester "cotton lords" undertake to do public things they draw their checks for handsome figures. It being proposed to endow a Professorship in Engineering in Owens College in that city, twelve firms subscribed $35,000, and of this amount one firm—BEYER, PEACOCK, & Co., led off with $15,000. In a jocular sort of way this college is called the "University of the Busy," and bids fair to become one of the foremost seats of learning in England.

—MADAME RATTAZZI, nee BONAPARTE WYSE, well-known in European society as the PRINCESS DE SALM, has written an opera—"Wilfrid Horlach"—which is about to be produced at Florence. But the curious fact connected with her as a composer is, that she is deaf. BEETHOVEN was bothered in the same way.

THE STOCKING-KNITTER.

SHE stood beside the window, at her knitting worked the maid;
It was homely work—you'll laugh at all my fancies, I'm afraid.
But when her work was ended, and she laid her knitting down,
With a thoughtful face she gazed upon the stocking ribbed and brown.
Thus she pondered—"If each loop of this my knitting were a thought,
And each worsted-strand a fancy, what strange lesson would be taught
For the future from my knitting? as I can it o'er again,
For the secrets of the future from the tangles of the skein.
There are woven dreams in knitting, and there's many a girl will look,
To the clicking of her needles, on her knitting as a book.
As they rattle on so gayly, I am blithe and of good cheer,
And anon a loop has fallen—and I wipe away a tear.
With the snapping thread how often has my darling left in pain;
As I joined the yarn, in fancy he has come to kiss again,
All the loops are chains of thought, some bright as sunrise on the wave,
And while some brought balm to sorrow, some were darksome as the grave.
All the strange tales of my childhood they came back to me once more,
The old rhymes of gnome and fairy, and the spectre shapes of yore;
With the knots that I unraveled all those fearsome sights were fled,
They were swept into oblivion at the smoothing of the thread.
And I felt my heart was breaking as my needle snapped in twain—
'Twas an omen for the future of disaster, doubt, and pain.
And I heard again in fancy all the tender words and vows
That I heard from gallant lovers with the rose-flush on my brows;
They were sweet words of devotion, and my heart was very proud,
And they came from out my knitting, where they slept as in a shroud."

As the lithe, small hands were idle, so the maiden, to my mind,
Thought and spoke. In work most homely poet-fancies you will find.

THE NAME OF GOD IN FORTY-EIGHT LANGUAGES.

AS Louis Burger, the well-known author and philologist, was walking in the Avenue des Champs Elysées the other day he heard a familiar voice exclaiming, "Buy some nuts of a poor man, Sir; twenty for a penny!" He looked up and recognized his old barber.

"What! are you selling nuts?" said he.

"Ah, Sir, I have been unfortunate."

"But this is no business for a man like you!"

"Oh, Sir, if you could only tell me of something better to do," returned the barber, with a sigh.

Burger was touched. He reflected a moment; then tearing a leaf from his memorandum book, he wrote for a few moments and handed it to the man, saying, "Take this to a printing-office and have a hundred copies struck off; here is the money to pay for it. Get a license from the prefecture of the police, and sell them at two cents a copy, and you will have bread on the spot. The strangers who visit Paris can not refuse this tribute to the name of God, printed in so many different ways.

The barber did as he was bid, and was always seen at the entrance to the Exposition, selling the following hand-bill:

The Name of God in Forty-Eight Languages.

Hebrew, Elohim or Eloah.	Olala tongue, Deu.
Chaldaic, Elah.	German and Swiss, Gott.
Assyrian, Ellah.	Dutch, Goed.
Syriac and Turkish, Alah.	Dutch, Goet.
Malay, Alla.	English and old Saxon, God.
Arabic, Allah.	Teutonic, Goth.
Language of the Magi, Orsi.	Danish and Swedish, Gut.
Old Egyptian, Teut.	Norwegian, Gud.
Armenian, Teuti.	Slavic, Buch.
Modern Egyptian, Tenn.	Polish, Bog.
Greek, Theos.	Polacca, Bunq.
Cretan, Thios.	Lapp, Jubinal.
Æolian and Doric, Ilos.	Finnish, Jumala.
Latin, Deus.	Runic, As.
Low Latin, Diez.	Pannonian, Istu.
Celtic and old Gallic, Div.	Zemblan, Fetizo.
French, Dieu.	Hindostanee, Rain.

Low Breton, Douté.	Japanese, Goezur.
Italian, Dio.	Madagascar, Zannar.
Irish, Die.	Peruvian, Puchocamañ.

A few days after Burger met the barber.

"Well," said he, "has the holy name of God brought you good luck?"

"Yes, indeed, Sir. I sell on an average a hundred copies a day, at two cents each, or two dollars; but the strangers are generous; some give me ten cents and others twenty. I have even received half a dollar for a copy; so that, all told, I am making five dollars a day."

"Five dollars a day?"

"Yes, Sir; thanks to your kindness."

"The deuce!" thought Burger, as he walked away. "If I were not a literary man I would turn peddler or publisher; there is nothing so profitable as selling the learning or wit of others."

THE CHEMISTRY OF FURNITURE.

YOUNG housekeepers do not always understand the theory of the chemical and mechanical action of different substances on articles of furniture. The substances from which furniture is chiefly exposed to injury are water, oils, alcohols, and acids.

Acids act on marble. Marble is itself composed of carbonate of lime; that is, it is a compound of carbonic acid and lime. Now the carbonic acid has a comparatively weak affinity for lime, and most other acids will prevail over it and take its place when brought into contact with it; thus destroying the texture of the stone, liberating the carbonic acid, and leaving nitrate of lime, or muriate of lime, or sulphate or acetate of lime—as the case may be—in the form of a white powder, in its place. But oils, alcohols, and water produce no effect upon marble.

All varnished or polished surfaces of wood, on the other hand, while not injured usually by acids, are attacked by alcohol. Varnishes are composed of different gums and resins, which are generally soluble in alcohol. Many of them are made by dissolving the material in alcohol so as to liquefy them, and then, when they are applied, the alcohol evaporates, leaving the gum or resin in a thin even coating over the whole surface. If now any alcoholic substance comes upon such a surface, whether it be alcohol itself, as used for lamps, or spirits of any kind, or even wine, which contains but a small percentage of alcohol, the varnish is attacked, a portion of it is dissolved, and the brilliancy of the surface is destroyed.

Oils will not attack either marbles or varnished surfaces, and will do no injury except to naked wood or other porous substances which admit them into the pores, from which they can not afterward easily be expelled.

Water affects no substances except such as have open pores exposed, in which case it enters and causes the substance to swell, or such as are soluble in water, as glue in joints, and mucilage or gum-arabic, used sometimes for attaching superficial ornaments to fancy work.

The practical lesson to be learned from this is, that housekeepers must take care in dealing with furniture to keep water away from every thing soluble in water, oil from every thing porous, alcohol from varnish, and acids from marble.

So shall your chairs and tables always look bright, and your minds remain calm and serene.

"LEAN ON ME, MOTHER DEAR."

HARRIET, how is it you have not waited for your mother?" said old Mr. Smithson to a young lady, who had just parted with some youthful acquaintances, and was now hurrying, with a thoughtless look, to church.

"Oh, Sir, mamma walks so slow that I am almost frozen, and there's no good in two of us being uncomfortable, you know."

"Nay, I don't know that two, that is, you and your mother, need be uncomfortable. I should have thought, Harriet, that you would have been a comfort and stay to her."

So saying, Mr. Smithson went into church, and Harriet Sims, with a very flushed face, followed him in. He had been an old friend of her father's, and she was vexed at his words; perhaps all the more that they made her vexed with herself.

Seated in her pew she was not able to attend to the service, for her mother did not come, and as Harriet had delayed a little on the way gossiping, she had been half afraid, slow as Mrs. Sims walked, she might be in the church before her. Kate Sims, Harriet's younger sister, came in from the Sabbath-school, where she taught a little class, but Kate, like Harriet, was uneasy at their mother not being there. In the pause, while the hymn was being given out, Kate whispered to her elder sister, "Was mamma not able to come with you?"

Harriet colored deeply, but merely shook her head in reply; she was troubled, for she knew that when her mother had said, "I shall be ready almost directly," she had ran off to avoid the slow walking with her, and to gratify also her love of idle chat with some young friends by the way. It seemed to her that both Mr. Smithson and Kate were in league to ask unpleasant questions; and yet what could have kept her mother away? The sermon had just begun when Harriet was still more disturbed. At this moment Dr. Foster's man-servant came up the aisle, and stopping at the Sims's pew, gave Harriet a card, on which she read the words, in Dr. Foster's handwriting, "Come directly."

Very pale, and frightened, she rose and left the church, asking the man, as soon as she got to the door, what was the matter.

"Mrs. Sims has met with an accident, Miss."

"An accident!"

"Yes, Miss, she slipped down at Hilder's corner, and—" Harriet staid to hear no more, her light swift steps soon brought her home, though, even in her haste and terror, she remarked how slippery the frost had made the roads, and yet it was no colder, but, if any thing, warmer than it had been earlier in the day.

Arrived at home all was consternation. Mrs. Sims, a very delicate woman, had slipped down at a steep, awkward corner, and struck the back of her head, in falling heavily against the edge of a door-step; she was brought home insensible, and had not yet recovered consciousness. The doctor was there looking very grave.

"My dear young lady, I sent for you, for your mamma must have the utmost care and attention, which I am sure you will pay her."

Every word of the doctor's was a stab: "kindness," "attention!" if she had shown these, the dear sufferer might have been spared the accident that had laid her senseless.

Three days—three terrible days—passed in which all that skill could do had been done; but in vain. Mrs. Sims never recovered consciousness, but sank and died of concussion of the brain, resulting from her fall.

On the first Sunday after the funeral Harriet and Kate were at church. Nearly opposite their pew were Mrs. Hooper and her youngest daughter Mary. It was very pleasant to see how Mary Hooper looked out the places in the books for her mother, and what sweet helpful care she took of her. Mrs. Hooper was getting rather infirm, and Mary was the child of her declining years; but if youthful love ever tried to ward off the weakness of age, it was in this case. When the service was over Mrs. Hooper went out first, for Mary was delayed a moment to speak to one of the children of the Sabbath-school, but she quickly followed, saying, as she left the church porch, "Lean on me, mother dear." They were but simple, natural words, from a child to a parent, but oh, what a pang they gave to one who heard them!

"LEAN ON ME, MOTHER DEAR."

A WINTER SONG.

The fields are white with raiment fine,
Gold-tinted in the sun's new shine,
The azure air is still;
As crystal bright,
A silver light
Gleams over yonder hill.

The sunbeams on the ice divide,
With white and rosy glimmer, wide
In ever-changing hue.
Out of the snow
The bushes show
Their thorn-twigs bare and few.

Jeweled with hoar-frost are the trees;
But sties one branch beneath the breeze,
Where sleeps the small white grain;
Then sudden all
Those jewels fall
As summer-blossom's rain.

The fir's long boughs are bending low,
And threaten with their weight of snow
To hide the whistling wight,
Who there must pass
The way of glass
I'aved by the frozen night.

With icicles the roof is decked,
The sluggish brook by ice-walls checked
Creeps on, the fount is still;
With water-gush
In frozen hush
The wheel waits in the mill.

There the blue titmouse carols clear,
The sparrow comes, who knows no fear,
To glean beneath the eaves;
The green-finch shy
Sits moping by
In hedgerows reft of leaves.

There may one climb the distant hill,
And gaze, and having gazed his fill,
May dream in silence there;
What mighty hand
On that broad land
Could cast a veil so fair!

A CRY FOR HELP.

I AM a family man! Now there is a vast difference between being a family man, and a man of family! I am not a man of family. My wife, Ann Maria, is a woman of family! Her papa was a lawyer; mine was only a grocer. Moreover her papa's brother married an English lady of family; this lady had been presented at court, and had acquaintances with honorable prefixes to their names. Moreover, there is a tradition in Ann Maria's family that "dear A'nt Sabrina," as Ann Maria always affectionately calls her, had in her palmy days been admired by a young viscount; so much so that he had inquired who she was at a ball, and had ogled her through his eyeglasses all the evening. Indeed, Ann Maria often says that if it hadn't been for "dear A'nt Sabrina's" offishness she might have been the Viscountess Merridale. I never could see any particular offishness about Aunt Sabrina. She never was very offish about snubbing me, I know. And if she had married the viscount I never could see that it would have been of any material advantage to Ann Maria, as she would then in all probability have never seen or heard of her. However, these are things I only say in the privacy of my own heart. I never say them in the bosom of my family.

When Ann Maria was young she lived for a while with her Aunt Sabrina. Consequently, one of my greatest miseries arises from that fact. As I am only a bank clerk in rather a small way, and therefore can not afford to keep up much style, I am constantly reminded by my loving helpmeet that she doesn't live at all as she used to at "dear A'nt Sabrina's." When my wife wants a dress, shawl, or bonnet of what seems to me extravagant price, and I soberly tell her I can not afford it, the partner of my bosom bursts into tears, and declares she never knew what it was to be refused any thing in the way of dress when she lived with "dear A'nt Sabrina." When any of my old country friends, and among them I have two brothers, honest and worthy, but plain and unpolished in their manners—when any of them come to see me, and we have a good social chat together, I observe that Ann Maria's aquiline nose seems to take a sudden turn to the retroussé order, and after my friends are gone, she often remarks, in an injured sort of tone, that this isn't at all the kind of society that she was accustomed to at "dear A'nt Sabrina's."

Added to these there is one more little quiet thorn-in-the-flesh that the partner of my joys and troubles keeps on hand wherewith to goad the flagging energies of her husband. Rumor says there was a young man who used to visit much at Aunt Sabrina's when Ann Maria lived there. Rumor says he was handsome, rich, and accomplished. Rumor says that the attraction there was Ann Maria herself. Indeed, Rumor has gone so far as to say that she might have married him if she chose!

Then why didn't she choose? Why did she refuse a rich, handsome, and accomplished man, and accept me (and without a demur, too, let me add), who am neither of the three. Why was this? I only ask these questions to myself in a feeble, wandering sort of way. I never ask my wife the question. If I did, she would cry, and I dislike to see a woman cry.

I said at the commencement that I was a family man. So I am! I have a wife and four charming daughters dependent upon the labor of these two hands for support; that is, my daughters are mainly dependent on me. They depend in a measure, I am led to believe, upon what their own beauty and fascinations may bring in the market. They are four tall, stylish girls, who are quite high in their aspirations, owing to the notions their mamma has instilled in them with regard to family. Ann Maria has often said to me, solemnly, "David, if dear A'nt Sabrina should ever ask me to let her have one of my girls for her own I should let her go; yes, David, even though it should break my heart to part with her, for she would have such superior advantages! How she would dress, and in what style she would live! and what high society she would see! Oh yes, I should certainly give her up; and then, perhaps, she would do better than her poor, foolish mamma, and not let a good opportunity pass by, and have to live in poverty all her days;" and dab came the thorn into my flesh, so that I couldn't help wincing as I said meekly to myself that I thought I had some little ownership in those four tall girls, and I shouldn't be willing to lose one of them. But Aunt Sabrina never asked for them.

I suppose I am rather proud of my girls; and, on the whole, I think they have rather a patronizing regard for me, though they say, "Don't be so old-fashioned, pa," just because I say "obleged" for obliged, and call their dresses "new gowns." They think "gowns" is a "horrid" word; but for my part I much prefer it to dress, for it strikes me that gown signifies one particular article of female apparel, while dress might mean the whole structure of a female, with the exception of the slight portion that is composed of flesh and blood. When I give my girls all the money they ask for (which is very, very seldom), they make a good deal of me. They kiss me, and pet me, and call me, "You good little pa," and "dear little pa"—and that reminds me of an observation I wish to make. Let me premise first that I am a small man; my wife, Ann Maria, is a tall woman. Rumor (the same Rumor that said the other things) tells me she is queenly! As I have never seen a queen, I can't say as to that. But I always wear a tall hat (and the tallest of its kind too) when she takes me out with her. I hold my head very high. I wear very thick soles and immensely high heels to my boots. I wear my hair piled up as high as possible on the top of my head. I wear high shirt-collars. In short, everything that art can devise to create the illusion that I am tall has been exhausted in my case, and yet the cruel fact remains—I am a small man! And the observation I wish to make is this: If you are a small man never—never marry a queenly woman! Tall women are all very well to look up to! They used to be the style I admired. I wish I had been content with admiring, for if I were to choose again—ah! what was I saying? Yes, I repeat it, don't marry a tall woman; for if you do, she will have you under her thumb from the moment the minister says "Amen" on the wedding-day. She will look down on you. She will frown down on you, and that is terrible. I speak as one who knows. There is nothing to shield you from the seathing fire, which from a short woman would be partly deadened by the eyebrow, as she frowns up.

My eldest girl is named Sabrina. Her name was decided upon some time before she had "shuffled" on "this mortal coil." My wife, in implicit faith, beautiful to behold, chided me for the mere supposition that the expected little stranger might turn out to be of the genus masculine. My youngest, and, I may add, my favorite daughter (as Sabrina is her mother's) was originally named Ann Maria for her mamma; but that primitive cognomen has become fashionable-ized into Annie Marie, and many a curtain-lecture from five tall, fair women has the old-fashioned little pa received when he has, before company, called her Ann Maria—a name she gave herself in her wee toddling days, and which I still love from old associations. The two daughters who come between are Josephine and Blanche. Now Jo, as we call her, is by strangers considered the beauty of the family. My wife says she has style enough to support a coronet. I don't doubt it myself; but where is the coronet to be supported? I suppose if a novelist were to describe her he would call her a proud beauty; he would rave about her magnificent raven tresses flowing in luxuriant ringlets—her glorious orbs, black as midnight, her complexion like the tints of a sea-shell, her ruby lips, her pearly teeth, her swan-like throat (never could see the force of that comparison; it never seemed to me that it would be a very pleasing sight to see a young female with a neck like the letter S—but I leave that to the novelist)—her exquisite shape, her stately gait, etc., etc., while I, in my prosaic language, should only call her a well-built girl, of clear complexion, with a good head of hair, which she "does" into one of those waterfalls of curls that are so common. I should say her eyes are black, that she has a good, sound set of teeth, and that perhaps she holds her head a little stiff; but I suppose that is owing to the ideas of family she has inherited. Now it chanced there is a young man here who has seemed inclined to hang round our Jo. I suppose I need give him no higher praise than to say that he is sufficiently eligible to suit the ambitious views of my wife, and all four of my girls; although they had not spoken directly to me on the subject, I saw enough to lead me to think that he would be no unwelcome addition to our family.

One night I came home from the bank and told my wife that I should have to leave the city for a few days on business. Now it is a very unusual thing for me to leave town, my business being such that I feel obliged to be always on the spot; so as I announced the news to them, feeling a little excited about it myself, it struck me that they took it in a wonderfully calm manner, although I detected sidelong glances from one to the other, which I was at a loss to interpret. Heretofore, when I had left town, even for a single night, it had caused quite a commotion in the house, for I must acknowledge that my family are of that insane order who are always imagining that burglars and assassins are prowling about, waiting an opportunity to break in. Now what there is in my house to tempt any such character I must say I am at a loss to imagine; but I have generally noticed that those who are the most suspicious of an attack are the ones least liable to it. Consequently, every night, even when I am at home, before retiring, a procession of five tall females is formed in my house, who make a diligent search all over the premises, peering under beds, as some one has wittily remarked, for the man they have hoped so long to find there—under stairs, in closets, and all dark places, where tradition says such vagrants love to lurk—examining windows and doors, inasmuch that all care is taken from me. I never have to see that my house is fastened up safe for the night. And, strange to say, these demented women accuse me of cowardice because, forsooth, I do not head their procession and take the nightly tramp with them. Now if I am small I am brave, particularly where there is no occasion to be otherwise, and I never had a fear in my life arising from anticipated invasion of burglar, assassin, ghost, apparition, or any thing of the kind. Therefore I laugh quietly in my sleeve, and listen to the procession as it sweeps up stairs and down, wondering what they would do if they should really find a man hidden away in some secret place some time. I shouldn't wonder if, after all, there would be raised, simultaneous with their shrieks, a cry for "pa" to come to the rescue.

So, as I was saying, as there had heretofore been such an ado when I chanced to spend a night away, about there being "no man in the house," I was surprised that they now took it so calmly. No mention was made of house-breakers, or even of shocking tragedies, which have become household words with my wife. However I went, and was gone three days, and when I returned found them all in the best of spirits. Some secret cause had entertained them highly in my absence I observed, and at last they saw fit to enlighten me. It seems that during my absence they had given a little supper, petit souper, as my eldest, who affects French, called it, to which a few choice spirits had been invited, and among them young H—, of whom I have spoken as being rather enamored of Jo. "The supper proved too much for him," said Blanche, "he couldn't resist any longer, so he made love to Jo on the spot; and now, papa, they are engaged."

"Engaged!" exclaimed I, angrily, "when he had never said a word to me on the subject! What does that mean?"

"Oh, pa, that's all out of fashion!" exclaimed Sabrina. "Nobody thinks of asking one's papa nowadays. Of course they know that a young lady wouldn't accept a gentleman's attentions unless her parents were willing she should marry him."

"Fashion or not," thundered I, "no daughter of mine shall ever be married to a man who hasn't respect enough for her parents to ask their consent!" and I slapped my hand on the table with such force as to make all the nick-nacks on it tremble.

"David," said my wife, majestically, "he has asked permission! He has asked mine, and I have given it," and she frowned down on me overwhelmingly.

"And pa," sneveled Jo, "I don't want to tell Frederick he must go and ask you. If I do he'll think that there's such a fuss made that he'll step off again. There's Belle Gordon using all her arts to get him now, when she knows we are engaged, for Blanche told her the very next day. And her father's rich if she is homely."

"If he hasn't any more love for you than that," said I, stoutly, "I shouldn't care how soon he steps off!"

"Mr. Fearing," and my wife loomed up before me, terrible in her wrath, "if you did one thing to break off this match I should never forgive you—never!"

Well, it is of no use recalling all the words of that evening. I can only say one small man is a poor match for five women in argument, so by-and-by we got to discussing matters quite amicably, owing, perhaps, partly to Jo's suggestion that she would be one off my hands, and would perhaps be able to help the others. Then ensued a discussion on what they call the "trousseau," and I was informed that I must give them carte blanche: the first wedding in the family, and to a young man of Frederick's position, she "would not put up with a shabby outfit."

"But my dear children," said I, "I can not afford it. I will let you have every cent I can spare. I can't do more than that!"

"Oh, 'can't afford it!'" said Blanche; "that's the old story we've heard ever since I can remember!"

Then four female tongues began at once, and all talked together about Mary Burton, and Salie Bryant, and May Sutton, and Susie Hadley—what elegant outfits they had when they were married. Judging from their conversation, and the confused notions I got from so many tongues combined, I gathered that each of the fair brides in question was endowed with several hundred dozen of linen generally, all trimmed with "real lace;" that each had the most wonderful number of the most wonderful silks that could "stand alone"—oh rare virtue!—that each had point-laces and lace-points, and velvets, and hats, and brooches, and bracelets, until my ears fairly ached with the jumble, and my brain with the effort to comprehend so much finery, when the climax was capped with the astounding assertion that two of them, at least, were no better able to have such things than they (my daughters) were. I say four tongues united in this chorus: one was silent. My eldest spake not much, nor had she seemed very much interested in the matter. Perhaps she felt piqued that a younger had been preferred before her; but the fact is, Sabrina is a little too stately. I don't think a man could pull his boots off quite at ease before her.

Well, the summing up of the whole matter was, that I told my family that I would do the best I could; but I must find some way of making money in addition to my salary, and that we must live very prudently in order to do much.

"Pa," suggested Annie Marie, "why don't you get some copying to do evenings? you have so much spare time, and perhaps I could help you when I have any leisure evenings. You know I write quite a bold hand, and besides," she added, archly, "if I do what I can to help Jo, perhaps she will do as much for me when it comes my turn!"

"You, puss! just as though any one would ever want to marry you," said I, reaching up to chuck her patronizingly under the chin.

Accordingly, the next day the following notice appeared in several of the leading city papers:

WANTED—By a rapid and accomplished penman, writing or copying to do evenings at home. Salary not so much an object as employment for leisure hours. Address, X. Y. Z. Box 16.

This advertisement was inserted in three papers several times, and all the notice that was ever taken of it by any one that I am aware of was by the printers, who sent in their bills in due time.

My first attempt at furnishing a dowry for Jo having turned out so prosperously, I felt encouraged to try again, and consequently I bought all the advertising papers of the city, and all my leisure time was spent in poring over the columns of the "Wants." There were so many tempting offers, so many chances of getting rich, how could I be content to plod on as a bank clerk with a paltry $1200 a year?

One day my wife met me with smiles when I came home to dinner. "David," said she, "I've an idea!"

"Good," said I, as I hung up my hat and she handed me a square she had clipped from a newspaper.

"Read that and see what you think of it."

I read in large capitals the following extraordinary announcement:

UNITED STATES PRIZE CONCERT!

TO BE DRAWN AT CROSBY'S OPERA-HOUSE, CHICAGO, MAY 28, 1896.

$125,000 Valuable Prizes, valued at $492,575 25, will be presented to Ticket Holders, including $100,000 in Greenbacks. No. of Tickets issued 500,000 Price $1 each.

This is the greatest inducement ever offered to the Public, one ticket out of every four drawing a prize.

Then followed a list of prizes:

1 Gift in Greenbacks.....	30,000 dollars.
1 do. do.	10,000 dollars.
1 do. do.	5,000 dollars.
1 do. do.	4,000 dollars.
1 do. do.	3,000 dollars.
1 do. do.	2,000 dollars.
etc. etc.	etc.

Then came a host of miscellaneous articles, estates, watches, jewelry, diamonds, pianos, plate, etc., etc., almost without number.

Address Wiggins, Bradford, & Co., 153  Street, Chicago, Illinois.

The Proprietors will donate to the Lincoln and Douglas Monument Funds $3000; also there will be $2000 reserved from the person drawing the $30,000 prize for the same purpose.

Then followed a most honorable list of references of undoubted respectability.

I read it all carefully through, and then turned with round, staring eyes to my wife.

"What about it?" I asked.

"Why, David, don't you see that you would only risk one dollar, and you may get several thousand back? and even if you shouldn't get money, there are so many things on the list that would be so useful to Jo."

"But only one out of four draws any thing," said I, "and I should be more likely to be the unlucky three than the lucky one."

"Pooh! you are just as likely to get a prize as any one else," said my wife. "Nothing venture, nothing have." What's a dollar? And so the dollar was posted to Chicago, and in a few days afterward came the ticket, No. 2, entitling the holder to whatever prize that ticket should draw.

Meanwhile, although feasting somewhat on the anticipation of the $30,000 that was perhaps in store for me, I still pored over the columns of Wants. Once in a while something I thought eligible would occur—for instance:

WANTED—A gentleman of character and good business capacity as equal partner in a cash business in this city, well-established, genteel and pleasant. Will pay a profit of $300 per month. To a gent meaning business this offers great inducements.

WANTED—A partner in a long-established business. Profits, $6000 a year. No bonus.

WANTED—A reliable man as equal partner in a respectable and very lucrative business.

WANTED—Live men to engage in a genteel business that will pay them $15 per day.

WANTED—A partner with $200 in a legitimate business, paying $3000 a year, etc.

I think I can safely say that I responded to each of these wants, and many others, either in person or by letter, but there seemed to be something in the way in every case. I was too old, or hadn't sufficient capital or influence, or too short, or wasn't "live" enough, and some of them didn't suit me; when I found what their flashy advertisements amounted to in real life I was ready to cry with the preacher, "All is vanity and vexation of spirit." And in no case where they would have admitted me would I have condescended to enter and risk my small capital for their very uncertain profit of numberless thousands.

Meanwhile the winter was "over and gone," and I suppose the voice of the turtle was heard in the land, as spring had come; but as I have never heard a turtle sing I could not be numbered among its listening audience. And the time wore on until the 28th of May had nearly arrived. "Pa," said Jo one morning, "why don't we see any thing in the papers about that Prize Concert? It was to be on the 28th!"

"I've been thinking of that same thing, my dear," rejoined I. "Ah, there's the morning paper now; perhaps that may give us some information, the time is so near at hand," and the paper was laid on the breakfast-table, and together we pored over its damp columns.

"There!" exclaimed Blanche, who was peering over my shoulder, extending a long, shapely forefinger toward the notice, "there it is, 'United States Prize Concert.'"

"Oh, what is it? What does it say?" chimed in my wife and two of the "blessed bairns" in concert.

We read; it was a postponement of the concert until July, as all of the tickets were not sold; the proprietors feared the public would be dissatisfied if so many of the tickets remained in their own hands.

And here let me remark, sotto voce, that from that day to this, not another word in any way, shape, or fashion, have I heard or seen with regard to this monster concert. There is another like unto it, called the "K* Prize Concert," which differs from it in a few particulars, but which does not feed the hope that it is the same, for it promises to give to every other ticket-holder a prize, although in every other respect it is very similar. But I don't know as it makes any particular difference whether one has a share in the one or in both, for the difference seems to be that while one is indefinitely postponed, or "bust up" altogether, the other has spasmodic action every few months, which revives the dying hopes of its victims that the thing is really coming off, and the next moment it collapses again and says: "Let me sleep a little longer, and on such a day I will positively disembowel myself, and declare my dividends." It is an ignis fatuus. Pursue it and you only lose your pains, for you will never catch it. It seems always to keep a short distance ahead.

One day as I was poring over the columns of the paper I met with an advertisement that struck me at once. It promised to tell how any one could realize a steady income of from three to five thousand dollars a year, and all that was necessary in order to attain this wonderful knowledge was to send your address (and inclose a stamp) to James Thompson & Co., No.  Nassau Street, New York.

Postage-stamps are cheap, and curiosity is a nuisance when ungratified, therefore I sent. In return I received a circular which I consider a perfect wonder in literature. It is all about a new book published by a remarkable man, which is for sale at the low price of one dollar per copy. It is called "The Illustrated Silent Friend," and the author, Dr. Earl, must be the wonder of the age, if the book tells all it professes to do. There is a good hour's reading in the circular, and I can not forbear quoting some of its wonders:

It teaches how to rear up the most splendid Habitations with very little labor, and scarcely any expense worth speaking of.

It teaches how to make 25 yards of superior Oil-cloth for $1.

It teaches how to make the Human Teeth, when faulty or brown, as even and as white as Ivory or as Pearls.

It teaches how to draw Lucky Numbers in Lotteries, and to be successful in all Games of Chance.

It teaches how to cause all Public Men to become Splendid Speakers and Orators.

It teaches how to make an Imitation of Gold so near the Pure Gold itself that no one can tell the difference in Sound or Color.

It teaches how the primitive elements may be so combined as to produce the Diamond, Ruby, Topaz, Emerald, Sapphire, at very little expense or trouble. These gems are so natural that I am led to believe they are real; at least I never could detect the difference.

It teaches what the Elixir of Life is as taught in the Middle Ages.

It teaches how Bald People may cause themselves to have a beautiful head of rich Hair, and of a Brilliant Jet Black, or Auburn, as desired.

It teaches the powers of Natural and Celestial Magic. Some things that are Funny, some that are Mysterious, some that are Wicked, and many that are Valuable, and all of them are entirely new, never having before been published in any Language. Many of them are Discoveries of my own, while the rest are selected out of old and rare MSS. hidden away in Convents, Tombs, old Libraries, etc., by the Philosophers and Magicians of the Middle Ages.

Now don't every body think a book that will teach these things, and multitudes of others (for these are but a drop from the ocean of its learning), well worth $1? But there are two things noticeable about this wonderful document:

First, there are the "Opinions of the Press." Very flattering, to be sure, and quoted from the Herald, Tribune, and Times; but as no particular ones are indicated, and as our beloved country is supposed to boast a large number of papers scattered over its breadth with these headings, it is rather indefinite, to say the least; or it may be the opinions of our neighbors across the water, in part, expressed while the learned Doctor was "rambling over Europe" and peeping into the "Tombs of the Middle Ages."

Then again—and this was what caused me to withhold my dollar—the public are several times warned that they can not be too careful. As they understand there is a book in circulation, bearing the same name, which is but a worthless and miserable imitation! I thought it altogether likely that the spurious one would be the one I should receive.

And now my attention was drawn in another direction. A most brilliant scheme was started, and I read it aloud to my assembled family at the tea-table. The Crosby Opera-house itself, that should have been the scene of our former success, was now put up, a fortune to the lucky winner, and first-class pictures tempting enough to people as fond of them as we, and only five dollars a ticket!

"And our own Ketchum & Co. are the agents, papa," said Sabrina; "so, of course, it is good, or that respectable house would have nothing to do with it."

I thought so too, and accordingly my five dollars was deposited at Ketchum & Co.'s counter, and in return I received a very good engraving of "The Apple Gatherers," which, however, I must say is not nearly so fine a picture as I might have purchased for the same money; but, in addition to the Opera-house, I shouldn't have considered it a bad bargain for five dollars.

But, alas! no Opera-house or painting fell to my lot. I was not one of the lucky winners in that arena; and I acknowledge that, as I writhed in secret, like the rest of the disappointed crowd, I mentally anathematized all gift enterprises, and declared I had been "taken in and done for" for the last time.

But the end was not yet. The next stirring incident that lifted us in sight of one round of the ladder to wealth was the fair for the "Home for the Orphans of Soldiers and Sailors," which had the sanction of the names of Mrs. General , Mrs. , and a number of ladies of the highest respectability. When I was urged to buy in this by my family, who had faith still, like Micawber, that something good would turn up, I virtuously said "No," and sternly set my face against all their arguments. But my daughter Jo, finding that a present of some kind was promised to every ticket-holder, and that diamonds were among the gifts, was dazzled by the thought that the coveted diamonds might be hers, and becoming suddenly inclined to benevolence, concluded she would give a dollar toward erecting a home for these "poor little orphans, whose fathers had done so much for us; and should not we be willing to deny ourselves a little for them?" asked she, with a patriotism and philanthropy that made me quite ashamed of myself, and proud of her, until I heard her remark in an undertone to her sister that she thought, on the whole, she should prefer a "Steinway" to the diamonds.

Well, from that time to this we have never seen any notice of the Fair. It can not have been chronicled in the Journal, for I read that paper most religiously; but last week Jo received a paper with a list of the numbers that drew prizes, so we conclude that the Fair has taken place—but where is "Jenkins," that he did not retail it in his New York gossip? Upon employing the united eyes of the family (and the operation gave us all weak eyes for a day or two) in scanning the long, finely-printed columns of numbers, we arrived at last to the sad conclusion that Jo's number was not among them. And would you believe it, it seemed to be no comfort to my daughter that her money was gone to aid the poor little ones, so grievously was she disappointed about the diamonds! To be sure, there is a hint in the corner of the paper that those whose numbers are not on the list will receive a photograph or something of the kind, but my daughter has a soul above such trifles, and nothing short of a $50 gift will be accepted by her, I imagine.

I have never speculated in lotteries since the failures above recorded; but in some mysterious manner my name seems to have become famous in the annals of my country, for I often receive papers from unknown sources, making me the most liberal of offers. In January of last year I received the following letter:

OFFICE OF J. H. WITMAN & CO.,
GENERAL LOTTERY AGENTS.
Licensed by the United States Government.
NEW YORK, December 21, 1867.

DEAR SIR,—We have come to the conclusion to increase our business in your part of the country by adding to the number of our correspondents; and feeling convinced that the safest and most satisfactory plan of doing so is to send a prize of a few thousand dollars to some discreet and reliable person, who will have no objection to show the money and state the fact to his acquaintances that the prize was drawn by a lucky investment at our office, we have therefore selected you as the party more likely than any one else to aid us in our enterprise, and make you the following liberal and extraordinary proposition: Send us $10 to pay the Managers of the Lotteries for a splendidly-arranged package of Eighty Tickets, which we have carefully selected and labeled, subject to your order in the inclosed Grand Scheme, to be drawn on the plan of the Royal Havana Lottery. And that you may not suppose that there is any deception in it, we inform you that the prize-money does not come out of our pockets, but out of that of the Lottery Managers; and we shall not lose by sending you a few thousand dollars, but be gainers by the increased amount of business we shall expect from your neighborhood when you show the "Greenbacks," and make it well known that they are the proceeds of a prize drawn at our office. We make this offer to you in strict confidence. The proposal is plain. We are to send a package of tickets for a chance to draw a few thousand dollars. You are to show the money as above stated. The result will be that hundreds of dollars will be sent to us for tickets. You may be the gainer of a few thousands. We shall be the gainers by our sales, and the parties who send for tickets may be gainers by drawing prizes of different amounts as specified on the scheme. Every one who sends will of course expect to draw a prize, not knowing the offer we made privately to you. And to set at rest any doubt you may have of our sincerity, we hereby bind ourselves to forward you another package in our brilliant Extra Lottery for nothing, if the first we send does not draw you, clear of all expenses, two thousand dollars. We mention this merely to show you that it is to our interest to send you a prize. Use the inclosed envelope in sending the $10, and state whether we shall send you a draft on your nearest bank, or the amount in "Greenbacks" by mail, which will perhaps suit you better. Be careful to write in a plain hand your P. O. county and State. Wafer or seal your letter so that it will not come open in the mails. Please consider this letter strictly private and confidential, and send your order without delay. Very sincerely yours,
J. H. WITMAN & CO.,
4  Street, N. Y.

The official drawing of the above Lotteries will be sent you as soon as over, and is also published in the New York Herald and Times.

Now, mark the lofty composure with which he speaks of his "few thousands." Tantalus's situation was nothing to mine, pressed as I am for money. But could I afford to risk $10? At last an idea occurred to me, and I seized my pen and wrote back, to this effect: that if they would advance the required $10 in my name, and it drew the prize mentioned, they might retain $20 or even $30 and send the rest to me, and I would take care to make the fact that it was drawn at their office as notorious as they could wish, thus conferring the favor upon them they desired, while I risked nothing of my own. I also stated that I should decidedly prefer "Greenbacks." Since which time I have heard nothing of or from J. H. Witman & Co.

I have now in my possession (which have been sent, unsolicited, to me) the following tickets, subject to my order:

1 ticket for superbly finished set of tea-spoons in heavy silver plate, marked $10.
1 ticket for a binged or half-round beautiful band bracelet, marked $7.
1 ticket for a lady's set of jet and gold, marked A, $21.

1 ticket for gent's vest chain, marked C, $23 50.
1 ticket for superbly mounted revolving castor and condiment holder, $35.
1 ticket for richly finished Alfratta cased imitation gold hunting watch $50.
1 ticket for richly finished pair pocket-pistols, petit size, elegant pattern, marked $15 each—$30 the pair.

And several others, too tedious to mention. All of these, if there is any veracity in the statement of their vendors, are to be mine by the payment of a mere nominal sum; but my daughters turn up their aristocratic noses at sham jewelry, as they declare this must be. They strike for the real, and I rather agree with them.

Consequently I offer the whole set of tickets to the highest bidder, and, meanwhile, my daughter waits. Her trousseau is not yet furnished. Can any one suggest any lawful means of making money fast, to an undersized, middle-aged man, without much capital?

"I pause for a reply."

MRS. TYPESET'S DIARY.

Christmas Eve.—The little folks, weary with pleasure, are fast asleep, the treasures bestowed by Santa Claus being close beside them. The Christmas-tree, bending with gifts, quite dazzled their wide-open, wonder-stricken eyes, as Uncle Fred threw open the folding-doors and disclosed it, bright and glittering, in the centre of the parlor. What a rush of young feet! A momentary silence of astonishment, and then a simultaneous and prolonged "O-h!" in which wee Mary's baby voice, comically expressive of wonderment, rang out clear and sweet. Blessings on the children! Christmas is their merry time of all the year; and the more the merrier! And a gay group gathered round our tree to-night, graduated in size from baby M.—who traveled many miles to grace the scene—to my roguish little Frank, whom Christmas has brought home at length from the country. And Johnny had leave to extend his visit—and Willie and Fannie, and Lawrie and Etta, and all the other cousins made up a glad circle. Such a chattering as there was! such critical examination of the Christmas fruit! until, with an emphatic little scream, small Mary indicated that she was impatient to be helped! And the Christmas-tree was plucked, and she was helped, to her great delight—and all the little folks had a share, and every body was remembered by good Santa Claus, and one and all were very, very happy—and very tired, too, when bedtime came.

Christmas Night.—Nothing could be more enjoyable to me, as a termination of Christmas, than listening to the performance of "The Messiah." Steinway Hall was densely crowded, and the Harmonic Society has rarely done itself more credit. The solos were rendered with great taste, and some were exquisitely beautiful. Miss Hutchings sang "He shall feed his flock" with touching pathos, and repeated it in answer to a warm encore. I shall not soon forget Madame Parepa-Rosa's rendering of "Come unto Him." The sweet, clear, high notes of "He shall give you rest" have lingered in my ears ever since. There was something very charming in the manner of Madame Rosa as she sang it a second time. The enthusiastic burst of applause which followed her first singing of it unmistakably indicated that the audience must hear it again; and without any prolonged waiting, she rose with a pleasant, cordial air, as much as to say, "I am glad to give you so much pleasure, and I shall be happy to do it again; it is no trouble at all!" She sings like a bird—as if she couldn't help it. The Hallelujah chorus was grand; and it was a grand sight, too, to see that great crowd stand and join mentally in the song of praise.

Thursday Eve.—A certain "Lily Maxwell" has stirred the political heart of Manchester, England. She has voted—actually offered her vote for a member of Parliament, and the returning officer, being bound by the register of voters, which contained her name, was obliged to accept it! How a lady's name found its way into the Register is a mystery which has not been solved. But the fact remains that, "attended by two other ladies, one of whom was the Secretary of the Woman's Suffrage Society of Manchester, and escorted from the Committee-room by a large body-guard" probably composed of men, though the report says of "persons"—"Lily Maxwell" has "planted the standard of Woman's Rights in the heart of the British Constitution."

"Woman's Rights" in this country do not extend to seamstresses—that is quite certain. A short time ago a large establishment in this city gave to a poor woman materials for an infant's cape. It was white Marseilles, and was to be elaborately wrought. It took her fourteen days of hard work to complete it, and then she was rewarded with the munificent sum of four dollars! The work was well done, and the article sold afterward for seventy dollars! The materials cost about seven dollars.

Am quite delighted with the new method of procuring books from the Mercantile Library. To-day I took a blank order, filled it out with number of folio, address, etc., mentioned name of a book I wanted, put on one of the little red stamps, and dropped it into the order-box at Thirty-fourth Street, about ten o'clock this morning. About two this afternoon I received the book. A very prompt and satisfactory method to the reader, at least.

The skating costume of a certain Parisian Countess is reported to be of black velvet lined with violet satin, and trimmed with chinchilla. This is covered with an elegant polonaise, color Biemarck, also lined with violet satin. Here brilliant colors are generally preferred, and very warm and gay they look upon the ice. Skating, carefully enjoyed, will give strength, health, and good spirits. But those unaccustomed to the exercise should indulge moderately; and all should avoid getting chilly after having become heated by skating.

Friday Eve.—"Any letters?" I asked of Mr. T. C.

as I returned from a household expedition this morning, and found him still poring over the newspapers. I knew it was past the delivery hour, and I was expecting letters. Mr. T. drew one slowly from his pocket, saying, solemnly, "According to a recent decision made by the Court of Appeals, at Louisville, that a husband can not control or open his wife's private correspondence, I have not broken the seal of this envelope; and I have no 'jealous or prying curiosity' about its contents. In short, I am wholly willing you should 'keep, read, and cherish' it as your own." I opened the envelope, and pulled out my last month's market bill! Mr. T. continued to study the advertisements in his paper most unconsciously. The address on the envelope did not look just like his writing, but my private opinion was that he knew the contents as well as I did.

"And I forgot to tell you," added he, still searching the advertisements, "that you received some wedding-cards yesterday."

"Whose were they?" I inquired, eagerly.

"I don't know," said he; "unfortunately they were addressed to you and me together, and I could not open my half of the letter without a possibility of 'interfering with your confidential correspondence.'"

"What are you talking about!" I exclaimed, "and do give me the cards!"

"I can not, my dear; unfortunately, I left them on my desk down town. But really," continued he, changing his bantering tone, "I am sorry, and will try to bring them up to-night."

But I told him, as he put on his over-coat and hat, that I "had not the least idea he would remember them"—the surest way, I have found, to impress any thing upon his mind.

A very simple method of warming cars is practiced on European railways. A tube which runs lengthwise of the car is filled from time to time with hot water, and on this the passengers can put their cold feet; and this heat of the tube will be sufficient to mollify the air of the car enough for comfort. Such an arrangement would be exceedingly comfortable if introduced into our city horse-cars.

Yet it seems strange, when we read the experiences of Arctic travelers, that we in this country should suffer with cold. A member of one of the late "telegraphic expeditions" to Siberia writes: "I am afraid you would think that I was availing myself of a traveler's privilege, and relating a very large 'yarn,' if I told you how comfortably I have slept on the snow in temperatures of 35°, 40°, and 45° below zero. We are obliged to sleep in fur bags, of course, with our faces entirely covered, and to take the utmost care to have our fur stockings perfectly dry; but I have slept in that way through the long Arctic nights as comfortably as ever I did in a bed at home."

Saturday.—It is very wonderful to what an extent Chromo-Lithography can bring out the richness of coloring, the delicacy of tint, and the sweetness of expression which mark hand-copies of the choicest master-pieces. Whatever at once gratifies the eye and improves the taste is a blessing to the community; and this new art promises to diffuse not merely a love of art among the people at large, but to disseminate copies of the best works of the best masters. In ordinary lithography the drawing is made upon a slab of limestone with a sort of oily soap which adheres to the stone, and enters into chemical combination with it after certain applications. Water is then applied to the stone, and afterward the lithographic ink, which adheres only to the oily lines. But a chromo is a picture printed from stone, in colors; each color requiring a separate impression. The first proof in a chromo is a light ground-tint, faint and shadowy—scarcely even an outline of the picture; the second proof imparts another color, and the process is repeated again and again, occasionally as often as thirty times. The number of impressions, however, does not necessarily indicate the number of colors in a painting, because the colors and tints are greatly multiplied by combinations created in the process of printing one over another. In twenty-five impressions it is sometimes necessary and possible to produce a hundred distinct shades. The last impression gives a delicate and peculiar resemblance to canvas. The drawing and coloring are not the only difficult processes in making chromos—many other parts of the work require great judgment, care, and skill. "Registering," for example, which consists of so arranging the paper in the press that it shall receive the impression on exactly the same spot of every sheet, is as important as any other branch of the art, for the difference of a hair's breadth would spoil a picture, as it would hopelessly mix up the colors.

The Berlin oil and the English water-color chromo-lithographs have, till quite recently, taken the first rank in this art; but Mr. Prang, of Boston, has succeeded in executing American chromos which compare favorably with any European productions. His chromos of Rosa Bonheur's oxen, Bruth's "Kid's Play-ground," Tait's "Chickens and Ducklings," and the illuminated "Beatitudes," are very beautiful; while Correggio's "Magdalena" equals, and perhaps surpasses, any thing hitherto given to the public, and can hardly fail to be warmly appreciated by lovers of art.

Painters may well find in this new art of Chromo-Lithograph a fresh motive to excite them to strive for excellence and perfection in their works—the originals of these chromos. The masses are not, in general, able to purchase first-class oil-paintings—they are too expensive. It is only the wealthy who can afford to pay their hundreds for one picture. But now, by this art, almost every one can have the opportunity of cultivating artistic tastes. And copies of beautiful pictures, scattered through the country, will have a softening and refining influence upon our people.

Sunday Eve.—Lecture this evening on the civil and social life of the Jews in the time of Christ. In describing the dress the minister remarked that "vanity in dress was not modern." Though there was not a glass window in all Palestine, not a house was without a mirror made of polished metal. A modern belle looking on her Jewish sister might certainly lament the degeneracy of the age. To ear-rings she added a ring in the nose. The single bracelet of to-day is all that is left of the armlets which literally covered her arms from the shoulder to the wrist. The cosmetics secretly applied are a substitute for the paint with which she ornamented her face with as little secrecy as a modern belle employs in adding to her hair. Pins, sparkling with precious stones, gathered the flowing robes of the Jewess about neck and waist. Rings loaded down her hands; chains of gold hanging from the neck bore no watch indeed but some sacred amulet; while golden manacles encircled the ankles and, chained together, compelled the mincing gait which the modern beauty has to study, and tinkling pendent ornaments made it literally true that she had music wherever she went."

Centre of Lace Tidy in Satin Stitch.

The design shows the centre of a tidy of worsted lace, 16 inches long and 14 inches wide. It is embroidered in satin stitch with colored zephyr worsted and floss silk. The outer edge is surrounded by a strip of woolen lace about three inches wide, which is worked on one side in button-hole stitch; three shades of green zephyr worsted are drawn through the lace. The other edge of this strip is pleated a little, and is sewed to the tidy. Before embroidering it the stuff must be fastened to a double layer of thick black lace, then the pattern must be copied on paper, after which the design is worked obliquely in satin stitch, half polka, or vine stitch, and in French knots, in colors as true as possible to nature. Having finished the embroidery, cut away the paper and the stiff lace on the wrong side; hem it all around, and surround it with the strip of lace before mentioned.

Crochet Garter.

MATERIALS: red worsted and red silk elastic. This garter is made of red worsted, in a kind of Afghan stitch, worked lengthwise. Red silk elastic is run through each broken row. Buttons and loops are used for fastening. The place where it is fastened is covered with a crocheted rosette. For working this garter make of the red worsted a chain of the required length; upon this work the first part of the first pattern row as follows: Out of the 5 last chain make a stitch by inserting the needle into the 6th chain, putting the thread once around the needle and drawing it through; then make 3 chain; these 3 chain form a long stitch. Make one of these long stitches in every 2d chain. As in the Afghan stitch, the last loop of every long stitch must remain on the needle. Now work back, dropping each loop, making 1 chain between. Make three of these rows, and the garter will be wide enough. At the beginning of the 2d and 3d rows 3 chain must be made, and the long stitches must always be directly over one another. The elastic must not be quite as long as the garter, so that the work will be a little full. Run it through the loops, between the long stitches in front and the single threads at the back, as shown in the illustration, which represents part of the garter, the full size. Fasten the ends carefully.

For the rosette, make with the red worsted a chain of 6 stitches; form it into a round with a slip stitch. * take up the next chain, put the thread once around the needle and make 1 stitch. Make 9 similar single crochet stitches in the same chain stitch. To give these 10 single crochet stitches the form of a loop, take up the next chain and make in it 1 slip stitch, not putting the thread around the needle. Repeat from * 5 times. 2d row of the rosette: between every 2 loops make 1 single crochet; after every single crochet 1 chain. The 3d row is a row of loops like the 1st, but the loops must always be made in the chain stitches of the former row. Make, by turns, in 1 chain 1 loop, and in the next chain 2 loops. This row will now contain 9 loops. Having worked so far, the rosette is easily finished. The original contains 4 rows of loops, in which the number of loops is increased as much as is necessary. A row like the 2d row must be worked between every row of loops. Sew the rosette, when finished, to the garter, in its proper place.

Ladies' Knitted Waistband.

This waistband is knitted with white 12-fold worsted, crossways, on two steel knitting needles, in rows back and forth, always to the right. Cast on 45 stitches, work thereupon 30 rows, in which, at regular intervals, widen 1 stitch 6 times; this widening must always take place at the end of the row, and only on one side of the work, at the under edge; then work 10 rows without widening. Now commence the gore, in working which do not omit to widen one stitch twice in every 16 rows.

KNITTED OVERSHOE AND LEGGING.

In making this gore, in the next and the 4 following rows going forward, on the upper edge of the waistband, miss 3 stitches. In the following 5 rows miss 2 stitches. Every row, going backward, which we have not particularly mentioned, is worked on the stitches of the row going forward. After finishing the first 20 rows of the gore lengthen the next row 13 stitches, by adding to it the 2 stitches that have been 5 times missed. The next forward row is lengthened 6 stitches. In every following forward row miss one stitch till only 27 stitches remain on the needle. Then in each of the next rows going forward miss 3 stitches. Add to the 12 stitches which now remain on the needle all the missed stitches, and knit the whole quantity for 120 rows, in which, at the lower edge of every 6th row, 1 stitch must be added. In the 1st and 3d rows, after the 120 rows, at the lower edge, miss 3 stitches; then work 16 rows, in which on the upper edge 5 and on the lower edge 3 stitches are alternately missed. From this point the rows are increased by adding alternately the 5 and the 3 stitches that have been missed in the former rows. Finally, work 2 more rows, and the waistband will be half finished. Now work the second part like the first, in an opposite direction. Widen on the lower edge every time where it was narrowed in the first part. On the upper and lower edge 5 rows of single crochet are worked. Double a strip of linen, turn in the edges, and stitch it on each side, putting the work between the thicknesses. The linen must be one and a half inches wide. Each of these strips has a whalebone, and eyelets for lacing.

Knitted Overshoe.

See illustration, page 184.
MATERIALS: white and light blue zephyr worsted.
These knitted overshoes are excellent for carriage wear, as they keep the feet much warmer than an ordinary rubber overshoe can do. They are knitted of blue and white worsted, in the form of little squares, and are shaped like ordinary stockings. Beginning at the upper edge cast on 72 stitches with blue worsted. Knit 20 rows as follows: 1st row in plain knitting, 2d row purl stitch, both rows of blue worsted. From the 3d to the 6th row in white worsted in plain knitting: 7th row in blue worsted, 3 stitches in plain knitting, then draw the thread through the next stitch of the 2d row knitted in blue; draw it through in a loop and keep it on the needle. Again, 3 stitches in plain knitting, etc.; 8th row in purl stitch with blue worsted. Take up the loop in the preceding row, knit it and the stitch before it into one stitch; repeat twice from the 3d to the 8th row, making the loops alternate, as shown in the illustration. Knit 26 rows with white worsted, 2 stitches plain, 2 stitches purl. The foot part is composed of little squares, and is shaped like a common stocking. The under part of the heel is knit as follows: leave the 11 middle stitches of the heel, and in every row knit the 1st and 11th together with one of the side stitches till the side stitches are all used up. In making the toe, work so that in both sides of the toe a stripe like a hand is formed by narrowing. This is done, in the row where you narrow, by knitting together the 3d and 4th stitches. Take the 4th stitch from the end of the 2d needle, knit the next stitch, and draw the 4th stitch over. This narrowing is also done on the two other needles in the same way. Be careful to narrow exactly according to these directions, so that between the two narrowing rows at the end, and at the beginning of 2 needles, 4 stitches will always remain. To make more or less rounds, as may be wished, for a number of times at first, put 2 or 3 rows between; afterward, only one row. Two of the remaining stitches are always knitted together. For the finishing of the shoe mark the sole by crocheting one row in slip stitch of blue worsted all around. Crochet also in slip stitch on the edge of the two sides of the heel. The upper edge of the sock has a double row of loops of blue worsted, which are made over a narrow fringe stick three quarters of an inch wide.

Crocheted Sole.

See illustration, page 184.

This sole, which is crocheted of white zephyr, is placed inside of the shoe, and protects the foot from cold and dampness. The worsted is crocheted over an interlining of the same material. The sole must be fitted to the shoe. First arrange a strand of 12 threads of strong white zephyr worsted of suitable length (the original is about 9 inches long and of proportionate width, the length of the strand being about 2½ yards); then crochet loosely over this strand in single crochet, with one chain between. This crocheted strand is sewed together on the wrong side, as shown in the engraving. In the centre of the sole sew it over again, and draw it together, so as to narrow it in the proper place.

Ladies' Knitted Overshoe and Legging.

See illustration, page 184.

MATERIALS: red and black zephyr worsted, coarse black worsted, and steel knitting-needles.

For this overshoe and legging the upper edge is knitted round; the other part is knitted lengthways, in a striped design of red and black zephyr worsted. The sole of the overshoe is arranged so that the heel of the shoe can come through, and is knitted with strong black worsted. Begin this overshoe below the upper edge. Cast on 16 stitches, on needles suitable to the worsted. Knit 2 rows in plain knitting stitch; at the end of the first row 3 more stitches are cast on. Then knit with the red worsted 4 rows in plain knitting stitch, adding at the 1st and 3d row 3 more stitches. Then follow with a black and red stripe in the same way, and with the same widening. At the 3d black stripe in the 3d row 36 stitches must be cast on, so that the whole number of stitches is now 72. Knit 10 stripes without increasing. At the end of the last stripe let the thread hang, and begin the gore on the lower edge of the overshoe. This is also striped, and worked back and forth. Take for this purpose the last 2 of the 72 stitches and an extra needle; knit 12 stripes, and in every 2d row knit the next one of the 70 stitches with the gore stitch, so that at the end of the 12th stripe 26 stitches are on the needle. Then begin again from the upper edge with a red stripe. In the 1st row of this put in 22, and in the 3d row 3 stitches, and knit 5 more stripes, always adding 3 stitches as before. Work 9 stripes without widening to form the toe; 5 of these 9 stripes form the middle of the shoe. Work the 2d half in the same way, only, instead of widening, slip off the stitches. The 2d gore, however, is begun with 26 stitches. It is pointed by narrowing regularly 2 stitches on one side. In the 1st row of the next stripe, which is worked over the whole row of stitches, the stitches on the bias side of the gore are taken up to obtain the necessary number. When the knitting is finished, sew the sock together on the wrong side. Take up the stitches on the upper edge and knit around 13 stripes, alternately with black and red worsted. Every stripe consists of 3 rows, of which 2 stitches are knit and 2 purled. Knot the sole in the manner described in Harper's Bazar, No. 9. Sew the sole to the sock, and cover and protect the seam by a narrow knotted stripe, which is worked with 4 threads, each nearly one yard long.

Silver-Gray Velvet Bonnet.

See illustration, page 185.

BONNET of silver-gray velvet trimmed in the front with gray flowers, and also with gray Angora fringe in the manner shown in the illustration. Strings of gray ribbon, trimmed on the ends with Angora fringe, and fastened under the chin with a small black velvet bow.

Brown Velvet Bonnet.

BONNET of brown velvet trimmed with a long brown grebe feather and brown watered ribbon. Scarf veil of black lace. The inside trimming of the bonnet consists of black jet beads and gretlets, sewed on a bandeau of black velvet.

Round Hat with Veil.

See illustration, page 185.

This hat is remarkable for the arrangement of the veil, which is fastened to the back and brought round in front in such a manner as to protect the ears and chin from the cold. An excellent thing for those who wear round hats in cold weather.

A PAIR OF SHOES.

"I THINK," said Phil, "it is so with nearly all of us: the greatest events in our experience depend upon some commonplace trifle of everyday life."

"Oh, then, Mr. Maxwell, I am sure it must be so with you; you never would have imagined such a thing all out of your own head," Nettie exclaimed, who, not content with being stupid and pretty as nature made her, was always aspiring to be arch and clever, with what success people will soon discover. "Do tell us, Mr. Maxwell, what trifle made you and—?" Even her courage failed before the dead silence in which we all tremblingly awaited the conclusion of her question, for there were events in Mr. Maxwell's life that, to him at least, were known to be great, and in all these years his own family even had carefully avoided the remotest allusion to the past—his past—and here in public, before us all, Nettie had all but asked him outright what had wrecked his happiness! I hardly dared look at Phil, my heart ached so for him; but his answer compelled my eyes to rest upon his face, in which there was far less emotion than we expected; for, in good truth, Phil was suspected to be none of the gentlest, and if a volcano were about bursting under our feet we could not have sat more terror-stricken.

"Your penetration is wonderful, Miss Nettie. I never should or could have imagined such a thing all out of my own head; and the 'trifle' in my case, since you ask it, was—a pair of shoes."

"A pair of shoes!" repeated Nettie, reassured by his quiet tone. "Do tell us all about it, Mr. Maxwell. We will all sit as quiet as mice, and not even whisper, if you will only tell us all of it, every thing about it, for I don't see how a pair of shoes could affect a grave man like you. I am sure you will make it very interesting. Nobody ever refuses me any thing. Now begin."

But Phil's endurance was never long-lived. "Nobody ever refuses you any thing? Then I must obey you, and begin to refuse you."

Blunt and plain, there it was, and a damper fell upon even Nettie. So I sang—though with a heavy heart; for I had almost forgotten, and now it was all brought up again to make him miserable, and me—any thing I could think of to take away the uncomfortable feeling. I had my reward, for when they were all gone Phil came and thanked me.

"Nettie is insufferable," he half groaned; "she has been persecuting me in one way or another for the last two years. I wish she would marry somebody and leave me alone. I do, indeed. You helped me out of it, Clara, as you do out of every thing. I hate to think about it, but now I can not help thinking of it. We have a long twilight coming on—let me tell you the story, will you, Clara? I think if I could tell it all out, all the folly and all the absurdity would show in their true colors, and I should be so ashamed of myself I might get over it and forget it."

Phil asking to tell his story to me! I only just knew there was a story, but why there had not been a happy ending I could never divine, did not dream I should ever know; and here was Phil leaning on the piano, looking far over me, and asking if he might tell his story to me!

"How much do you know already?" he asked. "Your scared look amused me so much, vexed as I was. I don't want to tell you stuff you know already; and yet besides the beginning and end there's not much to tell."

"I knew long ago that—that there was—some one—and—?" I could not go on.

"And that now there isn't? That's about the whole of it, Clara. There was some one once, and now there is no one! And both came from a pair of shoes, as I told Nettie truly. I'll tell you how there came to be some one. It was a long time before that came to pass. I knew all about women; we men all do at eighteen and twenty; there was not much danger of my being deceived; my eyes were entirely too wide open for that. You do not remember Nell in her gala days, but you know she was very gay; and when a fellow has a sister like her he naturally is a little difficult. Nell was just the best girl, and, although I was never young enough to be fooled by any of your dashing girls, but from the first sought out those whose girlish shyness kept them in the back-ground, it wasn't possible for me not to be proud of Nell's stately figure and queenly ways; and if she had ever failed to be the belle at any party I should have felt like breaking the stupid heads of the fools who neglected her; but I was never tried. Unquestionably, every school-boy knows it, the wall-flowers are the only real flowers of womanhood; but for some reason I never felt satisfied; they were flowers whose perfume and color I could not find; they weren't very lovely to look at after the first hour or so, and their conversation, for a party, was not always of the most entrancing sort. But my day was coming; our days always do come, you know, Clara."

Do they? Then I too may have mine! Was not Phil telling his story that nobody had ever heard to me?

"I saw a lady getting out of a carriage who stumbled a little; that was before the days of short dresses and balmorals, and it was not often one saw the tip end of a lady's boot outside of a shoe-store; so this lady blushed very vividly at her own awkwardness, as she thought it, in showing hers, and as soon as she recovered herself looked shyly around to see if it had been observed. I was coming down our steps, and she was going up those next door. I looked indifferent and unobservant, but she was not deceived, and so the pretty foot, the bright blushes, the charming confusion, made altogether a very nice little scene, which I had good cause to recall many times afterward. I met a lady in Broadway who blushed and was confused under the accidental glance of my careless eyes. I could not recall the face or account for the confusion for a long time, but I did remember at last. 'The little goose!' I said to myself, 'how odd that she should remember me!' It showed a great deal of sensitiveness, and I like sensitiveness, especially in very young and pretty girls. I met her at the opera, face to face; the same confusion, the same effort—a little slighter perhaps—to understand, and then I remembered again, and resolved if I ever saw the girl in the right place to get an introduction and relieve her mind, for I did not think the little misstep at all awkward. On the contrary, it was more graceful than the way in which I had seen many others, considering themselves perfectly mistresses of the art, alight from their carriages. I met her at a party, and evidently was recognized at once, although she was plainly trying to hide the fact from me. She was a very sweet-looking girl; her colors were light-blue and white. You know the kind of angel who looks best in those?"

Yes, I knew. I was never glad before that I was not fair; his tone was certainly that of one who is mocking himself. "Nell, you know," he continued, "was a purple woman, fair as a lily, deep eyes, golden-brown hair—fair and stately, gracious and queenly; but Nell was not, at that time, my ideal of womanhood. This was a blue-and-white angel, and her voice was very gentle, her manner deprecating; it seemed to be a perpetual wonder to her that you liked her, a perpetual pleading that you would try to love her a little more. No radiant smiles to greet you when you came, as if you needed to have your courage rewarded, your fears set at rest, but a pretty bashful way that I can not describe, but which was very bewitching I can tell you, Clara; as if she were about to send you away, but never doing it. 'I have found my angel,' I said to Nell—dear, magnificent Nell, so radiant as she was that night, I almost paused before letting her know that I, whom she loved best of all the world, had gone over to another divinity. 'I have found my angel,' I said. 'She is hardly full-fledged yet, according to the world's idea, but she suits me all the better for that. There's the sweet dew of innocent youth fresh upon her yet.' Nell did not laugh at me, but let me do all the poetry while she made note of practical things: 'Miss B—, No. 10 Blank Street. If you are sure of it, Phil, I'll call to-morrow; but you know, Phil, you are very hard to please, and girls look so differently by daylight.' 'But I have seen her by daylight; she wears sky-blue ribbons on her bonnets, and she is adorable.' 'Why, Phil?' 'I always judge a girl by her colors; I can't help it,' I said. 'You know you wear light-blue sometimes.' 'Thank you, dear,' she answered; 'don't apologize; there are very few colors, and there are girls by the thousand. But I will find out all about it to-morrow.' Nell was almost as much smitten as I, and entered into the spirit of the thing with all her heart, although in a week or two I was really in love, and could not talk of it even to Nell. Dear Nell! how good she was at that time! but when was there ever such a girl as Nell? Not another word was said between us, but there never was a party of any kind got up that she did not see that my angel was there, and never one so kindly looked after as she was. Nell would leave all her beaux and run up to meet her if she came in of an evening, dress her hair over again, pull her own bouquets to pieces for flowers to ornament it, and finally lead her in, blushing and shy as she always was, with a little vexation at her own embarrassment contracting her pretty brow and making her perfectly fascinating; while Nell, who was never discomposed in her life, and always had a word or smile ready for any emergency, would cover up all her little blunders—charming blunders I thought them, and was rather proud of them, for no man wants a library at the head of his house. Yes, Nell was very good to her, and she was very grateful in her acknowledgments. 'How good your sister is to me!' she has said a thousand times. 'I know, as every one does, how superior she is—so methodical, so orderly, so ready for any thing, so sensible, while I am always mislaying things or forgetting them, and am always frightened at the sound of my own voice.' 'Such a voice to be frightened at!' I would say. She would blush and pout at the compliment and the interruption, and then continue: 'And I know your sister thinks me a perfect little fool, yet she is so good to me. I hope you do not tell her all the silly things I say. I am not so much afraid of you.' 'Then you like me a little?' 'Oh no, I did not say that.' 'Then you mean I am not so sensible as Nell?' 'Oh, you are more so, of course, because women—I mean—with delicious confusion—I mean men ought to be; women are more domestic. I don't mean to say dear Nell is not; she is so bright that one can forgive her, even if—' So she would stammer out the one great principle I had laid down all my life in my own mind, that woman's rule was over the heart, not the mind; a principle dear Nell could never understand, good as she was, for she would put her head with all its braids and curls, and, I must say, its good, sound sense, against mine (she was almost as tall as I), and say, 'If I reach his head I surely can his heart?' But she, my angel, was content to let her dear head come just to my heart and rest there."

Here he rested and looked into the fire. I was silent too. Was he thinking of her "dear head" as he sat beside me in the autumn twilight? Well, it was very hard—very hard, indeed. And Nell, dear Nell, it must have been hard for her. And then I wondered if his ideal of woman had changed; for I was not an angel, I was not bewitching, nor shy, nor yet grand and gracious like his splendid sister; and I remembered, all at once, how I had got excited, especially in war times, and talked about honor, patriotism, history, and oh! I know not how many unwomanly subjects. My heart was heavier than ever before.

I think if I could have known Nell, if she had only dressed my hair as he liked it, and read to me, and talked to me, and explained to me, it might have been different.

"Yes," he continued, as if answering his own thoughts, "it was then that I first began to see Nell's deficiencies, or, rather, her exaggerations. There was never a greater contrast between two girls than between these two whom I loved so well. There was not two years' difference between their ages, and yet Nell was so wise, so prudent, so at ease, that she might have been the other's mother. We had no parents living, you know, and this dear girl, this angel of mine, in the sweetest words, with perfect tact, so contrived it that I saw plainly of myself that it was my duty to be both to Nell, whom I had hitherto thought above all criticism, 'a perfect woman,' but now saw was wayward, proud, willful, forward. I no longer gloried in the radiance of her fair face, the stately grace with which she met all who came to her, 'prince or peasant,' the readiness with which she entered into every subject, the calm assurance with which she, a young girl, joined the wisest and best in their conversation, as if it were not a woman's place to be drawn out, instead of leading others along. I talked to her kindly, but plainly, again and again. I told her to look at the dear girl I loved, who never for an instant forgot her natural place, and whose admirers were so many, and yet so kept back that no one could decide which she favored. 'But, dear Phil,' Nell would say, 'what good to dress me in her dresses? They are prettier than mine, I know, but I am four good inches taller and twice her weight; don't ask me, dear.' But she tried, for all, to be more as I would wish her, and was the kindest sister in the world, for she brought out my modest violet, and taught her in a quiet way all the data of society which certain circumstances had made easier to her than to the other. She gave her the right books to read, interested her in things that interested me, so that my dear angel grew more bewitching every day. She only needed the sunshine, and that Nell carried with her every where at all times. Now, Clara, can you stand hearing something bad of me—something that I have never told, that breaks my heart to remember? The bitter part is coming now."

"Yes, Phil, I can stand it, any thing that you can tell me."

"I do not know if I can tell you. You must not think that all this time this dear girl was studying to please me, or giving steady encouragement to my evident love for her. You would be doing her great injustice. It was impossible for one so modest and unselfish to realize that she was loved, or to know the agony of those who were kept in suspense by her. She would blush consciously under my eyes; she would sometimes look vexed at my too evident adoration, and punish me for it by banishing me from her dear presence for whole hours, and then would be so sweet and penitent that it was not in mortal man not to sin over again, even with the fear of her anger before him. She had many lovers; for modest worth like hers could not fail to attract the young heart as yet untouched by the art and deceit of this wicked world. She had many lovers, but I was not without hope. At last I told her that I loved her—told it strongly, plainly, that she should not turn me aside, that she should understand. Silently she let me read in her eyes that she loved me too, but no word of answer came from her lips. I needed none. The blessed assurance I wished for I had from that one long gaze, all that her sweet, girlish shyness could give. I kissed her, and she did not refuse my love, I knew she was my own forever. I forbore to wound her sensitive delicacy by speaking of our engagement to any one, not even excepting Nell for she had asked me not to, and what could I refuse her? Nor was I so unkind as to insist upon any public favor from her, whose feelings were too sacred for any gaze save her own—so much so that I hardly dared speak to her of them myself. So different from poor Nell, who, about this time had her heart touched for the first time, and whose pride and glory it was to pay all possible honor to the man she loved. But I will say for Nell it was more like the gracious humility of an empress to 'him whom the king delights to honor,' than any tenderness of word or manner."

"Time passed on, and there was question of our marriage. I, rough bear that I was, dared at last to press her for an answer, for a settled day. For a long time I could not force from her the cause of her refusal; finally, I took her by storm: I pleaded no longer; I became a bear in good earnest; I was cold and stern in manner and words, while my heart was fire and my thoughts all tenderness; and I so frightened the dear angel that her broken words gave me the sad knowledge that my sister, dear old Nell, with her gracious ways and her radiant face, stood between me and my happiness—dear old Nell, who had cried herself asleep in my arms the day our beloved mother gave her to me to love and care for when she should be left an orphan; dear Nell, in her black dress, and with her white face and staid ways, sitting patient and absorbed in her little chair, trying with moist hands to learn how to sew that she might hem me a sail for my boat, and with her eyes dancing, curls flying, lips trembling in her eagerness of delight when, the task accomplished, she rushed with it for me to nail to the mast; dear Nell, crying over her long division, and afraid to interrupt my reading to ask my help, and, when I had found out her trouble, leaning over my shoulder with eager eyes and glowing cheeks, understanding it all better than I did myself; dear Nell, dancing around me in her first party dress, sitting by the fire talking it all over to me though the cocks were crowing, Nell, Nell, my own, own Nell, to go away! Oh, Clara, I knew I had that to tell I could not tell!

"That I should have listened to such a thought! But the dear angel sweetly and tenderly but plainly showed me that wife and sister could not be always together; but it was not Nell but her I must give up. 'Your sister must be considered first,' said this ever unselfish creature. 'You loved her long before ever I came, and who am I that I should come in her way?' 'But you do not come in her way,' I urged. 'She loves you dearly; I know she longs for the day when she can call you sister; I can see that she is planning a thousand surprises for you; she talks hours at a time of the delight she takes in your companionship. If you only knew her—if you only knew how she loves me, how she would give half her life rather than let me be unhappy!' 'Yes, I know it; she knows it too! She thinks she loves you a thousand times more than I do. She is already jealous of me.' 'Nell jealous!' 'There it is: it is I who am always wrong. I have no chance against a woman like Nell: words are easy to her; she can always say what she will, while I never know how to make myself understood. Nell is a perfect woman, and I am only a weak girl full of faults that she can not understand. It would make her miserable to see you obliged to bear so much from me.'

"I bear from you! I remember breaking in. 'I know you have not a fault in the world! I wonder I ever dared look to one so good, so gentle, so sacrificing. You must not speak so; Nell will try to conquer her faults, and she will never fail to love you and try to make you happy.' 'But I do not dream of being happy,' she answered, with gentle seriousness; 'happiness is not for any one on earth; if I could only be a true wife to you! And so on, day after day. She could not make Nell unhappy by marrying me. She would not release me from my promise to keep all secret between us, and so the days passed on. I dared not seek my old comforter, Nell, for fear my secret would escape; I saw my angel surrounded by lovers whom she did not dream were lovers, and so was gently sweet to them in a way that almost broke my heart by its contrast to the mournful severity with which maidenly propriety required she should treat me, whom she loved too well to reject, and yet could not acknowledge as her lover.

"There came a new grief. Nell's favored one, whom I could see was trusted by her as she trusted me, thrown constantly, through Nell's perverse pride and blindness, in the way of my charmer, could not resist her gentle, tender influence any more than I could; and while I was silent and avoided Nell, not daring, as I said, to go near her, lest the very touch of her hand should make me false to my word, he was constrained in his manner and avoided her too. It went to my heart to see this great, magnificent woman, whose word had been law, whose atmosphere had been sunshine and loving praise, trying by every winning grace to touch our hearts, and atone by eager tenderness and loving humility for her unconscious fault, it almost broke my heart to see her growing paler, and her smiles fewer, and to meet the long, loving, questioning, pleading gaze of her dear eyes. I dared not speak to him, for that would have been treachery to her secret, which I had discovered. I dared not speak to my angel of this grief of Nell's for the same reason, and also because it would have broken my darling's heart to know that her unconscious charms had endangered another's happiness, and so we lived through a miserable time. But I did my angel injustice; when at last I intimated as delicately as I could that her smiles had been the cause of his defection she accused me of jealousy, and it was long before I won a smile from her whom I had apparently so cruelly insulted; and during the period of my penance I had a thousand new occasions to observe her gentle patience under injustice, her 'consciousness of innocence injured,' and my griefs seemed greater than I could bear, when there was a merciful break in the clouds. My sister's friend proved better than I thought, for he took himself out of the way of temptation and went to Europe. It may have troubled Nell that he went without any explanation, but if so she was comforted by his evident desire to have one before leaving, but which they were unable for many reasons to bring about, as my charmer was at that time on a long visit to Nell, and her duties of hostess seemed in some way to make any thing besides general conversation impossible; and so at last they who really loved, I believe, and were worthy of each other, through shyness and conventionalities were parted.

"Shortly after, my angel smiled again; and so anxious was I that there should be no more clouds, that I said nothing further on the subject of marriage, trusting that Nell's almost imploring eagerness to serve my beloved would prove to her that the dear sister was incapable of any jealousy or unkind feeling. But I was mistaken. 'The more I know your sister, the more I feel how unfitted I am to take her place. I know you would soon see my faults when you came to compare her order and good sense—if there was any thing I hated it was hearing dear Nell called sensible—her order and good sense with my carelessness.'

"But dear Nell had her own eyes and ears, and she learned it all. I do not know how, but one morning the gay, tender voice that went trilling morning songs through the halls, was silent or failed to awake me. No one sprang into my arms from behind the breakfast-room door, and there were no bright, playful smiles to greet me as I went to my place at the table. I remembered then that I had not seen her since the previous morning, for I had gone directly from the office to the home of my angel, where I had remained until such a late hour that for once my sister had failed to meet me on my return. I did not wait long before the servant came to me with a note and the order from Miss Nell to make my coffee. Shall I tell you what my note said? You will almost run away, Clara, when you hear it:

"DARLING, DARLING OLD PHIL.—What shall I say to you for hiding all your sorrow from me? I will say nothing; you will be sufficiently punished when you know that I have discovered that you have loved me so little, trusted so little to my love for you that you have let me make you unhappy. I know that I should not stay. I am so used to being obeyed that I know I should be unreasonable and exacting without being conscious of it. She would not believe I meant to go until she saw that I had, or I should have begged to stay to see my darling brother made perfectly happy. I did not tell you because I knew you would not let me go. Mrs. Hamilton takes me with her to-day to Charleston as governess for Kate and Minnie, but every one is to suppose I am her guest. You know how sweet she is, and how the children love me. I put it off till the last minute because I could not bear to leave my own Phil, to whom every joy and happiness. Let it be soon. It will make me so happy to hear that all is right between you at last.

"Ever my Phil's own devoted

"NELL."

"Well, Clara, I read my note without tearing my hair, but ate what breakfast I could like a Christian; then, because I had never been without a confidante, and because I could not rest in any spot, I went to my angel's house. I was angry at her, at Nell, most of all at myself, and that, perhaps, was why when I came upon her abruptly in the parlour at an hour when she did not look for calls, I was conscious that she had no collar on, that her hair was rather rough, and that she received me coldly and with evident vexation; but though conscious, I was not impressed by my reception. I put Nell's note in her hands at once, and asked its meaning. The dear girl was as shocked as I had been myself. I must go that instant and find my sister! But she had gone the day before. Then she reproached herself, until I forgot poor Nell in the grief of the dear creature beside me, and poured the tender words I should have been writing to Nell into the ears so near me. I went away seeing that dear Nell had made herself ridiculous, and had been very careless of my reputation in exposing me to the misrepresentations of those who knew us, and who would not spare me when they came to hear of it. I felt that I was injured, and I wrote to Nell, as she deserved, a few cold, polite lines. It was very hard to do, but she deserved it; it would be good for her. She had been accustomed to so much flattery that she was getting spoiled. If she thought I was to take the next train after her, she would find her mistake.

"Nevertheless, when I had given some little time to the recollection of my darling's tender smiles and her blushing half-promise that she would soon be all mine, and try to console me for my sister's absence, my heart did ache to think of her, the queen of all our parties, drudging through a day of a governess's life. And the house without her! We are always told that people who are bright abroad are morose at home; but this was not true in Nell's case. From the hour she awoke me singing outside my door, until that in which she gave me her good-night kiss, she was all radiance and sunshine, save only when any care oppressed me, when she was all sympathy or all energy as the case required. If I read I found my attention wandering, and knew that I was listening for her quick, light step across the room; if I looked over the illustrations in the new magazines, I knew that I was straining my eyes for the graceful figure floating around me; a hundred times I turned to call her, a hundred times it went like a knife to my heart to remember she was beyond my call. I could not go every day to see my angel—Mrs. Grundy might suspect; why go to parties, there was no Nell to introduce me to the prettiest girls, to make me proud and pleased to be the brother of the sweetest girl in the room? I went to one, it was dull and stupid beyond expression, and I was driven half-mad by questions about my sister, and wishes that she were present. What right had they to wish? Add to which my angel, afraid the world would suspect us, received the attention of a rich foreigner, a horrible man, whose impudence and assurance nearly drove me frantic.

"I did not go to another that winter. But nearly every mail brought me long, tender letters from Nell; accounts of the dear children; of all the kindness shown her; love for me in every line. I only half-read some of them; but I think now that, just holding her dear writing in my hand, saved me from making an absolute fool of myself. With it all her going away did no good; I was cross and unhappy, madly jealous of this same foreigner—I never could decide what land he originally came from—and was constantly quarreling with my darling, who bore with me with wonderful patience; but our marriage seemed farther off than ever, for I could not speak of it without endangering a scene; and oh! how I hungered and thirsted for my sister's presence, though I would not stoop to tell her so!

"There came one beautiful summer day that I wish I could describe to you, Clara; think of the most beautiful of your days, and perhaps you can form an idea. We had been all day sailing, and had come home over the waters aglow with sunset glories, our hearts—hers and mine—in harmony once more. We had had a long talk, in which I had confessed all my faults and been tenderly forgiven. I walked home with her—we were in the country now—through the twilight, and our good-by at the garden gate was long and loving. I was very happy as I went homeward; my mind was full of subdued gratitude, strong resolutions, tender memories.

"A visitor was awaiting me—my sister's long-absent friend. We smoked cigars on the porch, watching the stars come out, saying little to each other, although he had just come from Paris, and should have had much to tell; but I was thinking of her I had left waving her hand to me at the garden gate, and he of, I know not what. Finally he asked in what was intended to be a careless manner, 'If Miss Maxwell was at home.'

"No," I answered, 'she is in the South.' 'In the South! Where? Why, there is pestilence all through it!' he exclaimed, in an agitated tone, that for the moment startled me. 'She is with careful friends,' I answered, and no more was said, until, as he was leaving, he asked her address, adding, 'I left a letter for your sister with a friend of hers when I went away. Do you know, would you be likely to know, whether she received it?' 'I know that she did not,' I replied, 'because I chanced to hear her say a long time afterward, in answer to a question, that she had never seen your writing.' 'I was not wrong, then; it was all a piece of deliberate treachery.' 'On whose part?' I asked. He answered by naming my angel's name. I retorted angrily, and refused to hear his reasons. We parted coldly.

"I went to my room for a book to read, any thing to interest me, for he had disturbed the pleasant current of my thoughts, and dreaming was not so easy as when he found me. Nell's last letter lay on the table, where I had left it, half-read, in order to join the sailing party. I took it up, and a carte de visite dropped out, a flat, dark caricature of her bright face; it had a dead look that half-scared me, and brought back the words: 'The pestilence is sweeping through the South.' So the poor fellow loved Nell all the time! How could he have said that a letter was withheld from her? Could Nell have said a word that was untrue? I resolved to take the first possible hour for a visit to my angel, and to learn the truth. Poor Nell! Her letter was sad in spite of herself, or it struck me so more than the others had done. And the pestilence!

"I went to another room to compare the ugly photograph with her portrait: her bright, fair, radiant face, with her favorite purple ribbons—it had never looked half so much alive as now. The hum of the insects sounds in my ears just as it did that summer night when I stood before her portrait in the little room the good people of the house, who loved her as their own, always kept for her, and which this summer they had not the heart to let, believing every day that Miss Ellen would come back from the hot South, and want her own old room. I held the light before the portrait a long time, until I remarked the uncurtained windows, and feeling half ashamed of being seen before the picture, I went to draw the curtains.

"In doing so I displaced a little work-table, and knocked from the lower shelf a pair of shoes—Nell's shoes; I knew them well. She used to walk in them in the dewy mornings: half-worn, and browned a little, as if the dust had worked in; and Nell had such a dainty foot. I did not draw the curtains; I did not look again at the picture on the wall. What was it to the picture in my mind of my sister, her hands full of flowers, coming up the long gravel-walk with the children dancing around her, all echoing her merry 'Look out for your head, Mr. Phil!' as she threw roses at me, bright roses, less bright than the exercise had made her cheeks? And now the pestilence!

"I could not wait, but went out of the house at once, hurrying to catch the last train to New York, to go to-morrow and bring back the loved sister. I had to pass my dear charmer's house, and I could not but linger to glance at the windows of her room. I lingered to good purpose: 'But if you promise to marry Mr. Long, what will you do with poor Phil?' said a woman's voice, coming to me through the shrubbery near the gate, that gate where I had kissed her, and she me, good-night not three hours before! 'I'll give him to you, Bet!' answered a voice that three hours before had promised me love and joy for a lifetime. 'I always thought you had a liking for him. For my part, I almost hate him, especially when he expects me to console him for Nell's going away. The hateful thing she was! I never could endure her from the first day, with all her grand airs. I guess she's had some of them taken out of her by this time.'

"I did not stay to answer. I am not sure that I was very much shocked, for as I look back upon it now it seems to me I had always been expecting just such a revelation. I wrote her a release the next morning; but notwithstanding that I believe she is still seeking a bon parti, and is not so pretty as she used to be. I look upon that night as one of the grandest of my life."

"And Nell?" I asked.

"Somebody was ahead of me," Phil said, trying to say it gayly. "I only had a few months in which to show my remorse, for he carried her to a house of her own."

"Where you stay just four times as much as you do in your own," I replied.

"But it is not the same; she does not need me now. She needed me once, and I failed her: that is the bitterest memory I have."

"Bitterer than the other?"

"I forgot that long ago; the bitterness did not last long, though I loved her devotedly."

"But when Nettie asked you seemed to care?" I said, boldly.

"Nettie knows nothing of the sky-blue angel," he replied. "She knows there was once an estrangement between my sister and me, and she has tried many times to find out the cause."

"What a dreadful woman the other was!"

"I beg your pardon; if you were to see her to-night you would pronounce her charming. To me it has long been a wonder I ever thought her other than I do now. I am under obligations to her for enabling me, to love a second time in a way I never could without having made a fool of myself once."

"Then we sat a while in silence again, and my heart was not so heavy as it had been. I could even ask, gayly, 'Whether he expected to be very sensible the next time?'

"He did not answer gayly, but replied gravely: 'I never should have known, until I had played with love and burned my fingers, how serious a thing it is. I never should have known the luxury of perfect faith had I not been deceived. I never should have known, if I had not seen such unwomanliness, how grand a thing womanliness is. I find the real is greater, sweeter, dearer, nobler than any ideal."

"And do you know that, in the end, he told me that the real was—was me!"

GASTRONOMY.

TOMATO SOUP.—Take a quart can of tomatoes; if not boiled so as to be well dissolved chop them fine. Put into the kettle; boil ten minutes. Add one quarter of a spoonful of soda. Stir till the effervescence ceases. Add two large Boston crackers finely pounded, and one pint of milk. Let it boil ten minutes. Season to taste with butter, pepper, and salt. The result is a fine, relishing soup, made in twenty minutes, and without meat.

CHOCOLATE PATÉ.—Take half a cup of butter, two cups of sugar, four eggs, leaving out the whites of three, half a cup of sweet milk, half a tea-spoonful of soda dissolved in the milk, a tea-spoonful of cream of tartar, mixed with three small cups of flour. Bake in four jelly-cake tins. Take the whites of the eggs, beat to a stiff froth, add two cups of sifted sugar, and half a cup of Baker's chocolate, grated fine. If you desire to frost the outside of your paté take out half a cup of frosting before you add the chocolate, spread the chocolate frosting between each cake, then ice the whole with the frosting. This is a delicious dessert or supper dish.

ITALIAN CREAM.—Pour one pint of milk over one package of gelatine; let it stand an hour; then pour over it a quart of boiling cream, sweetened to the taste, and stir till dissolved. Then add the yolks of eight eggs, well beaten; flavor with vanilla or any other extract. When it begins to thicken, pour it into the mould.

TAPIoca PUDDING.—Take six table-spoonfuls of tapioca, soaked over night in a pint of water; in the morning scald a quart of milk; beat the whites and yolks of three eggs separately; stir the yolks into the tapioca when it comes to a boil; let it come to a scald and add the whites; then pour it into a mould and eat with cream and sugar.

CREAM BEER.—Boil seven pints of water, two pounds of loaf sugar, three ounces of tartaric acid five minutes in a new tin kettle; when almost cold beat the whites of three eggs to a light froth; add to them half a tea-cup of flour well beaten, and stir the whole into the sirup with an ounce of the essence of wintergreen or sarsaparilla. Bottle the mixture. In two-thirds of a glass of water put half a tea-spoonful of soda and two table-spoonfuls of the sirup well shaken up in the bottle.

BLUE-EYES AND LONG-TAIL.

"OH dear me! little does any one know who has never tried it, what it is to be the mother of a large family!" cried a fat old mouse to herself, dropping down in a corner quite exhausted. "Such a life as I have! There's no end to the trouble of it. Oh dear, dear me!" And then she began to rock herself to and fro, and to fan her face with her handkerchief, for it was very hot weather, and she was quite knocked up with her efforts to find a suitable house for one of her daughters who was on the point of making a most desirable match. This daughter was called Blue-eyes, and she was one of the prettiest little mice, you ever saw, with a slim, graceful figure, and a most delicate slate-colored complexion; and the mouse to whom she was to be married—who was a very handsome and charming young mouse indeed—was called Long-tail.

But a giddy pair of pretty young creatures you never saw, with no notion how to take care of themselves, or how to set up housekeeping in a proper way. But by the help of the mother mouse they did succeed in getting a most excellent establishment to begin with. It was in a new house where no mouse had ever lived before, and where no cat was allowed to cross the threshold—a fact which filled Blue-eyes and Long-tail with delight.

So immediately after their marriage they found a charming home in a large lumber-garret, in a dark corner of which they discovered a curious little sewed-up sack of bran, which was excellent eating. The mother had bidden them good-by with a sigh of great relief, and the urgent injunction never to go out of the garret, lest they come to some bad end.

Long-tail and Blue-eyes were as happy a pair of light-hearted mice as ever lived for the first week after they came to their new house. What games they had in the big garret! How they chased one another across the floor, and played at hide-and-seek among the lumber, and scuttled about behind the wainscot, and made wonderful discoveries of every kind!

They both pronounced the garret, indeed, to be a most delightful place; but by the time they had scampered about it for seven or eight days they began to get just the least bit tired of it, and to think that it would be a nice piece of fun to find out something new. Why, now, for instance, should they not make a little expedition down stairs some morning?

"Really," Blue-eyes said, "we can't be bound to attend to all mamma's advice, or a pretty, dull life we should lead. What harm could there possibly be in our putting our heads for a few minutes into one or two of the other rooms?"

"As if nobody had ever found out any thing since she was young!" returned Long-tail.

"Perfectly ridiculous!" said Blue-eyes. "The more we see of the world the better. It will enlarge our ideas so—won't it, Long-tail?"

"Not a doubt of it," replied Long-tail.

"It will make us such superior mice."

"I know one of us who is a superior mouse already," said Long-tail, gallantly, and looked at Blue-eyes with a most fascinating air.

Upon which, of course, Blue-eyes blushed becomingly, and said in the prettiest way in the world that she was sure he flattered her.

"My advice," continued Long-tail, "is now that not another moment should be lost. Let us make for the floor below this at once!"

And he was so eager to set about it that he began to lead the way instantly to the door, and Blue-eyes followed.

They soon got down to the bottom of the first flight of stairs, and found themselves in a passage from which a number of doors led. Provokingly enough, however, every one of these was closed. But while they waited, not knowing what to do, all at once the door that was nearest to them opened in such a sudden way that Blue-eyes nearly screamed, and a nice little boy ran along the passage, leaving the door half-open behind him. The door led into a bright, pleasant room, and this was the very thing that Long-tail and Blue-eyes wanted.

"How lucky we are! Follow close behind me. Really, this is a most delightful house!" exclaimed Long-tail; and then, one after the other, and holding their breath, they softly slipped through the open door into the room, and found themselves suddenly in the presence of three little girls, who were all sitting round a table in the middle of the room, busily doing something there with books and slates.

"Here's a dark corner," whispered Long-tail. "Slip in here beside me; and if you think any body sees you, you know, shut your eyes—Ah, there they are closing the door! Well, we're in for it now, any way!"

"Ye—es, we're in for it now," echoed Blue-eyes, more than half in a fright.

"I wonder what they would think if they knew we were here," said Long-tail, a little nervously.

"Oh dear me, Long-tail, I hope they won't find out!" cried Blue-eyes, all in a tremble.

"My love, do you feel cold?" asked Long-tail, looking at her anxiously.

"Cold! just feel my back. I wish I was cold!" cried poor little Blue-eyes piteously; and indeed when Long-tail touched her back, as she wished, he found it as hot as fire. She was evidently quite in a fever.

Most fortunately, however, just as Long-tail was beginning to feel his own back grow hot at the thought of what might possibly be about to befall them, he was so lucky as to make a most agreeable discovery.

"My nose may deceive me, Blue-eyes," he said, suddenly, "but surely I smell something eatable in the air."

"Something eatable, do you, dear Long-tail?" cried Blue-eyes. "Where? where? Let me find it out! Ah, you are right! Dear me, this is delicious!" exclaimed Blue-eyes, making a swift little run forward, and beginning to pick up some grains of bird-seed from the floor with all her might.

The seed was lying on the carpet in a nice shady place, and for two or three minutes both Blue-eyes and Long-tail were so busy snapping it up that they were not able to utter another word. By the time they had eaten it all they had wonderfully recovered their spirits, and Blue-eyes's courage was quite restored.

"There is certainly nothing so refreshing as a meal," she said, with a little sigh of content, as they ran back again to their first place.

Then they had a long chat with each other about the matter, and concluded that the breakfast they had enjoyed must have been placed there especially for them.

"They must have expected us," said Long-tail, thoughtfully.

"That is quite clear," replied Blue-eyes.

"We ought to endeavor to show our sense of such attention," said Long-tail.

"Well, I should be delighted, if I knew how," answered Blue-eyes.

"I think we should show ourselves," said Long-tail, with solemnity.

"Oh dear me! do you, Long-tail?" inquired Blue-eyes, all in a flutter.

"I should advise it—strongly," said Long-tail, with emphasis.

"Oh, Long-tail, my heart's going pit-a-pat!" she said. "You don't think—do you—that you would like to—to show yourself—without me?"

"It would seem singular, a little, I think," answered Long-tail, rather taken aback.

"But I would come presently, you know—if you won't mind just going first," cried Blue-eyes, eagerly.

"Oh, well, I don't mind going first, if you would like it," said Long-tail, with an appearance of perfect indifference, though, in fact, as he spoke his own heart was beating curiously fast. "First or last, it's all one to me." And with that he stepped forward quite heroically, and gave a run that brought him out into the very middle of the floor. As soon as he had got there, of course, he wondered immensely what would happen next, and you may be sure that he felt a good deal amazed (as Blue-eyes also did, eagerly peeping out at him from the wall) that nothing happened of any kind at all. The three little girls were all so busy with their lessons that not one of them raised her head, or seemed to have the least idea that he was in the room. He ran here and there, but not the slightest notice did any body take of him, and so at last he scudded back to where Blue-eyes was waiting for him, a little out of breath, to be sure, and rather surprised, but still, on the whole, in delightful spirits.

"There, my dear, you see it's the simplest thing in the world!" he exclaimed; "nothing to make even a new-born mouse afraid. Do you feel able to accompany me in a little run now, my love?"

Well, Blue-eyes did not quite know, but she was ready to try. She ran a very little way forward, and then a little bit back, and then took another little run forward, and another little run back, and so by degrees, after a good deal of time, she made her way nearly into the centre of the floor. Of course, at every little run she took she watched the three children sitting round the table with all her eyes; but they all sat quite still, and did not seem to have so much as the least idea in the world that any mouse whatever was in the place.

"It's singular!" said Long-tail, when, after scudding about for two or three minutes, they retired once more to their corner to take breath.

"Very singular; and not quite civil," answered Blue-eyes, a little sharply; for though she would have been terrified if the children had looked round and seen her, she was such a vain little mouse that she felt quite hurt at having been overlooked.

"What do you say to another run?" said Long-tail.

And then off they set.

They ran quite boldly this time straight into the middle of the room, and then backward and forward, here and there, quite merrily, and at their ease. There was nothing in the world to be afraid of, they said to one another; and really it was very fine fun. In more than one place they came upon some delicious crumbs, sprinkled upon the carpet, no doubt expressly for them, and these they ate up with the greatest satisfaction, for they had both excellent appetites. In fact, they were enjoying themselves extremely, when, all in a moment, there came the most dreadful scream that they had ever heard in their lives; and before they could imagine what in the world had happened, one of the little girls had sprung up on a chair, and another had leaped up on the table, and the third had darted to the sofa, and every body was crying out together, and—what was more extraordinary and alarming than all the rest—they were all three staring and pointing at Blue-eyes and Long-tail, as if they had never seen a mouse before in their lives.

You may fancy, if you can, how Long-tail and Blue-eyes felt! For a moment or two they were so paralyzed with terror that they couldn't move a step, and Blue-eyes nearly fainted on the spot; and then how they got again to their corner they never knew, for they just scudded back to it along the floor, pell-mell, without ever taking breath.

BLUE-EYES AND LONG-TAIL IN THE SCHOOL-ROOM.

Yet, frightened as they were, they did not seem to be a bit more frightened than the three silly children, who, as long as Blue-eyes and Long-tail remained in sight, stood up on their different perches and screamed; and as soon as the little mice had run back to their corner they all bolted out of the room as if they had been shot.

It was altogether a most amazing proceeding; and Blue-eyes and Long-tail, as soon as they had got over their first alarm, were completely bewildered by it.

"Then what could possibly have made them run away?" cried Blue-eyes.

"I can't imagine—unless they were afraid," answered Long-tail. "Foolish creatures! we wouldn't harm them."

"Oh dear no, I'm sure we never should think of such a thing," exclaimed Blue-eyes.

"But my nerves certainly feel a little shaken," continued Blue-eyes, "and I should enjoy an hour or two's repose."

"By all means! Will you sleep here?" inquired Long-tail. "We may consider this room now, I have no doubt, as entirely at our disposal."

"Ah, very likely; but I think I should prefer on the whole to retire up stairs," replied Blue-eyes, with considerable vivacity.

"We will return the first thing in the morning," said Long-tail.

"Well, so that we get back to the garret now you may do any thing you like," answered Blue-eyes; and with that she whisked out of the room and made a leap up stairs, and hardly drew breath again till she found herself safe at the attic door.

The excitement and agitation of the morning had shaken her a good deal; but an excellent sleep, into which she at once fell, refreshed her extremely, and when she awoke she had quite lost her nervousness, and was as lively as ever.

They both agreed that they would pay a second visit to the school-room, and no sooner had it begun to get light than they skipped with light hearts down the stairs, and finding the school-room door standing wide open, they ran into the room as merry as crickets.

But to their disappointment they found it quite empty; not one of the little girls or any body else was there.

"Why, where in the world can they be!" cried Blue-eyes, stopping suddenly short, and staring all around.

"They must have been too frightened to return," exclaimed Long-tail, contemptuously.

"How absurd!" cried Blue-eyes.

"Most unquestionably, my love; but I only hope they haven't forgotten our breakfast," answered Long-tail, sharply. And then, not quite in the very best temper, they began to look about them, and to sniff with their eager little noses here and there.

"There seems to me a singularly agreeable odor somewhere," exclaimed Blue-eyes suddenly, in a tone of great excitement.

"Do you see any thing, Long-tail?"

"I see a—a sort of little box," said Long-tail, doubtfully.

"Oh, it can't possibly come from any little box," exclaimed Blue-eyes, contemptuously, and went busily poking her nose somewhere else. But Long-tail ran close up to the little box, and quietly peeped in.

It was a curious box, with wire-work all round it, and a little hole at the top; and when Long-tail looked inside it, what do you think he saw? He saw the most delicious piece of toasted cheese that ever any mouse set eyes on! a large piece of toasted cheese, which it was quite clear had been put there for him and Blue-eyes to eat, for the ing out, and pointing and staring at Long-tail, who, brave little mouse though he was, had pretty quickly, you may be sure, left off his pleasant meal, and was staring at them in return, with his heart going pit-a-pat.

"I'll make a bolt for it!" he thought to himself at last. "I'm a capital runner, and even if they should try to catch me I think I shall be too quick for them."

And Long-tail made a gallant spring.

But, alas! for poor Long-tail. He was fast shut in prison; he couldn't get out. He sat down at last, quite still, in the bottom of the trap, and looked in the children's faces. One of them, a little thing, had begun to cry and had run away.

It was all over with him; he began to feel that. All over with him! And one little hour ago how happy they had both been! "Oh, Blue-eyes!" he cried hopelessly to himself; "Oh, little Blue-eyes!"

And all this time Blue-eyes sat crouching behind the wainscot, sobbing and wringing her hands.

"I'll go after them wherever they go," she was whispering. "I'll follow them wherever they take Long-tail. Oh, they are going to take him off now!"

And so indeed they were. They took him in his trap, down flight after flight of stairs, and out into the court-yard; and all the way they went little Blue-eyes followed after them, slipping from stair to stair, and tumbling head-over-heels sometimes, because her legs were trembling so that they wouldn't carry her, and when they set the trap down in the yard, she hid herself so near to it, behind a stone, that she could quite well see poor Long-tail. They would take him out of his cage, she thought, and put him to death; and she—oh, would she never be able to speak so much as another word to him again, but have to sit still behind her stone, and see him die? But for some reason they set Long-tail down upon the flags, and all went out of the yard, and left him to himself.

And then, you may be sure (though her heart was fairly in her mouth with terror), little Blue-eyes came rushing out of her hiding-place, and ran up to the side of the trap.

"Oh, Long-tail!" cried little Blue-eyes, gasping. And Long-tail, who had never expected to see her again in this world, gave such a wild "Cheep!" as she appeared, that you might have heard him a dozen yards off.

"Oh, Blue-eyes! can you do any thing for me? Have you come to help me? Oh, Blue-eyes!" cried poor Long-tail in an agony, "can't you get me out?"

And at that Blue-eyes burst out crying with all her might, and Long-tail looked at her in his despair till his own tears came so fast that he could hardly see her face; and then they stretched out their arms to one another through the bars, and put their little wet cheeks side by side; and they knew that they could do nothing for one another, but that Blue-eyes must be left alone, and that Long-tail must die.

"We thought that we were wiser than other mice," said Long-tail sorrowfully, when they had cried till they could almost cry no more.

"But we were so young and so happy together," answered poor little Blue-eyes.

"Oh, Blue-eyes!" cried Long-tail.

"Oh, Long-tail!" cried Blue-eyes.

And then they looked in one another's face till their hearts were like to break.

"Let us say good-by to one another," said Long-tail, in a broken voice. And poor little Blue-eyes tried to repeat "good-by!" and then they kissed one another through the bars. And after that they hardly spoke any more, but just sat cowering up close together, hand in hand, till at last there came the noise of an opening door; and then they started apart, and Long-tail cried out, "Oh fly, Blue-eyes! fly!" and then she rushed behind her stone once more.

The door had opened, and several people had come out into the yard. The little child who had cried and run away while Long-tail was struggling in the trap was one of them, and besides him there were two more of the children, and a big tall man; and the little child ran along by the man's side, talking very eagerly, till they came close to the trap, when the man stopped and took it up in his hand.

And now Long-tail believed that his last moment had come, and he gave a great gasp and shut his eyes tight.

"I won't open them any more: I'll sit quite still until I die," he said to himself. "Oh, little Blue-eyes, little Blue-eyes, good-by!"

But what do you think little Blue-eyes saw as she peeped out from behind her stone?

Not Long-tail being put to death, but—oh, could she believe her eyes!—the trap-door open, and the little child clapping his hands, and all of them standing back to let Long-tail go free. To let him go free, and yet he never moved a step! "Long-tail! Long-tail!" she cried out. But still he sat quite still, until she forgot every thing else in the world—all danger and all fear—and ran forward in the face of all the people to the trap-door.

That roused him at last. He opened his tight-closed lids, and saw—not death, but little Blue-eyes!

And Blue-eyes and Long-tail hid in the yard for three whole days, until they were nearly starved. But something must be done; and one evening, when the door into the house was open, and every thing was quiet and dark, with beating hearts they stole out from their hiding-place, and never rested till, half-dead with fright and joy, they found themselves once again at their own garret-door.

They never left the garret again; but grew old in it together, surrounded by their children to the tenth generation, and regarded by all their family with admiration and respect.

CORD AND CREESE; OR, THE BRANDON MYSTERY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE DODGE CLUB."

CHAPTER XIX.

THE DEAD ALIVE.

It was early in the month of August when Brandon visited the quarantine station at Gosse Island, Quebec. A low, wooden building stood near the landing, with a sign over the door containing only the word "OFFICE." To this building Brandon directed his steps. On entering he saw only one clerk there.

"Are you the superintendent?" he asked, bowing courteously.

"No," said the clerk. "He is in Quebec just now."

"Perhaps you can give me the information that I want."

"What is it?"

"I have been sent to inquire after some passengers that came out here last year."

"Oh yes, I can tell all that can be told," said the clerk, readily. "We have the registration books here, and you are at liberty to look up any names you wish. Step this way, please." And he led the way to an inner office.

"What year did they come out in?" asked the clerk.

"Last year."

"Last year—an awful year to look up. 1846—yes, here is the book for that year—a year which you are aware was an unparalleled one."

"I have heard so."

"Do you know the name of the ship?"

"The Tecumseh."

"The Tecumseh!" exclaimed the clerk, with a startled look. "That is an awful name in our records. I am sorry you have not another name to examine, for the Tecumseh was the worst of all."

Brandon bowed.

"The Tecumseh," continued the clerk, turning over the leaves of the book as it lay on the desk. "The Tecumseh, from Liverpool, sailed June 2, arrived August 16. Here you see the names of those who died at sea, copied from the ship's books, and those who died on shore. It is a frightful mortality. Would you like to look over the list?"

Brandon bowed and advanced to the desk.

"The deaths on board ship show whether they were seamen or passengers, and the passengers are marked as cabin and steerage. But after landing it was impossible to keep an account of classes."

Brandon carefully ran his eye down the long list, and read each name. Those for which he looked did not appear. At last he came to the list of those who had died on shore. After reading a few names his eye was arrested by one—

"Brandon, Elizabeth."

It was his mother. He read on. He soon came to another—

"Brandon, Edith." It was his sister.

"Do you find any of the names?" asked the clerk, seeing Brandon turn his head.

"Yes," said Brandon; "this is one," and he pointed to the last name. "But I see a mark opposite that name. What is it? 'B' and 'A.' What is the meaning?"

"Is that party a relative of yours?"

"No," said Brandon.

"You don't mind hearing something horrible, then?"

"No."

The clerk drew a long breath.

"Well, Sir, those letters were written by the late superintendent. The poor man is now a lunatic. He was here last year."

"You see this is how it was: The ship-fever broke out. The number of sick was awful, and there were no preparations for them here. The disease in some respects was worse than cholera, and there was nothing but confusion. Very many died from lack of nursing. But the worst feature of the whole thing was the hurried burials."

"I was not here last year, and all who were here then have left. But I've heard enough to make me sick with horror. You perhaps are aware that in this ship-fever there sometimes occurs a total loss of sense, which is apt to be mistaken for death?"

The clerk paused. Brandon regarded him steadily for a moment. Then he turned, and looked earnestly at the book.

"The burials were very hastily made."

"Well?"

"And it is now believed that some were buried in a state of trance."

"Buried alive?"

"Buried alive!"

There was a long silence. Brandon's eyes were fixed on the book. At last he pointed to the name of Edith Brandon.

"Then, I suppose," he said, in a steady voice, which, however, was in a changed key, "these letters 'B' and 'A' are intended to mean something of that description?"

"Something of that sort," replied the clerk.

Brandon drew a long breath.

"But there is no certainty about it in this particular case. I will tell you how these marks happened to be made. The clerk that was here last told me."

"One morning, according to him, the superintendent came in, looking very much excited and altered. He went to this book, where the entries of burials had been made on the preceding evening. This name was third from the last. Twelve had been buried. He penciled these letters there and left. People did not notice him; every body was sick or busy. At last in the evening of the next day, when they were to bury a new lot, they found the superintendent digging at the grave the third from the last. They tried to stop him, but he shouted and moaned alternately 'Buried alive!' 'Buried alive!' In fact they saw that he was crazy, and had to confine him at once."

"Did they examine the grave?"

"Yes. The woman told my predecessor that she and her husband—who did the burying—had examined it, and found the body not only dead, but corrupt. So there's no doubt of it. That party must have been dead at any rate."

"Who was the woman?"

"An old woman that laid them out. She and her husband buried them."

"Where is she now?"

"I don't know."

"Does she stay here yet?"

"No. She left last year."

"What became of the superintendent?"

"He was taken home, but grew no better. At last he had to be sent to an asylum. Some examination was made by the authorities, but nothing ever came of it. The papers made no mention of the affair, and it was hushed up."

Brandon read on. At last he came to another name. It was simply this: "Brandon." There was a slight movement on the clerk's part as Brandon came to this name. "There is no Christian name here," said Brandon. "I suppose they did not know it."

"A STRANGE FEELING PASSED OVER BRANDON. HE STEPPED FORWARD."

"Well," said the clerk, "there's something peculiar about that. The former clerk never mentioned it to any body but me. That man didn't die at all."

"What do you mean?" said Brandon, who could scarcely speak for the tremendous struggle between hope and despair that was going on within him.

"It's a false entry."

"How?"

"The superintendent wrote that. See, the handwriting is different from the others. One is that of the clerk who made all these entries; the other is the superintendent's."

Brandon looked and saw that this was the case.

"What was the cause of that?"

"The clerk told me that after making these next fifteen entries of buried parties—buried the evening after these last twelve—he went away to see about something. When he came back the next morning this name was written in the superintendent's hand. He did not know what to think of it, so he concluded to ask the superintendent; but in the course of the day he heard that he was mad and in confinement, as I have told you."

"Then you mean that this is not an entry of a death at all?"

"Yes. The fact is, the superintendent for some reason got it into his head that this Brandon—and he pointed to Edith's name—had been buried alive. He brooded over the name, and among other things wrote it down here at the end of the list for the day. That's the way in which my predecessor accounted for it."

"It is a very natural one," said Brandon.

"Quite so. The clerk let it stand. You see, if he had erased it, he might have been overhauled, and there would have been a committee. He was afraid of that: so he thought it better to say nothing about it. He wouldn't have told me, only he said that a party came here once for a list of all the dead of the Tecumseh, and he copied all out, including this doubtful one. He thought that he had done wrong, and therefore told me, so that if any particular inquiries were ever made I might know what to say."

"Are there many mistakes in these records?"

"I dare say there are a good many in the list for 1846. There was so much confusion that names got changed, and people died whose names could only be conjectured by knowing who had recovered. As some of those that recovered or had not been sick slipped away secretly, of course there was inaccuracy."

Brandon had nothing more to ask. He thanked the clerk and departed.

There was a faint hope, then, that Frank might yet be alive. On his way up to Quebec he decided what to do. As soon as he arrived he inserted an advertisement in the chief papers to the following effect:

NOTICE!

INFORMATION of any one of the name of "BRANDON" who came out in the ship Tecumseh in 1846 from Liverpool to Quebec, is earnestly desired by friends of the family. A liberal reward will be given to any one who can give the above information. Apply to

HENRY PETERS,
22 Place d'Armes.

Brandon waited in Quebec six weeks without any result. He then went to Montreal and in-

A strange feeling passed over Brandon. He stepped forward.

"Frank!" he cried, in a broken voice.

"Merciful Heavens!" cried the other. "Have you too come up from the dead? Louis!"

In this meeting between the two brothers, after so many eventful years of separation, each had much to tell. Each had a story so marvelous that the other might have doubted it, had not the marvels of his own experience been equally great. Frank's story, however, is the only one that the reader will care to hear, and that must be reserved for another chapter.

CHAPTER XX.

FRANK'S STORY.

"AFTER you left," said Frank, "all went to confusion. Potts lashed it with a higher hand than ever, and my father was more than ever infatuated, and seemed to feel that it was necessary to justify his harshness toward you by publicly exhibiting a greater confidence in Potts. Like a thoroughly vulgar and base nature, this man could not be content with having the power, but loved to exhibit that power to us. Life to me for years became one long death; a hundred times I would have turned upon the scoundrel and taken vengeance for our wrongs, but the tears of my mother forced me to use self-control. You had been driven off; I alone was left, and she implored me by my love for her to stand by her. I wished her to take her own little property and go with me and Edith where we might all live in seclusion together; but this she would not do for fear of staining the proud Brandon name."

"Potts grew worse and worse every year. There was a loathsome son of his whom he used to bring with him, and my father was infatuated enough to treat the younger devil with the same civility which he showed to the elder one. Poor father! he really believed, as he afterward told me, that these men were putting millions of money into his hands, and that he would be the Beckford of his generation."

"After a while another scoundrel, called Clark, appeared, who was simply the counterpart of Potts. Of this man something very singular was soon made known to me."

"One day I was strolling through the grounds when suddenly, as I passed through a grove which stood by a fish-pond, I heard voices and saw the two men I hated most of all on earth standing near me. They were both naked. They had the audacity to go bathing in the fish-pond. Clark had his back turned toward me, and I saw on it, below the neck, three marks, fiery red, as though they had been made by a brand. They were these," and taking a pencil, Frank made the following marks:

Louis looked at this with intense excitement.

"You have been in New South Wales," said Frank, "and perhaps know whether it is true or not that these are brands on convicts?"

"It is true, and on convicts of the very worst kind."

"Do you know what they mean?"

"Yes."

"What?"

"Only the worst are branded with a single mark, so you may imagine what a triple mark indicates. But I will tell you the meaning of each. The first (^) is the king's mark put on those who are totally irreclaimable and insubordinate. The second (R) means runaway, and is put on those who have attempted to escape. The third (+) indicates a murderous attack on the guards. When they are not hung, they are branded with this mark; and those who are branded in this way are condemned to hard work, in chains, for life."

"That's about what I supposed," said Frank, quietly, "only of course you are more particular. After seeing this I told my father. He refused to believe me. I determined to bring matters to a crisis, and charged Potts, in my father's presence, with associating with a branded felon. Potts at once turned upon me and appealed to my father's sense of justice. He accused me of being so far carried away by prejudice as not to hesitate to invent a foul slander against an honest man. He said that Clark would be willing to be put to any test; he could not, however, ask him to expose himself—it was too outrageous, but would simply assert that my charge was false."

"My father as usual believed every word and gave me a stern reprimand. Louis, in the presence of my mother and sister I cursed my father on that day. Poor man! the blow soon fell. It was in 1845 that the crash came. I have not the heart to go into details now. I will tell you from time to time hereafter. It is enough to say that every penny was lost. We had to leave the Hall and took a little cottage in the village."

"All our friends and acquaintances stood aloof. My father's oldest friends never came near him. Old Langhetti was dead. His son knew nothing about this. I will tell you more of him presently."

"Colonel Lionel Despard was dead. His son."

Courtenay, was ignorant of all this, and was away in the North of England. There was Thornton, and I can't account for his inaction. He married Langhetti's daughter too. That is a mystery."

"They are all false, Frank."

Frank looked up with something like a smile. "No, not all; wait till you hear me through." Frank drew a long breath. "We got sick there, and Potts had us taken to the alms-house. There we all prayed for death, but only my father's prayer was heard. He died of a broken heart. The rest of us lived on."

"Scarcely had my father been buried when Potts came to take us away. He insisted that we should leave the country, and offered to pay our way to America. We were all indifferent; we were paralyzed by grief. The alms-house was not a place that we could cling to, so we let ourselves drift, and allowed Potts to send us wherever he wished. We did not even hope for any thing better. We only hoped that somewhere or other we might all die. What else could we do? What else could I do? There was no friend to whom I could look; and if I ever thought of any thing, it was that America might possibly afford us a chance to get a living till death came."

"So we allowed ourselves to be sent wherever Potts chose, since it could not possibly make things worse than they were. He availed himself of our stolid indifference, put us as passengers in the steerage on board of a crowded emigrant ship, the Tecumseh, and gave us for our provisions some mouldy bread."

"We simply lived and suffered, and were all waiting for death, till one day an angel appeared who gave us a short respite, and saved us for a while from misery. This angel, Louis, was Paolo, the son of Langhetti."

"You look amazed. It was certainly an amazing thing that he should be on board the same ship with us. He was in the cabin. He noticed our misery without knowing who we were. He came to give us his pity, and help us. When at last he found out our names he fell on our necks, kissed us, and wept aloud."

"He gave up his room in the cabin to my mother and sister, and slept and lived with me. Most of all he cheered us by the lofty, spiritual words with which he bade us look with contempt upon the troubles of life, and aspire after immortal happiness. Yes, Louis; Langhetti gave us peace."

"There were six hundred passengers. The plague broke out among us. The deaths every day increased, and all were filled with despair. At last the sailors themselves began to die."

"I believe there was only one in all that ship who preserved calm reason and stood without fear during those awful weeks. That one was Langhetti. He found the officers of the ship panic-stricken, so he took charge of the steerage, organized nurses, watched over every thing, encouraged every body, and labored night and day. In the midst of all I fell sick, and he nursed me back to life. Most of all, that man inspired fortitude by the hope that beamed in his eyes, and by the radiance of his smile. 'Never mind, Brandon,' said he as I lay, I thought doomed. 'Death is nothing. Life goes on. You will leave this pest-ship for a realm of light. Keep up your heart, my brother immortal, and praise God with your latest breath.'

"I recovered, and then stood by his side as best I might. I found that he had never told my mother of my sickness. At last my mother and sister in the cabin fell sick. I heard of it some days after, and was prostrated again. I grew better after a time; but just as we reached quarantine, Langhetti, who had kept himself up thus far, gave out completely, and fell before the plague."

"Did he die?" asked Louis, in a faltering voice.

"Not on ship-board. He was carried ashore senseless. My mother and sister were very low, and were also carried on shore. I, though weak, was able to nurse them all. My mother died first."

There was a long pause. At last Frank resumed:

"My sister gradually recovered; and then, through grief and fatigue, I fell sick for the third time. I felt it coming on. My sister nursed me; for a time I thought I was going to die. 'Oh, Edith,' I said, 'when I die, devote your life while it lasts to Langhetti, whom God sent to us in our despair. Save his life even if you give up your own.'

"After that I became delirious, and remained so for a long time. Weeks passed; and when at last I revived the plague was stayed, and but few sick were on the island. My case was a lingering one, for this was the third attack of the fever. Why I didn't die I can't understand. There was no attendance. All was confusion, horror, and death."

"When I revived the first question was after Langhetti and Edith. No one knew any thing about them. In the confusion we had been separated, and Edith had died alone."

"Who told you that she died?" asked Louis, with a troubled look.

Frank looked at him with a face of horror.

"Can you bear what I am going to say?"

"Yes."

"When I was able to move about I went to see if any one could tell me about Edith and Langhetti. I heard an awful story; that the superintendent had gone mad and had been found trying to dig open a grave, saying that some one was buried alive. Who do you think? Oh, my brother!"

"Speak!"

"Edith Brandon was the name he named."

"Be calm, Frank; I made inquiries myself at the island registry-office. The clerk told me this story, but said that the woman who had charge of the dead asserted that the grave was opened, and it was ascertained that absolute death had taken place."

"Alas!" said Frank, in a voice of despair, "I saw that woman—the keeper of the dead-house—the grave-digger's wife. She told me this story, but it was with a troubled eye. I swore vengeance on her unless she told me the truth. She was alarmed, and said she would reveal all she knew if I swore to keep it to myself. I swore it. Can you bear to hear it, Louis?"

"Speak!"

"She said only this: 'When the grave was opened it was found that Edith Brandon had not been dead when she was buried.'

Louis groaned, and, falling forward, buried his head in both his hands.

It was a long time before either of them spoke. At last Louis, without lifting his head, said:

"Go on."

"When I left the island I went to Quebec, but could not stay there. It was too near the place of horror. I went up the river, working my way as a laborer, to Montreal. I then sought for work, and obtained employment as porter in a warehouse. What mattered it? What was rank or station to me? I only wanted to keep myself from starvation and get a bed to sleep on at night."

"I had no hope or thought of any thing. The horrors through which I had passed were enough to fill my mind. Yet above them all one horror was predominant, and never through the days and nights that have since elapsed has my soul ceased to quiver at the echo of two terrible words which have never ceased to ring through my brain—'Buried alive!'

"I lived on in Montreal, under an assumed name, as a common porter, and might have been living there yet; but one day as I came in I heard the name of 'Brandon.' Two of the clerks who were discussing the news in the morning paper happened to speak of an advertisement which had long been in the papers in all parts of Canada. It was for information about the Brandon family."

"I read the notice. It seemed to me at first that Potts was still trying to get control of us, but a moment's reflection showed that to be improbable. Then the mention of 'the friends of the family' made me think of Langhetti. I concluded that he had escaped death and was trying to find me out."

"I went to Toronto, and found that you had gone to New York. I had saved much of my wages, and was able to come here. I expected Langhetti, but found you."

"Why did you not think that it might be me?"

"Because I heard a threat of Potts about you, and took it for granted that he would succeed in carrying it out."

"What was the threat?"

"He found out somehow that my father had written a letter to you. I suppose they told him so at the village post-office. One day when he was in the room he said, with a laugh, alluding to the letter, 'I'll uncork that young Brandy-flask before long.'"

"Well—the notice of my death appeared in the English papers."

Frank looked earnestly at him.

"And I accept it, and go under an assumed name."

"So do I. It is better."

"You thought Langhetti alive. Do you think he is?"

"I do not think so now."

"Why not?"

"The efforts which he made were enough to kill any man without the plague. He must have died."

After hearing Frank's story Louis gave a full account of his own adventures, omitting, however, all mention of Beatrice. That was something for his own heart, and not for another's ear.

"Have you the letter and MS.?"

"Yes."

"Let me read them."

Louis took the treasures and handed them to Frank. He read them in silence.

"Is Cato with you yet?"

"Yes."

"It is well."

"And now, Frank," said Louis, "you have something at last to live for."

"What is that?"

"Vengeance!" cried Louis, with burning eyes.

"Vengeance!" repeated Frank, without emotion—"Vengeance! What is that to me? Do you hope to give peace to your own heart by inflicting suffering on our enemies? What can they possibly suffer that can atone for what they have inflicted? All that they can feel is as nothing compared with what we have felt. Vengeance!" he repeated, musingly; "and what sort of vengeance? Would you kill them? What would that effect? Would he be more miserable than he is? Or would you feel any greater happiness? Or do you mean something more far-reaching than death?"

"Death," said Louis, "is nothing for such crimes as his."

"You want to inflict suffering, then, and you ask me. Well, after all, do I want him to suffer? Do I care for this man's sufferings? What are they or what can they be to me? He stands on his own plane, far beneath me; he is a coarse animal, who can, perhaps, suffer from nothing but physical pain. Should I inflict that on him, what good would it be to me? And yet there is none other that I can inflict."

"Langhetti must have transformed you," said Louis, "with his spiritual ideas."

"Langhetti; or perhaps the fact that I three times gazed upon the face of death and stood upon the threshold of that place where dwells the Infinite Mystery. So when you speak of mere vengeance my heart does not respond. But there is still something which may make a purpose as strong as vengeance."

"Name it."

"The sense of intolerable wrong!" cried Frank, in vehement tones; "the presence of that foul pair in the home of our ancestors, our own exile, and all the sufferings of the past! Do you think that I can endure this?"

"No—you must have vengeance."

"No; not vengeance."

"What then?"

"Justice!" cried Frank, starting to his feet.

"Justice—strict, stern, merciless; and that justice means to me all that you mean by vengeance. Let us make war against him from this time forth while life lasts; let us cast him out and get back our own; let us put him into the power of the law, and let that take satisfaction on him for his crimes; let us cast him out and fling him from us to that power which can fittingly condemn. I despise him, and despise his sufferings. His agony will give me no gratification. The anguish that a base nature can suffer is only disgusting to me—he suffers only out of his baseness. To me, and with a thing like that, vengeance is impossible, and justice is enough."

"At any rate you will have a purpose, and your purpose points to the same result as mine."

"But how is this possible?" said Frank. "He is strong, and we are weak. What can we do?"

"We can try," said Louis. "You are ready to undertake any thing. You do not value your life. There is one thing which is before us. It is desperate—it is almost hopeless; but we are both ready to try it."

"What is that?"

"The message from the dead," said Louis, spreading before Frank that letter from the treasure ship which he himself had so often read.

"And are you going to try this?"

"Yes."

"How?"

"I don't know. I must first find out the resources of science."

"Have you Cato yet?"

"Yes."

"Can he dive?"

"He was brought up on the Malabar coast, among the pearl-fishers, and can remain under water for an incredible space of time. But I hope to find means which will enable me myself to go down under the ocean depths. This will be our object now. If it succeeds, then we can gain our purpose; if not, we must think of something else."

HE STOOPS TO CONQUER.

NEVER more will lady's favor, ribbon from a snowy breast,

Victor-wreathlet won in tourney, gleam upon a knightly breast;

Dreams of chivalry are over, simple service suits love best.

Centre of the gleaming circle sat King Francis, high above

Where a lion roared; before it there a lady cast a glove,

And Delorme across the barriers leapt to take it, all for love.

Wot we how the story runneth—how he stept back to his place,

Took the glove, and lightly flung it in that haughty lady's face;

And the thoughtless court applauded all the insult and disgrace.

Who would win a lady's favor, gentler deeds than this must do;

Silken are the chains that bind him when a lover comes to woo;

Strength in tourney is not needed now to prove him leal and true.

He must claim a rose-bud falling from her bosom in the dance;

He must school his tongue to tender words to win a tender glance:

But our modern Queen of Beauty is not won by broken lance.

And our modern lover, wooing her whom Aphrodite dowers

With immortal beauty, squires her through the evening's magic hours,

Knowing that he stoops to conquer when he lifts the fallen dowers.

WOMAN'S ARITHMETIC.

IN all arithmetics but woman's two added to two make four; in hers two always remains two, double or triple it as she may. She does not probably hold to this in theory, but she certainly does in practice. For example, a newly-married dame was the other day computing the expenses of her household. On reaching the item of servants she counted thus on her rosy-tipped fingers: "There's Molly the cook, there's Bridget the waiter, there's Lucy the laundress, there's Catherine the nurse, there's Sally the chamber-maid, and there's Léonie my maid—but I won't count her, for I pay her wages out of my own money." This item of Léonie was thus entirely left out of her calculation, as the pretty arithmetician never seemed to think for a moment that if she dispensed with the lady's maid she might appropriate the money paid for her wages to paying those of Molly or either of the others of her numerous retinue, or to any other purpose.

Again, an old uncle—bad luck to him!—takes it into his head to leave a friend's wife five hundred dollars a year. This money she spends at least a dozen times in a twelve-month, without her being aware apparently that the original sum does not remain at the end of the year in its perfect totality. She wants a cashmere shawl, and asks her husband, but is refused. "Then I'll buy it with my own money," she pettishly rejoins. It is bought. Three months after she asks for a new piano, and is again denied. Then comes the same rejoinder: "I'll buy it with my own money." Her "own money" seems, like a homeopathic pill, to increase in power with its diminution. Thus each year the wife, in spending her "own money," costs her husband a very considerable sum. He calculates the avuncular legacy of five hundred dollars to be an expense to him, on an average, of two thousand per annum; and so far from feeling grateful to the generous donor, wishes every day of his life that he had cut his niece off with a shilling, or, instead of leaving her a legacy of five hundred dollars a year to receive, had left her an annual debt of that amount to pay.

Women seem to have no idea of the value of money except in the smallest sums. Thus they will higggle about the difference of a cent in the price of a dozen eggs, and spend hundreds of dollars without a moment's hesitation for a dress or a shawl. They close the spigot, but open the bung-hole. A dame was lately urging upon her husband her claim to a carriage and pair on the ground that she had been so saving during the last year as to diminish her daily household consumption of milk from four to three quarts!

Female computation certainly requires to be based on more sound principles. Every woman should buy a copy of the latest arithmetic, which would teach her that two added to two give four as a result.

WHAT REALLY GOES BY TELEGRAPH.

AN elderly lady in Vermont, a farmer's wife, called out to the foreman who was superintending the setting of the poles and the stretching of the wires across her husband's farm, to ask as follows: "Say, Sir, do the letters go inside or outside of them wires?" "Inside, ma'am," replied the workman. "I knowed they must go inside," she said, "for I watched the wires so close that I was sure they did not go outside."

A great many persons are puzzled to know what it is that goes along the wire in making a telegraphic communication, and how it goes. What is really transmitted, at least so the electricians suppose, is simply a series of pulsations.

When a person is shaking a carpet spread upon the grass, he sends a series of undulations across it, from one side to the other, at every rise and fall of the edge which he holds in his hand. If there were another person at the opposite edge of the carpet, and the two were to agree that one wave transmitted in this way should mean Yes, and two waves No, a telegraphic communication would be established between them, very analogous, in its mode of operation, to that of the electric wire—as the philosophers of the present day understand it.

Undulations of this kind could be transmitted through a carpet for a few feet only; but through a rope lying on the ground they could be sent much farther. By means of a wire stretched between two distant points, the pulsations or vibrations excited by a blow struck upon it, and impelled by the elasticity of the metal—which pulsations are only undulations of a very intense and rapid character—might be transmitted to a vastly greater distance, and at an almost infinitely higher speed. The distance and the speed, however, attainable in this way, are as nothing compared with those realized by the supposed pulsations of electricity which a metallic wire conveys. These last run from one point to another, along an insulated wire, at a rate which makes the transmission practically instantaneous for any distance yet attempted by man.*

Thus what is really transmitted along the telegraphic wire is a series of groups of electric pulsations—for the individual pulsations succeed each other with a rapidity infinitely too great to be separately recognized—the several groups forming what might be called so many electric shocks since they would produce shocks if they passed through the animal system. Instead of this, however, they are employed at the end of the line in imparting a series of motions to an iron bar through a magnetic effect which they produce, and the various combinations of these motions represent the letters of the alphabet; and thus the words of the message are spelled.

It is universally taken for granted by the philosophers of the present day that the phenomena of heat, light, and electricity are produced through the medium of some species of vibration or pulsation, which is of extreme minuteness in respect to dimension, but of great intensity in force. In the case of light, for example, they suppose that these pulsations are transmitted through a very subtle ether which fills all space. There are but two ways, they reason, in which we can conceive of a force being transmitted through space from one point to another; one by a progressive motion of material particles emitted by the body from which the force emanates and impinging upon the one acted upon, and the other by an undulatory motion transmitted through an elastic medium filling the space between them; and as the former has been shown to be impossible, the latter it is concluded must stand as the real explanation.

This seems very conclusive, it is true; and yet, after all, the philosophers do not appear to differ very greatly from the good lady in Vermont in the character of their logic. She could conceive of but two ways in which telegraphic communications could be conveyed, namely, by letters sent either within or without the wires. She satisfied herself that it was not the one, and, of course, it must certainly be the other. In the same way the philosophers can conceive of only two possible modes of the transmission of light, namely, by progressive and by undulatory movements of intervening matter. They satisfy themselves that it can not be the one, and infer that, of course, it must be the other. The possibility of there being other modes of transmission of force beyond their experience, and, of course, beyond their powers of conception, does not seem to be taken at all into the account by either party.

* About 8000 miles a second in submarine cables, and 15,000 in wires suspended in the air.

THE GREAT
have just received
TWO FULL CARGOES
of the
FINEST NEW CROP TEAS.

22,000 Half Chests by Ship Golden State.

12,000 Half Chests by Ship George Shotton.

In addition to these large cargoes of Black and Japan Teas the Company are constantly receiving large invoices of the finest quality of Green Teas from the Moyune districts of China, which are unrivaled for fineness and delicacy of flavor, which they are selling at the following prices:

Oolong (black), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 per lb.
Mixed (green and black), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c.; best, $1 per lb.
ENGLISH BREAKFAST, 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 20 per lb.
IMPERIAL (green), 60c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
YOUNG HYSON (green), 50c., 60c., 70c., 80c., 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
UNCOLORED JAPAN, 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
GUNPOWDER, $1 25; best, $1 50 per lb.
Coffee roasted and ground daily.

Hotels, saloons, boarding-house keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our

FRENCH BREAKFAST AND DINNER COFFEE, which we sell at the low price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 50 cents to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St., (Post-Office Box 5643,) N. Y.

To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea Trade (previous to the establishment of the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,) we will start with the American Houses, leaving out of the account entirely the profits of the Chinese factors.

First. The American House in China or Japan makes large profits on their sales or shipments—and some of the richest retired merchants in this country have made their immense fortunes through their houses in China.

Second. The Banker makes large profits upon the foreign exchange used in the purchase of Teas.

Third. The Importer makes a profit of 30 to 50 per cent. in many cases.

Fourth. On its arrival here it is sold by the cargo, and the Purchaser sells it to the Speculator in invoices of 1000 to 2000 packages, at an average profit of about 10 per cent.

Fifth. The Speculator sells it to the Wholesale Tea Dealer in lines at a profit of 10 to 15 per cent.

Sixth. The Wholesale Tea Dealer sells it to the Wholesale Grocer in lots to suit his trade at a profit of about 10 per cent.

Seventh. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail Dealer at a profit of 15 to 25 per cent.

Eighth. The Retailer sells it to the Consumer for ALL THE PROFIT HE CAN GET.

When you have added to these EIGHT profits as many brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, and add the original cost of the Tea, it will be perceived what the consumer has to pay. And now we propose to show why we can sell so very much lower than small dealers.

We propose to do away with all these various profits and brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, with the exception of a small commission paid for purchasing to our correspondents in China and Japan, one cartage, and a small profit to ourselves—which, on our large sales, will amply pay us.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city. Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a Club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a Club say how much Tea or Coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price-List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete, send it to us by mail. We will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost—so that there need be no confusion in their distribution: each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the Club can divide equally among themselves.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford.

We send no complimentary package for clubs of less than thirty dollars.

COUNTRY CLUBS, Hand and Wagon Peddlers, and small stores (of which class we are supplying many thousands, all of which are doing well), can have their orders promptly and faithfully filled, and, in case of Clubs, can have each party's name marked on their package and directed, by sending their orders to Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey street.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than thirty dollars had better send post-office drafts, or money, with their orders, to save the expense of collecting by express; but larger orders we will send by express, to collect on delivery.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third by sending directly to

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.
Beware of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are

BOGUS OR IMITATIONS.

We have no branches, and do not in any case authorize the use of our name.

Post-Office Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.

RISE AND FALL OF CRINOLINE.

THE RISE AND FALL OF CRINOLINE.

III.

ANNO 1745.—Madame d'Etioles, afterward Marquise de Pompadour, among many doubtful advantages which she conferred on the world, as we have said, brought the hoop-skirt to that dazzling height, or rather breadth, which we represent without exaggeration in the accompanying illustration. Such a skirt, in order to be "correct," must have a diameter of at least four yards and a half, with all its complicated structure of iron and wire, must make no noise in motion, and, by means of a hidden cord, must contract itself by at least a couple of yards when its fair owner seated herself. The cost of a skirt thus pliant and elastic amounted to—only think of it, ladies!—300, 400, and often 600 livres; and, moreover, owing to its complicated, and therefore fragile construction, such a dress could not be worn more than a dozen times, after which term of service it earned a special covering, and an honorable place in the wardrobe. When a lady wearing one of these dresses walked in the streets, the passengers had almost to run into the doorways to avoid being run down, and children were as good as lost; indeed, she was like a man-of-war under full sail. She was the terror of wayfarers, the laughing-stock of nurse-maids, and the bane of poor mothers who had to give their children the run of the streets. Indeed, these gigantic skirts covered so much crime, and caused so much misfortune, that they certainly contributed a spark to the mine which was to explode half a century later, to the especial alarm of those ladies, and the destruction of one of the last wearers of the hoop-skirt of that day—Madame Dubarry. Hence arose a proverb, "When the skirts become narrower the women will be more virtuous." And the ladies' dresses did become narrower, almost too much so. The costume of the free citoyennes of the French Republic bordered on Spartan scantiness, and even fettered them in walking. They were too zealous to avoid the former extreme—and manners actually became better and more unassuming, though perhaps only during a few bad years. And how long did these good principles hold their ground? This is a delicate question, which we will not attempt to answer. None of our readers, however, need feel irritated by the above harsh criticisms, as in writing them we had in view only the four-and-a-half-yard skirts of the Pompadour, and not the more modest and moderate crinolines of our own days.

FACETLE.

WHAT is the difference between a manufacturer of blinds and one of the cheap, small type, badly-printed volumes?—The first is a blind-maker and the other makes blind.

"Absence makes the heart grow fonder"—of some one else.

When a person declares that his "brain is on fire," is it etiquette to blow it out?

FASHIONABLE AVICIDE.

Ladies, Fashionable Ladies, please to look at this important intelligence from Paris:

"Velvets, furs, and feathers will be the mode during the coming winter. Robes, bonnets, hats, mantles, and muffs are to be of one or other of them, or of two of them combined. For velvets the fashionable shades of color will be violet, Bismarck, capucine—a rich golden orange tint—flamme de Ponce, and a deep puce."

Ladies, by-the-way, what is Bismarck color? Assuredly not green, if it be like the man. And what is flamme de Ponce color? Generally read, eh? Minds feminine of course are stored with knowledge of this sort, and can distinguish to a shade the difference between Solferino and Magenta. It is troublesome to men, however, to keep their minds informed of all the novel names of fashionable colors, and terrible mistakes are committed through their ignorance. Many a suitor must have sunk in the opinion of the lady he is courting, merely by forgetting what new color she preferred. How would Angelina pout at him, if Edwin, being ordered to buy some Bismarck ribbon for her, were to forget the name completely, and bring some common color, such as servants only wear!

But, ladies, this is what you ought especially to look at:

"The feathers are ostrich, peacock, pheasant, bird of paradise, humming-bird, grebe, swan's-down, and marabout. Feather bonnets and hats are already largely worn; feather muffs are common enough; for bonnets, with strings to match, are creeping into favor . Silk and other robes are trimmed with bands of peacock's and pheasant's feathers, or a rich passementerie, which exactly reproduces them, and with galons of swan's-down."

"Gallons of swan's-down!" There should be another "!" surely. Imagine any lady wearing gallons of swan's-down! How many gallons must she wear to be completely in the fashion? And when covered with so vast a quantity of swan's-down, would she look more like a little duck, or a great goose?

Fine feathers may make fine birds, but can they ever make fine ladies? And is it not a pity that fine birds should be destroyed for the mere sake of their fine feathers? Now that swan's-down is in fashion, swans will every where be slaughtered. There will be a hunt for humming-birds, and a massacre of marabouts; grebes will greedily be grabbed, and birds of paradise pursued; peacocks be pitched into, and pheasants be battened, that their feathers may be made up into mantles, muffs, and bonnets. Clearly, any one who sings Oh, Would I were a Bird! would run into great danger while feathers are so fashionable. At least, one specially would shrink from being metamorphosed into any of the birds whose names above are catalogued. Far better just at present be a sparrow than a swan; and, notwithstanding his long legs and supernatural digestion, an ostrich scarcely can expect, while the feather fashion lasts, to live as long as a cock robin.

Peacocks and pheasants may perhaps find some little mercy shown them, because their feathers happen to be imitated easily. We are told "a rich passementerie exactly reproduces them." Surely, other feathers also might be copied without difficulty. What a good thing it would be, ladies, if, instead of real feathers, you would venture to wear sham ones! Think how many pretty birds you would save by this slight sacrifice! Let it only be announced in your notes of invitation, "P.S. Please to come in imitation feathers." You might fairly plume yourselves on doing a kind act, and all your feathered friends would thank you most sincerely.

In the report of a wedding which took place recently the description of the bridesmaids' toilettes was finished up with the following words: "bonnets to match." Marriages, like fevers, are catching, and a wedding-breakfast is generally looked upon by young ladies as a good "match-making" opportunity.

MORE ENTICING.—A fellow was doubting whether or not he should volunteer to fight. One of the flags waving before his eyes bearing the inscription "Victory or Death!" somewhat troubled and discouraged him.

"Victory is a very good thing," said he, "but why put it 'Victory or Death?' Just put it 'Victory or Crippled,' and I'll go that!"

A Cleveland letter-writer adds to the address of his letter, probably for the benefit of clerks with bad phrenological developments, "For Heaven's sake, let this letter go through; there is no money in it."

On the approach of Holy Week a fashionable lady said to her friend, "We must mortify ourselves a little." "Well," replied the other, "let us make our servants fast."

THE LATEST SHAVE.—The accounts from St. Thomas represent the face of the island as completely shaved by the wind. All the estates are bare of vegetation, the hurricane having hurried the canes off the island.

AMUSING, VERY.

Dr. Sawbones having finished the amputation of a leg of one of his patients, a near relative of the latter took him aside, and said to him:

"Doctor, do you think that your patient will recover?"

"Recover! there has never been the least shadow of a hope for him."

"Then what was the use of making him suffer?"

"Why, my dear fellow, you could not say brutally to a sick man, 'You are dying. He must be amputated a little!'"

"Why will you persist in wearing another woman's hair on your head?" asked Acid of his wife. She retorted, "Why will you persist in wearing other sheep's wool on your back?"

THE COLDEST RECEPTION.—Meeting a chilled shot.

The best toast of the season was, we think, given by a printer, viz., "Woman—the fairest work in all creation. The edition is large, and no man should be without a copy."

What is the only pain we make light of?—A window pane.

LOVE LYRIC.

My elbows on the mantle-shelf
Complacently I'm leaning;
And 'twixt the mirror and myself
There's nothing intervening.
Upturning a sarcastic nose,
I scrutinize my whisker.
And think the pace at which it grows
Might possibly be brisker.

My eyes, if what I think is true,
Are worth a monarch's ransom;
I've seen a hundred people who Are nothing like so handsome.
What though my face is young!—'tis fair,
And singularly simple;
I never met with any where
So elegant a dimple.

I never know a smile more kind—
A loftier brow or paler—
Nor saw a form so well designed
To fascinate a tailor.
Yet think not that I boldly boast—
I am not vaunting vainly—
I'm only stating, at the most,
That I am cooth and gainly.
Although my beauty is my bliss,
Conceit, I always flee it;
All I complain about is this—
That no one seems to see it.

LILY MAXWELL.—John Bright's votress and John Mill's votaress.

An old bachelor who had become melancholy and poetical wrote some verses for the village paper, in which he expressed the hope that the time would soon come when he should "rest calmly within a shroud,

With a weeping willow by my side."

But to his inexpressible horror it came out in print,

"When I shall rest calmly within a shawl,
With a weeping widow by my side."

OPERATIC QUOTATION.

(From Masaniello.)

On a gay Widow giving up her Weeds for Colors.—
"Behold, behold how brightly, brightly breaks the mourning!"

A student at a veterinary college being asked, "If a broken-winded horse were brought to you to cure, what would you advise?" promptly replied, "To sell him as soon as possible."

In what ship has the greatest number of people been wrecked?—Courtship.

What is better than a promising young man?—A paying one.

"I'll give that girl a piece of my mind," exclaimed a certain young fellow. "I would not," replied his uncle; "you have none to spare."

THE SICK DOLL.

"Now," one day, Mary said, "is my dolly sick, sick, sick?"

Oh, send off for the doctor, quick, quick, quick!"
He came to the door with a rat-tat-tat,
He came with his cane, and he came with his hat;
He looked at the doll, and then shook his head,
And said, "Mary, you must put it to bed, bed, bed;
You must keep it very warm, and very, very still,
And when I call to-morrow, you will please pay my bill."

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 25, 1868.

[SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1868, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

Mantilla Veil.

THIS graceful and elegant veil, which somewhat resembles the Spanish mantilla, is an excellent adjunct to the small bonnets, protecting the face and neck from the frosty air. The veil is in two pieces, the form of the larger one of which is shown in miniature on one side of the Supplement, which also gives the pattern; and the smaller can readily be seen in the first illustration. The original is of black dotted lace, the larger part being bordered with edging two inches wide, and the smaller with edging an inch wide. To the upper corners of the latter is fastened an elastic cord about seven inches long, which is passed beneath the chignon to confine the veil. The ends of the larger part are fastened in front, as shown in the illustration.

Cashmere Baschlik.

WE have already given in Harper's Bazar, Number 5, a pattern of this useful and graceful novelty in crochet work, to be worn as a hood or shawl. We now give another of cashmere, which can be worn over a bonnet or round hat, as a protection against cold and rain. The illustration gives a front and back view of the baschlik covering a fur hat. The original is of gray cashmere, Crochet Frock for Children from 1 to 3 Years old.

See illustration, page 196.

MATERIALS: 6½ ounces white twisted wool, ¼ oz. red, and ⅜ oz. black twisted wool; a Tunisian crochet needle of size corresponding to the wool.—This little dress is worked in Tunisian (Victoria) crochet stitch and wave crochet stitch. The skirt, the yoke, and the sleeves are of white wool; the border of the skirt and the cuffs of the sleeves are of red and black wool. The skirt is begun on the lower edge of the border. Following the proportion given in the design, do 558 stitches (the breadth of the skirt). The first pattern row is done in Tunisian stitch. The second row (black wool) is made so that the first red row shall look like wave stitch; in the return round of the second row 4 loops are next done singly, then 3 together, * 7 singly, 3 together. From * repeat to the end of the round, the last 4 loops being done singly as the 4 in the beginning. Third row (white wool): in the first round of this row add one stitch between the first and second upright chain of stitches of the former row, by drawing the thread through into a loop under the horizontal chain row, * then follow 3 Tunisian stitches; after which comes a loop, in forming which the needle must be drawn through under the 3 loops knitted together in the last round; 3 Tunisian stitches, 1 added as above, 1 Tunisian, 1 added. Repeat from *. In the second round of this row work next 4 loops singly, then alternately 3 together and 7 singly. The fourth, fifth, and sixth rows are done like the third one.

Seventh row (black wool): 1 stitch through all those loops which were formed by taking 3 together in the last row; the next as above. Eighth row (red wool): Tunisian, without adding to or diminishing the number of stitches. Ninth row (black wool): like the second row. The border is now finished. The skirt is lined with gray silk, and trimmed with white silk braid and white beads. A very pretty one can be made of black cashmere, lined with black or colored silk, and trimmed with black cord. Fig. 5 gives the pattern of half the baschlik. Having cut the pieces turned down, and tacked them to the pattern, cut of the outside and lining each two pieces of the same size, sew the outside and lining together from 7 to 8 and from 8 to 9, put on the trimming in the manner shown in the illustration, and cord the edge. Finish the point behind with a tassel of gray and white silk.

White Poplin Pelerine.

THIS pelerine is of white poplin, trimmed as shown in the illustration with satin piping and Angora fringe. It is lined with silk, and thinly wadded. Cut of the outside, lining, wadding, and interlining from Fig. 47 each two pieces, and from Fig. 48 one piece. Lay the wadding between the lining and interlining, and quilt the whole; then baste on the outside, and join Figs. 47 and 48 from 35 to 36, thinning the wadding somewhat along the seams. Run the edges together, cord the neck, and trim the bottom with narrow satin piping and Angora fringe, an inch and a half in width.

begun in white wool, with 444 stitches. In the second round of the first row begin to narrow on both sides of the skirt, in order to form the gores. Work together as one stitch the eighty-eighth and eighty-ninth, the hundred and forty-sixth and hundred and forty-seventh, the two hundred and ninety-eighth and two hundred and ninety-ninth, and the three hundred and fifty-sixth and three hundred and fifty-seventh. In the following two rows take up only 1 stitch from each 2 above mentioned. Now follow the 3d-5th rows entirely plain. Narrow again on the sixth row, so that 87 stitches may remain for each back, and 150 for the front; the 56 stitches at each side between the points of narrowing must be decreased to 4 in the 74 rows following. To do this the intervening rounds must also be narrowed, so that in the upper part only 1 plain round alternates with each narrowed round. From the seventy-fifth row finish separately each back part of 87 stitches by 13 additional rounds; crochet likewise the 150 stitches of the front to the required height. The 4 stitches at each side remain for the arm-holes. The skirt of the little frock is now finished. The yoke is done after the pattern Fig. 22; the back and front are in one piece, and the upper edge ornamented in wave stitch, with a border of red and black wool. Allow 30 stitches for each sleeve. Make the cuff border like the border of the skirt, only crochet 2 rounds of the white wool. Do not decrease in the following rows, which are of black wool; the red row, also, must be entirely smooth. Then reverse the work so that the right side of the border shall be on the wrong side of the work, and work 4 rows in white wool. In the fifth row take up three loops; then add a stitch after each loop, so that the entire number of stitches shall be 56. With these work 20 rows. In the second row of these twenty rows work 10 loops; then work alternately 2 loops together and 1 singly, the last 10, however, being also worked singly. After 3 rows, which are worked without narrowing, follow 7 rounds, in making which always leave without knitting 2 stitches at the beginning and at the end, so that at last only 16 stitches remain. The sleeve must now be sewed together, the cuff ornamentation being turned over on the right side. Then sew the border on the skirt, making the lengths equal each other by holding in if needful. Fasten the yoke to the skirt, plaiting the latter to suit the width of the yoke. Let in the sleeves and fasten the yoke with buttons and loops.

A PLATE OF SOUP.

THE greatest triumph of modern science consists in its direct application to the needs of daily life. The ancient philosopher scorned all those studies which led merely to the improvement of the material condition of human existence, while the modern chemist concentrates his energies in discovering the means of increasing the practical enjoyment and bodily health of his fellow-men. He thus busies himself with the humblest necessities of daily life, and instructs us how to clothe ourselves, to breathe, eat, and drink in accordance with the absolute laws of science.

Liebig, the greatest of modern chemists, has especially given a practical direction to his scientific inquiries, and has, regardless of the affected dignity of ancient philosophy, condescended to enlighten us in reference to our simplest and humblest wants. He throws his clear light of science into the lowliest household, and thus brightens it with the hue of health. He enters even the kitchen, and does not disdain to show us how to boil and roast a joint of meat, to cook a potato, and prepare the humblest daily meal. We should listen attentively to his teachings, and gratefully accept his lessons, for they will conduce greatly to economy, and our physical comfort and health.

Profiting by his researches, let us concoct scientifically that most elementary of household productions—a plate of soup. It is a common error to suppose that to boil a piece of meat for eating, and make a nutritious soup of it is one and the same operation. It is by no means so. They require two very different, and indeed, opposing processes. To cook one properly, you must spoil the other. The meat must be sacrificed to the soup, or the soup to the meat. The object in either case should be to make the one or the other, as it may be, as nutritious and digestive as possible. Say you want a bit of boiled meat, whether of beast or fowl it matters not, to have it in perfection you must plunge it into a pot of water while it is briskly boiling, and so keep it for some minutes only. Then pour in as much cold as will reduce the temperature of the boiling water to 165° or 158°, and keep the meat simmering for hours at this degree of heat. The flesh will thus, Liebig tells us, have the qualities best adapted to its use as food. The rationale of the process is simple. When the meat is first plunged into the pot the albumen (which is the same as white of egg) on the outer part of the flesh coagulates by the heat, and forms an external crust which prevents the boiling water from penetrating into the interior of the mass. The meat thus retains within it all its natural juices, which are, however, cooked to the proper degree by the heat which alone, without the dissolving fluid, is transmitted to them and the solid substance in whose interstices they are held. Thus you will have a nutritious and palatable dish of boiled beef, fowl, or what not. The fluid in the pot is left so devoid of all taste and strength that a cat would turn away from it in disgust, and a fly scorn to drown itself in it. Of course such a mess should not, if it could be, be palmed upon the most unwary for soup, for it will neither please the taste nor satisfy the hunger.

If soup is the object of the cook, the only means by which she can get it of agreeable flavor and wholesome character is by putting the meat into cold water and heating it gradually to a boil. The fluid thus penetrates throughout the whole mass of the flesh, and mixing with its juices dissolves almost every particle of nutriment they contain. She thus gets a good soup, but necessarily spoils the meat in the process. The former has taken all that is nutritious and digestible, and the latter been deprived of them. The remaining substance, after good soup has been extracted from it, is a negative quality, which counts for nothing in the sum of subsistence. It may be eaten as a sop with the soup, but alone it could not support life as well as a sucked orange. Soup has never been a favorite article of food in America, and for the simple reason that it is seldom made palatable and wholesome. The ordinary soup of our country cousins is a basin of hot water dotted with spots of oil, or what the French call oil de perdrix, from their resemblance to the yellow glistening eyes of the partridge. Its nauseous odor and taste might be supposed to be sufficient to repel the most adventurous from the attempt to swallow a compound whose unwholesomeness, if it escapes the discernment of the palate, is sure to be detected by the instinctive appreciation of the stomach.

The greasiness of soup can be avoided by removing all the fatty parts of the meat before boiling it, or by letting the fluid stiffen by cold into a solid, when the fat will be found lying on the surface, from which it can be easily sliced off. The mere fact of a soup forming a jelly when allowed to cool, is by no means a proof of its nutritiousness or richness, as it is ordinarily termed. Boiled bones will give a fluid which will become the firmest of jellies on cooling, but it will have neither the flavor nor the nutriment of soup made from the flesh.

A soup pure and simple as the French make it, not the pepperish and satiating compounds of the English, or the oil and water of our country cooks, should be the first course of every man's dinner. A simple bouillon, or beef broth, varied from day to day with a little vermicelli, macaroni, pâte d'Italie, farina, tomatoes, or other digestible and well-boiled vegetables, is one of the most wholesome articles of diet. To the hungry stomach it is more acceptable at first than more substantial food, for, absorbed at once, it gives immediate contentment; and, moreover, by tempering the voracity of the appetite, checks its indulgence in the less digestible solids.

HOUSES AND HOMES.

THEY are not the same. They are different. They are very different.

The place where the man of abject poverty spends his weary days and still more weary nights can not be called a home. It is a house—no more. So is a barn, a stable, a house. But how about the other extreme? The gaudy mansion, so splendidly adjusted to landscape and sky, so lavishly adorned with decorative art—is that a home? Sometimes it is a home; often not. A man who builds a great showy structure that he may pompously parade his wealth before the public eye has certainly no right to call that thing a home. No home will he find there, no memories of sweet childhood and of blessed yesterdays upon the walls, no repose to soothe the years of declining strength. Such a man is next neighbor to a miser. The miser keeps his gold in bags; this man puts his in stone and mortar—only a change in the material. Both are sensual.

But a house that is a home is built after the architectural tastes of the heart, is constructed by truth of sentiment, stands the symbol of gracious beauty, and gives hints of heaven rather than of earth. There may be wealth in it, decorative wealth, fine art wealth, wealth of literature and of luxury, but not for itself, nor for the exorbitant demands of proud eyes, nor as a levy (as big as an income-tax) upon your admiration for the gratification of a voracious vanity. If it is a genuine home, it is a habitation of hearts; its riches are unsensualized, its peace is a descent from above, and its light is radiance from the City of God.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

A Letter to Epicurus.

MY DEAR EPICURUS,—You were lately so good as to ask me to dine with you at Delmonico's—the upper Delmonico's, of course, at the corner of Fourteenth Street, where a great many of us inevitably dine with ghosts when we dine at all, so full is an old mansion of pleasant memories. I accepted your invitation with great alacrity, both because any dinner must be good at so excellent a house, but especially because I knew that under your auspices we should have the very best dinner that money could buy. I do not say the best dinner that taste and knowledge could order, because I have taken pen in hand to tell the truth whatever comes of it; and I know that you will take as kindly as it is meant any advice that I may give you about ordering a neat dinner for two.

It is, I know, almost superfluous after the delightful work of that great master Thackeray, "Early and Late Papers," to venture any hints upon manners at the table, whether in reference to the mere behavior of the guests, or to the furnishing of the viands. But, perhaps, something more elementary may be permitted; something which treats a little in detail of a knowledge which the master assumes to exist in every person who offers to dine artistically in Paris. For indeed, dear Epicurus, an old diner, as I am, beholds with dismay and sorrow the money which is daily wasted at fine restaurants, squandered through sheer ignorance. I see a man, for instance, enter and seat himself at Delmonico's table. He is immediately ill at ease. Every thing is so polished and has so costly an air that he is straightway overwhelmed with a feeling of the necessity of spending money. The waiter lays the knife and fork, and offers him the trim little book of dinner with an air which seems to anticipate a noble order, a dinner in the largest style. But my very uncomfortable friend conceals whatever might betray his awkwardness, and resolves to be equal to the occasion. He will dine in a manner becoming such very neat upholstery and such black walnut furniture. And when he has come to that heroic conclusion he has fallen into the very trap which, let us hope, quite unconsciously, the decorations of the room and the obsequious affability and expectancy of the waiter have prepared for him.

Our friend, therefore, orders a soup, a fish, a boiled, a roast, a bird perhaps, or a salad, a sweet, and a cup of coffee. The soup is abundant and good, and he eats much of it. Some of the fish goes out; a good deal of the boiled follows it. He nibbles the roast, tastes the bird idly, plays with the sweet, and swallows the coffee. He pays a tremendous bill, gives the waiter two shillings, buys a cigar at twenty cents, and has had as uncomfortable a dinner as if he had run in at Berry's, or any other feeding-trough in Broad Street, and had bolted his dinner standing at a high counter. The demure gentleman who receives the money is satisfied. The attentive waiter helps our friend on with his coat with the politest energy; but if he ever philosophically meditates upon the diners whom he serves during the hours of dinner, and imparts confidences to his fellow-waiters, I am sure he expresses the opinion that our friend is from the oil regions, and is not very much accustomed to a good dinner.

Now, my dear Epicurus, when we dined together, you ordered, after the small oysters on the shell, an excellent soup, à la Reine I think it was—and let me urge you to order a purée aux marrons (or a chestnut soup), whenever you fortunately happen upon it on the bill—and you followed it up, in the old-fashioned style, with fish, boiled, roast, and the rest, regularly filing in, deploying, and wheeling off, until I thought of the old Austrian Field-Marshal Wurmser displaying his ancient tactics of war while his young and alert antagonist, Napoleon Bonaparte, outraged the traditions but won the victory. For there is a better way than that of the traditions of the table. Ascertain what you want to do, and what force you command. In other words, determine how much appetite you and your guest have, and act accordingly. Have no regular rule. Sometimes a soup, but not always and of course. Boiled?—well, it seems to me, dear Epicurus, as an old traveler among the dinner-tables of many countries, that there are very, very few occasions at a neat dinner for two which will admit of boiled, except, possibly, a very exceptional bit of mutton with exceptional capers, and that must be regarded rather in the light of a sacrifice, both of the meat and of the appetite. A boiled bass, in the season, and salmon, of course; but that is fish, and does not fall within the canon.

But I observed that you had not acquired one of the very rudiments of restaurant-dining, and it is one which it is well to learn and to remember. Our little dinner, exclusive of the wines, made an "addition" of eighteen dollars. That was just twice as much as exactly the same dinner at the same time and place should have cost. For you ordered twice as much of every dish as was needed. Had you ordered for one instead of two nothing would have been sent away, and we might have extended the variety. We certainly could have done so if we had omitted that abominable boiled; and I sigh to think what an exquisite something we might have had in place of it. My sigh reminds me of an anecdote which my friend the late lamented Reverend Doctor Blunt used to tell of his wife, whom the worthy man persisted in calling his lady, until some one asked him whether, as woman was really a more respectful name than lady, he ought not rather to say his woman instead of his lady, after which my friend relinquished the expression. One night, when the Reverend Mrs. Blunt was still a young school-girl in her father's house, the family were awakened by loud sounds of grief from her chamber, and when they had all hastened thither, fearing the worst, the tender-hearted girl whispered to her mother that she had just awakened and remembered that she had not eaten her lunch that day at school, upon which she burst into renewed and inconsolable lamentation. I am older, dear Epicurus, and shall command myself; but I sympathize deeply with the late Mrs. Blunt when I reflect upon that wretched boiled.

This matter of ordering for two or for one is so essential to a reasonable dinner that I advise any of your young friends who are going abroad to study in a French café the conduct of two intelligent Frenchmen who intend to dine well. Such is the admirable skill of their arrangement, ordering every thing for one only, that whatever comes seems only to whet the appetite for what follows. There is no sense of satiety, and satisfaction steals on as gently as a May evening. In Europe, where money is not so readily made as with us, it is a universal rule that money must have its worth. It is not ostentatiously or lavishly spent. Our habit of paying each other's fares, and insisting, as a point of politeness, that we must pay for the company upon all occasions, and resenting as an imputation of meanness the offer from any individual of his share of the expense, all this is, and should be, totally unknown. I say should be, because a man may very well afford to pay his share of many little expenses who could not afford to pay for the whole. And yet if others do he must; and, as he can not, he loses the pleasure.

So you will observe, also, that when the Frenchman of the cafés has drunk his cup of black coffee he gravely slides the lumps of sugar which he has not used into his pocket. I have no idea, however, what he does with them. The most probable theory is, that he makes café sucré with them at home. But that is doubtful, for the Frenchman of whom I speak does his drinking at the café. Some gentlemen whom I used to meet regularly at certain cafés in the Palais Royal and upon the Boulevard must have either drank hogsheds of café sucré in private or have accumulated lofty mountains of sugar. But whatever may be the ultimate disposition of the sugar, the man who has paid money for it has no thought of presenting it to the proprietor of the café to be sold to another customer. His money shall have its worth. And whenever it does not, wherever, that is to say, there is a feeling of utter waste, there is a pain produced which impairs the full enjoyment of the dinner. When the repast is, so to speak, a neat fit—the dishes having gone out empty, and the edge of appetite not having been fully blunted until the final mouthful—there is a moral contentment which finely harmonizes with the gustatory satisfaction.

When, therefore, dear Epicurus, you shall again do me the great honor to invite me to dine with you at Delmonico's—and on Mondays and Thursdays I am generally disengaged—I shall venture to suggest that we discard the Wurmser tactics and dine Napoleonically. Let us choose, upon ripe reflection, as few dishes as will satisfy our moderate appetites, and order each of them for one. But the three-decker dinner; the Spanish-galleon dinner; the last-century dinner; the high-stepping, heel-and-toe, or stately alpha soup and omega dried-fruit dinner—let us leave behind us with the full-bottomed wigs and sedan chairs of an ancient day. At the tremendous encounters of that old school which still occur at Mrs. Grundy's, what melancholy spectacles have we not seen! Many of the tenderer of both sexes succumb to the boiled; tough men go down after the roast, and a few of the veterans struggle through the game, for which they have reserved themselves. The hot reserves pour in long after the field is won, and thrice slay the long-slain appetite. For three or four hours this preposterous business continues; and I can think of nothing but the Battle of the Huns, where the combatants, slain and apparently dead upon the field, renewed the struggle in the air. At Mrs. Grundy's table we are all, apparently, satiated. But there are such incessant relays of food that we must suppose that somebody is still eating, somewhere.

Such a dinner, dear Epicurus, may be well meant, but it is a work of very bad manners. It is merely a symptom of the universal ostentation with which Mrs. Grundy spends her money. The object is not to give pleasure, but to proclaim the great fact of her great wealth. I am an old man compared with you, my friend, and it is not in that direction that enjoyment is to be found. I often dine comfortably and satisfactorily upon a dozen oysters in the Fulton Market. I do not advise you to do it regularly; but I do advise, that, whether you spend much money or little—for a dinner, or a book, or for a missionary enterprise, or to found a hospital—you spend it wisely, and with a due regard to getting your money's worth, and to a true economy. A man may very easily think too much of his dinner. But he may also think so little of it as to waste upon it the money which would have fed a poor family for a week. Shall we say next Monday at 6, dear Epicurus?

Yours, with an appetite,
AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

BOMBASINE has long been considered the most suitable dress for deep mourning. The English bombazine, a dead black without gloss, is preferable to the lustrous French goods with silk warp. A good quality may be bought for two dollars a yard, double fold; the best is sold at three dollars and a half. Bias folds of the same, or of English, crepe, are appropriate trimming. Very little jet is used. Good taste directs a nun-like simplicity and absence of ornament.

French serge, a new material this season, is very much sought after. It is a mixture of silk and wool, heavier than bombazine, and a trifle wider, measuring thirty-eight inches. The double twill is very distinct. This goods is far superior to the colored English serge now worn for street suits. It is soft and fine, falling into graceful folds. There are three qualities, varying in price from two dollars and a half to three dollars. Nine yards are sufficient for a lady of medium height.

A similar material is called Henrietta cloth. It differs from serge in having an almost invisible twill, is heavier and wider than bombazine, and is sold at two and three dollars a yard.

CORDED MATERIALS.

An extra heavy goods for midwinter is found in the Ottoman reps. Heavily corded, and not so lustrous as poplin, this is used in the deepest mourning for street suits. Ten yards makes the short dress and paletot. Two dollars and a half is the price per yard. French poplins are also used for street dresses. Empress and Biarritz cloths are soft, pliant, corded materials. In Empress cloth the cord is horizontal, in the Biarritz perpendicular. A medium quality is sold at a dollar and a quarter per yard. The average quantity for a dress is ten yards. Pym's black Irish poplin is sold at three dollars, and the taborette or double-corded poplin, the heaviest and best of all, is four dollars.

CRAPE CLOTHS.

A handsome dress goods resembling crape is called Eugénie crape at some establishments, at others Balmoral crape. As it is two yards wide, only four yards are required for a dress. The price is two dollars and a half. Australian crape is narrower, measuring forty inches, and ranging in price from eighty cents to a dollar and twenty cents a yard. Eight yards is the average quantity sold for a dress. Baratheia is a beautiful wavy fabric a yard and a quarter wide, sold at a dollar and fifty cents.

ENGLISH SERGE AND MOHAIR FABRICS.

The fashionable English serge is all wool, but feels so harsh to the touch that one would, suppose it part cotton. It has a broad twill, is water-proof, and is suitable for street dresses. It is trimmed for mourning and colors alike with wide woolen braid. Fourteen yards make a dress and redingote. It varies in price from a dollar and a quarter to two dollars.

A double-width delaine, called Tamise cloth, is a soft, smooth material, intended for house-dresses. One dollar a yard is the price asked. This is the only form in which the once popular delaines are now used, and the soft velvety merinoes are left on the shelves uncalled for. They are disliked because it is impossible to brush them without making the surface rough. Queen's cloth is a mohair fabric of wool and cotton mixed. It is a yard and a half wide. Canton cloth is very similar, but is more suitable for deep mourning, as it has less lustre.

Poplin and mohair alpacas are of different quality and prices, from fifty cents to two dollars. For ordinary use they are the most serviceable of all black materials, as they wear well, retain their color, and may be brushed without becoming rough. French calico, black ground with white stripes and figures, is sold at forty cents a yard. English calico of the same description at thirty cents.

Under-skirts of Melton cloth are shaped like the Boulevard skirts. A very handsome one is of black Melton, with a purple Greek border of Amozine braid; another is a steel-gray with black border. They vary in price from six to ten dollars.

MOURNING SILKS.

For handsome dresses there are heavy corded silks, suitable for the deepest mourning when trimmed with bands of fluted crape. There are taffetas and gros grains without lustre, and soft poult de soie. Widow's silk is entirely lustreless; a soft, rich fabric, without the usual noisy rustle of silk. It is from three to five dollars a yard. Among some handsome novelties at one of our leading houses is an elegant black goods called Eugénie satin, a repped satin, falling in heavy folds, producing the effect of uncut velvet. The price ranges from six dollars and a half to eight dollars. Another new and beautiful fabric is called imperial satin serge. It has the bright gloss of satin, but is as soft as merino, making rich folds without creasing. Six dollars a yard is asked for this goods. Still another novelty, and rarer than all, is a cobweb moiré. The watered figure, instead of being thrown on the silk in irregular dashes, forms at intervals a beautiful representation of a spider's web. The price is six dollars and a half per yard.

SECOND MOURNING.

For second mourning all the materials we have described are used, with more elaborate trimmings of jet, and purple, and white. It is very fashionable this winter to trim black with white. Occasionally a black passementerie or a velvet appliqué is laid on a white fold. Among suitable materials are the French poplins, black striped with gray, white, or purple, worth from a dollar and a quarter to two dollars. A good quality of silk, with lavender and gray stripes on a black ground, sold formerly at three dollars per yard, has been marked down to two dollars. Twelve yards make the dress.

Gray serge, with satin face, seven-eighths wide, is sold at a dollar and a quarter. It is shot, chiné, and striped diagonally. Scotch winsey, a most serviceable article, of mingled purple and black, is worth a dollar a yard.

A very handsome carriage-dress, intended for half-mourning, is of heavy corded silk, black without lustre. Each width of the skirt has two diagonal bands of gray and white fur, separated by embroidered medallions of white silk, studded with fine jet. Bands to match for corsage and sleeves. Price of the dress unmade a dollar and seventy-five cents per yard. Another of poult de soie has in the centre of each width a large mediæval figure needle-worked with white silk and braid. A morning robe of black Empress cloth has four rows of embroidery on the front width from shoulder to hem. The work is beautifully done in white floss beaded with jet. Collar, cuffs, and belt are also embroidered.

BONNETS AND VEILS.

Bonnets of English crape are worn in all seasons for deep mourning. Only very old ladies wear bombazine. The most tasteful bonnets are the plainest, made by laying three thicknesses of crape over the frame without folds. The strings are of corded ribbon or wide crape, bound. Widow's ruches, of white tarlatan bouillonnée, are made with two or three puffs. Large bows of tarlatan for fastening the bonnet are tucked at the ends, or bordered with a ruche. Corded silk without gloss is used for second mourning, with soft blonde puffs, jet ornaments. Since purple has become so fashionable in colors it is not so suitable for half-mourning. White and black are used in conjunction.

Square veils of English crape with deep borders are fastened on each side by jet pins. Long crape veils are a yard and five-eighths in length, worn with a string through the top. For lighter mourning there are veils of Brussels blonde, trimmed with folds of crape, and with feathers. These have three long points beneath the chin or are round masks with lappets falling over the chignon.

SHAWLS AND CLOAKS.

Camel's-hair cloth, fine and soft, is sold in squares for shawls at eleven dollars a yard. It is two yards in width. Thibet cloth and cashmeres are sold by the yard for long or square shawls at from three to eight dollars. Long double shawls of merino with fringed ends are twelve or fifteen dollars according to quality. A square shawl of a new serge-like material with a wide crape fold for trimming is twenty dollars.

Cloaks of beaver, frosted or plain, are appropriately trimmed for mourning. Astrakhan and Russian lambskin paletots are the most suitable fur wrappings. A very handsome Astrakhan cloth, with diamond figures, is sold for cloaks at fourteen dollars a yard. It is a yard and a half wide. Muffs are made of Astrakhan and of English crape.

TRIMMINGS, COLLARS, ETC.

Bands of fluted crape with scalloped edges are made in a variety of patterns for trimming dresses, and sold by the yard. Crocheted passementerie without jet, and plain galloons are used for mourning silks. White organdy collars and under-sleeves of narrow folds and shell pipings are pointed in the Shakespeare style. Tarlatan ruches, like widow's caps, are worn standing around the neck, with lappets in front. Folds of English crape in scalloped patterns are the deepest mourning collars. French crape is flimsy and soon becomes brown; it is therefore poor economy to use it.

Linen-lawn handkerchiefs with black hems two inches wide, warranted to wash without mixing the black and white, are from fifteen to twenty-five dollars a dozen. For lighter mourning there are cambric handkerchiefs with plain broad hem and monogram embroidered in black; others are of French lawn with black Greek borders above the hem, at various prices, from fifteen to thirty dollars a dozen.

Onyx jewelry is preferred to jet for deep mourning. It is not highly polished, and is in mediæval designs, solid pieces radiating from balls in the centre, with long pendants. Very little gold is visible.

VARIETIES.

The new Mentana red, so fashionable in Paris, and which, it is predicted, will be the ruling color for the rest of the season, is a brilliant shade like ruby. It is especially becoming to brunettes. We have seen it in the elegant imperial serge before alluded to, a repped material with satin face, said to be in favor for Parisian court trains. It is soft and pliant, having the lustre of satin without its dowager-like stiffness. The new red, with Metternich green, like the green of mignonnette, and the intense marigold and capucine, are the colors most in vogue for rich evening dress.

Double skirts are very much worn. When gracefully made they take away the stiffness of a gored dress. They are bordered around the edge when short, but when left long, following the train of the lower skirt, they are only scalloped at the front seams, and looped up, forming an apron.

Pelisses and redingotes require five yards of material, seven-eighths of a yard wide. They are lined with flannel or cloth, and occasionally with fur, and are worn without other wrapping.

An elaborate and beautiful ball-dress, exhibited by one of our most tasteful French modistes, is of Lyons tulle over tarlatan skirts. The trained tulle skirt is puffed three-quarters of a yard deep, on which are strewn white daisies with ruby tips. A tunic of tulle, in stripes of tiny silver stars, is surrounded by wreaths of daisies with foliage, gracefully festooned at intervals. Low, round corsage. Puffed tulle bertha, dotted with daisies, and vine extending from the right shoulder to the girdle. Wreath of daisies with tendrils for coiffure. Another handsome evening silk, of an indescribable color, glimmers in the gaslight like a sheet of silver. The front width is flounced. An appliqué trimming, imported for this robe, extends from the belt down the sides and around the long trail.

A burnous of blue cashmere, at the same house, is surrounded with Persian fringe, and embroidered in the rich Persian colors.

The neat-fitting, seamless kid gloves have become very popular. The advantage of having but one long seam, that in which the thumb is set, is highly appreciated. They are handsomely stitched on the back, or laced together with cord and tassels through tiny silver eyelets. All the fashionable shades of brown and red are made for street dress, and a long white glove with fine buttons for evening wear. There are dog-skin, beaver, and castor gloves, double-stitched, with undressed kid gauntlets for riding, all fitting well, yet with no outside seams.

Parisian ladies are wearing brochette bracelets formed of chains or rings, whereto are appended small rings, bearing the orders and decorations of their husbands, of miniature size. Gold bands with ornaments of cut steel or of silver are worn as tiaras. Crests and monograms are mounted in jewels over the forehead. The large rings worn with sashes are adorned with arrows, keys, and charms of gilt. A great deal of French jewelry has been brought here this season. It is very pretty, and an excellent imitation of the real material, but has not been much worn because it is an imitation. The enameled wooden sets, brooch and ear-rings, are more popular for morning dress. A single daisy, a cluster of mignonnette, droll dogs' heads, and wise-looking mastiffs are most artistically carved in wood, and painted in rich enamel. Necklaces of velvet ribbon with velvet crosses attached are worn with surprise dresses.

A graceful new veil called the chignon partially covers the bonnet, droops over the chignon, and is tied beneath the chin. It is made of Chantilly net, with appliqué border.

PERSONAL.

SOME of the English papers say that Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH is coming to this country to reside. Mr. S.'s recent work on "Pym, Cromwell, and Pitt," published by the HARPERS, is one of those entertaining volumes of "personals" that afford pleasant topics for chat, and give an inside view of the way great men did things in the olden time.

That famous radical, HENRY WARD BEECHER, has subscribed one thousand dollars to the Southern educational fund for Washington College, Virginia. The memory of so graceful and liberal an investment will bring the most acceptable interest.

HENRY DRISLER, LL.D., editor of the American edition of Liddell and Scott's Greek Lexicon, has been appointed Jay Professor of the Greek Language and Literature in Columbia College, in place of the late Professor ANTHON.

If the cash arrangements can be satisfactorily arranged, a marriage will soon take place between the CROWN PRINCE of Holland and Princess FREDERICKA, eldest daughter of the ex-King of Hanover. It depends upon whether the Prussian Parliament ratifies the settlement made between King GEORGE and the King of Prussia. If every thing turns out nicely the lady will have a dowry of 2,000,000 thalers, with which she ought to be able to get on.

MADAME GUERRABELLA, an operatic artiste of the best sort, who has been living for three or four years at Fordham, has entirely recovered her voice, which was supposed to have gone forever. She is the daughter of Mr. WARD, and on the stage was noted not only for esprit but for the most perfectly lady-like, graceful manners.

VICTOR HUGO has within the last fifteen years accumulated and invested some $400,000. He asks half a million francs for his new romance, "Quatrevingt-treize," nearly completed, and has refused four hundred thousand, the sum paid for "Les Misérables." He said, recently, that in 1863 Paris booksellers offered him together several million francs for a series of novels, and that he might have easily earned that sum if he had cared more for money than reputation.

ADELINA PATTI is to be married at last. The happy man is the Marquis DE CAUX, an officer of LOUIS NAPOLEON's household. The songstress is a charming woman, was admirably brought up in the family of her sister, Mrs. STRAKOSCH, knows how to "keep house," and if DE C. is reasonably good will make his home delightful.

Of members of the present Congress Senator CONKLING is the best dressed. His wife is a sister of Governor SEYMOUR. Speaker COLFAX is said to be the most rapid talker ever heard at Washington. ELDRIDGE, of Wisconsin, never talks more than ten minutes, and is one of the most influential Democrats in the House. HOOPER, of Massachusetts, is said to give the best dinners of any man in Congress. General GARFIELD, of Ohio, has the strongest voice, LOGAN the loudest, COLFAX the deepest, THAD STEVENS the weakest, and BANKS and KELLY the stentorianest.

MISS EDMONIA LEWIS excites much interest abroad, not only from her cleverness in sculpture but from her parentage. She is petite, scarcely twenty-two, was born in Greenbush (opposite Albany), of Indian and negro parentage, and bears in her face the types of her origin. In her coarse but appropriate attire, with her black hair loose, and grasping in her tiny hand the chisel with which she does not disdain—perhaps with which she is obliged—to work, and with her large, black, sympathetic eyes brimful of simple, unaffected enthusiasm, Miss LEWIS is unquestionably the most interesting representative of our country in Europe. Interesting not alone because she belongs to a contemned and hitherto oppressed race, which labors under the imputation of artistic incapacity, but because she has already distinguished herself in sculpture—not perhaps in its highest grade, according to the accepted canons of the art, but in its naturalistic, not to say the most pleasing form.

MR. HEFORTH DIXON, who has told us so much about the Mormons and Shakers, is now bending his energies to a work on the position of women in particular sects and communities.

When JOSEPH BONAPARTE doffed his royalty and came to the United States, he little thought, on settling down at Bordentown, and building a beautiful mansion on the banks of the Delaware, and filling it with choice works of art, that in a few years, after the trees he had planted and the shrubbery he had so tastefully laid out had grown into their highest beauty, it would pass into the hands of a milkman for the inconsiderable sum of $12,000.

If the lady-skaters at Central Park would know what is considered the highest style of skating costume in Paris let them become perusive, and read as follows: Dress of black velvet, lined with violet satin and trimmed with chinchilla. This is covered with an elegant Polonoise, color Bismarck, also lined with violet satin. Thus enveloped a lady ought to skate at once into the affections of susceptible males. A Parisian countess originated the above.

The lady-readers of the Bazar who use COATES & Co.'s thread will drop a courtesy to the firm for having recently given two thousand dollars in aid of the freedmen of the South. Our "Amidon" is raised for the gentlemen.

MRS. MARY GRAY, of Greenup County, Kentucky, has been proved, in open court, to be one hundred and eighteen years old. And last week we read an account of the celebration of the nuptials of a blushing couple in Indiana, the groom being 76 and the bride 72. "No cards."

DR. BELJOWS has been out to Potsdam and peered into the palace of King WILLIAM. The little room in which his majesty does his sleeping is described as the most modest room in the palace, quite high up and commanding a view of the river and grounds sloping toward it. The king's bed was single, without posts, and made, like the other furniture, of a native wood. No well-to-do farmer could sleep on a plainer couch. Over the foot-board, in the little recess where it stood, was a small crucifix, and over the head-board a water-color drawing, "The Genius of Thought," a gift from the queen on occasion of their silver wedding. A copy of the head of RAVON's statue of Queen Louisa, his mother, was upon one table, and a bust of the queen upon another. On his writing-table, which seemed in constant use, was a small picture of Old Fritz, and all the implements upon it were military in their style, and cast from bullets or balls that had come from victorious battle-fields, and in the shape of cannon or stacked arms. On the whole, we calculate that most of the readers of the Bazar are about as well housed as his majesty.

THE PRINCE OF PRUSSIA, heir-apparent of the throne, is a good style of man personally and intellectually. His wife (VICTORIA, eldest daughter of the Queen of England) is a woman of special culture and of a practical turn of mind, though capable of literary conversation, and possessing marked skill with the pencil. She has six children already.

A St. Louis gentleman is blessed almost beyond measure in the number of his children. His name is PECK. Already ten Pecks (two bushels and a half) have been presented unto him, which ought to answer the purpose.

Whether Mr. S. S. Cox is appointed to the Austrian mission or not, go he will to Europe in a few weeks with his excellent wife, and enjoy a little leisure and a little of the handsome fortune which has recently come to Mrs. C. by inheritance.

Musical people, composers as well as vocalists, seem every where to be attaining higher social position. BERLIOZ, for example, who has just reached St. Petersburg, where he is to superintend six concerts for the imperial family, is the guest of the Grand Duchess HELENA, and has been assigned a suite of rooms in the Michael Palace. Fifty years ago royalty did not do that sort of thing. The sixth of the concerts is to be composed of the works of BERLIOZ himself.

Really, we should not have cared to be ELIZABETH VERONIQUE, who died last month in Paris. Think of a woman weighing 514 pounds! Why, every body laughed at her, as a matter of course, and made absurd remarks about her, and the ridiculous figure she must have cut when got up for a party! (514 pounds!—bless us!)

FELICITA VESTALI, "the magnificent," as she is called, from the splendor of her physique, is a member of an old aristocratic family, being the daughter of Count PERULOWSKI, who was married to CHARLOTTE, BARONESS HUNEFELDT. FELICITA was born in 1841, has been highly educated, and, having a passion for operatic fame, took to the stage, and has since then performed pretty much every where, where they have theatres and operas.

MR. A. H. LEE, the gentleman who drew the Crosby Opera House at Chicago, is occupying himself by getting together what he intends shall be the best private library in the United States.

The writing-men of New York will be pleased, if the report should turn out to be true, that Mr. RYAN, formerly on the editorial staff of the Herald, has fallen heir to $300,000.

BISHOP SELWYN, recently translated from the colonial see of New Zealand to the see of Litchfield, was loth to make the change, and did so at last only at the personal request of, and after a long interview with, the Queen. He is not only a man of marked ability and energy, but is understood to be decidedly in favor of severing the union between the Church and State. There are seven of the English (home) bishops who are with him on that point.

The immediate cause of the recent proceedings in England for bigamy against Sir EARLEY EARLEY was that the silly man, after having given his wife a deed of separation in 1863, got married again last September. The father of the first wife is Mr. M'GER, British Consul at Mobile, who brings suit to vindicate the honor of his daughter. The scape-grace young baronet has always been a disreputable fellow, and will doubtless soon have a new experience in the pleasures of "transportation."

As a physiological item it may be well enough to say that chirrupy old Mrs. CHRISTINA BAROLAY, whose brief candle of life "out"-ed a few days since in Kentucky, after she had numbered fivescore and two years, was sufficiently nimble on her hundredth birthday to lead off in a dance. But an older than she is extant in Virginia—a colored woman named JASTER, who on the tally-stick of life has already scored one hundred and ten years.

Young Lord AMBERLEY, who will be Earl RUSSELL, so far from coming over here to "carry on," as most young English lordlings do, appeared to do his best to become thoroughly acquainted with our civil and social ways of doing things. Lord A. has contributed several papers to the Fortnightly Review on Conservatives and Liberals in relation to the Church of England, making suggestions in regard to its improvement. He was in this country four months, and he and Lady AMBERLEY, a daughter of Lord STANLEY, of Alderley, made many friends wherever they went. They sailed for England on Christmas-day.

LOUIS NAPOLEON does a little something every day in the editorial way, and sends it promptly at 1 o'clock to the Moniteur. By 2 o'clock 100,000 copies are ready for sale in the streets of Paris, and by 4 o'clock double that number are sold. In the evenings he gives more or less time to perusing the "Book of the Four Kings," dwelling principally upon that part which relates to the great contest between Draw and Poker. L. N. is reported to be well up in D. P.

"POOR CARLOTTA" is not to be left in pecuniary destitution. The Austrian Government has formally recognized her as universal legatee of MAXIMILIAN, and preserves, with her dowry, the palace of Miramar and the Island of Lacroia. So the poor ex-empress is comfortably provided for so far as mere worldly goods are concerned. She was MAX's good genius, his best counselor, his courageous and most devoted wife—an empress of empresses.

Mons. ALEXANDRE DUMAS must be what Connecticut people call "a good feeling man." In a recent essay on the regeneration of modern society he says: "I feel myself young, rich, happy, prodigal. Let any one have need of me and he shall see. I find every thing which God has made superb and wonderful. I should like to take immensity into my arms."

The Ex-Queen of Spain, CHRISTINA, is a Yankee among the has-beens of royalty, and is one of the heaviest tax-payers of France, where she owns several hundred thousand acres, a dozen chateaux, and three large manufacturing establishments. Not being sure of her crown, but wishing to be sure of her crows, she shrewdly invested all her savings in other countries than Spain, and consequently is now one of the most really well-to-do women in Europe.

Senator POMEROY, of Arkansas, is emulous of the fame of SILAS WRIGHT as a farmer. Not long since a gentleman saw him hauling lumber in Kansas with a mule-team. He took pride in showing a fifty-two-acre field of wheat which had been plowed in by the Senatorial hands.

Pompadour Basque Waist.

See illustration, page 196.

This waist is of muslin, guipure insertion four-fifths of an inch wide, guipure edging three-fifths of an inch wide, small needle-work rosettes edged with lace, and blue ribbon one and two inches in width. Cut from the muslin from Fig. 7 one piece, from Fig. 8 two pieces, from Fig. 9 one piece, and from Fig. 10 the sleeve lappets. Lay the bosom pleats in the front (Fig. 8), and join the fronts and back to correspond with the figures on the pattern; and arrange the insertion and ribbon in the manner shown in the illustration, taking care to fasten the insertion in such a manner that the muslin can be cut away from under it. With the ribbon make short loops at the top, and long loops with ends at the bottom of the waist. Put on the frilled edging, the rosettes, and the bows of narrow ribbon. Lay a strip of muslin doubled along the edge of the left front, sew small buttons thereon, and cover it with blue ribbon, making corresponding loops on the right side. The sleeves consist of a strip of muslin, about three-quarters of a yard long and four inches wide, puffed and confined by a band of insertion and edging, with a lappet, similarly trimmed, and a ribbon bow on the top.

Scarf Pelerine.

See illustration, page 196.

This pelerine is of white poplin cashmere, wadded, and lined with silk. Cut of the outside, wadding, interlining, and lining, from Fig. 43 each two pieces, and from Fig. 44 one piece. Baste the wadding between the interlining and lining, and quilt it in diamonds. Then baste on the outside, and join Figs. 43 and 44 from 31 to 32. Run the edges of the stuff together, and put on the trimming as seen in the illustration: this consists of a bias strip of silk, two inches wide, doubled and corded on either side with white silk. The pelerine is closed up the front with three rosettes of cashmere leaves, with a button in the centre.

Pompadour Waist with Bretelles.

See illustration, page 196.

This waist is of muslin, Valenciennes edging an inch and an inch and a half in width, and needle-work insertion, and is finished in front with a bow of pink ribbon. Cut the two fronts from Fig. 15, allowing an inch for the hem, and the back from Fig. 16. Hem the fronts, and put on the buttons and button-holes; sew the bosom pleats; make a seam in the back from 31 to 32, and join the back and fronts on the shoulders from 35 to 36. Arrange the Valenciennes lace, which must be whole on the shoulders, in the manner shown in the illustration, and hem the neck narrow. Trim the front with a strip of narrow lace, sewed together in the middle, and slightly frilled, and cover this seam with needle-work insertion. The back is trimmed down the middle in the same manner. The bretelles are made of lace, bordered on one side with small, and on the other with narrow edging, with needle-work insertion covering the seams through the middle. Join the back and fronts from 33 to 34, and set a double band on the bottom of the waist. Cover this waist-band with pink satin ribbon, with a bow of the same on the front and back.

The sleeves are cut from Fig. 17, and are trimmed with narrow lace and needle-work insertion in the manner shown in the illustration, the muslin being cut away under the lace.

Safety Pocket.

See illustration, page 196.

This pocket is an excellent protection against thieves, who can not readily pick it without the knowledge of the wearer. It is made in the same manner as an ordinary pocket, except about one-third longer. A band is sewed above this third part, and through the shir this formed a strong elastic braid is run, just long enough to permit the hand to pass through tightly, after which the ends of the braid are sewed together.

Lady's Low-Necked Under-Waist.

See illustration, page 196.

This waist is of silk, lined with muslin, and completed by means of a Russian chemise, formed of pleated muslin, bordered with guipure insertion and edging. A narrow black velvet ribbon is run through the insertion and tied in a bow. The waist may also be made of plain muslin. Cut first the fronts and side-pieces from Figs. 54 and 55, the back from Fig. 56, and the sleeves from Fig. 57. Baste the outside and lining together, lay the bosom pleats, join the back, side-pieces, and fronts, and put on the hooks and eyes. Cord the waist round the edge; sew up the sleeves from 58 to 54, and set them in the arm-holes with a cord. Lastly, trim the waist with guipure edging.

Bandeau of Ribbon and Application.

See illustration, page 196.

The illustration shows a section of this bandeau of the full size. The original is of lilac ribbon; the application pansies are embroidered in satin stitch, with fillole or crochet silk on silk, and worked round the edge in fine button-hole stitch, as a matter of course choosing the colors truest to nature. The embroidered figures are then cut out and sewed on the bandeau. Either satin or silk ribbon may be used.

Fan.

See illustration, page 196.

The pretty fan, the pattern of which we give, can easily be made by any lady over a frame that has already been used. The frame of the original is of ivory, with a covering of white silk embroidered in point-russe with fine black silk. The opened fan gives a part of the covering together with the design. The covering is prepared of the requisite size of white silk. Two similar pieces are required, each ornamented with point-russe embroidery, and so pasted on the frame that the ribs lie between the double material. Narrow Chantilly lace may be sewed on the border. A white silk cord with tassels is fastened on, as shown in the engraving given. On this cord is fastened a ring of threefold twist of white silk gimp cord. This ring is pushed up over the fan, in order to prevent its opening and becoming broken when not in use. Colored silk may also be used.

Dress with Bodice for Young Lady.

See illustration, page 197.

The original is of gray poplin, trimmed with black velvet, and fringed in the manner shown in the illustration. The belt is also of black velvet. The pattern of the bodice, which is lined with muslin, is given in Figs. 18 and 19. As the engraving shows, it is worn over a high-necked white waist.

Neckerchief with Belt.

See illustration, page 197.

This pretty kerchief is of violet cashmere, thinly wadded and lined with white silk. It is trimmed round the edge with narrow violet and white silk braid, at a little distance from which is set a bias fold of black silk; narrow black and white gimp is laid along the middle of the latter, and stitched on with it, leaving the edges of the fold free. Cut the outside and lining of the fronts from Fig. 45, and the back whole from Fig. 46; the belt forms a part of the latter, and fastens in front, being lengthened at the sides to fit the wearer. Join the fronts and back to correspond with the figures on the pattern, put on the bias fold, run the edges together, and set the braid round the edge. The belt is fastened in front with a bow and ends of violet cashmere.

Lady's Quilted Silk Boot.

See illustration, page 197.

This warm and comfortable boot may be worn with a morning toilette, or is well adapted to carriage wear. The original is of lilac silk, wadded, and lined with cashmere, and quilted in diamonds. The sole is of frieze, covered with oil-cloth. The upper edge of the boot is trimmed with a strip of fur about an inch and a half wide. Cut from Fig. 20, of silk wadding and lining each two pieces, making the necessary allowance for seams; lay the wadding between the outside and the lining, and quilt all three together. Sew the halves of the boot together from the toe to 44, from 44 to the top each edge is bound with braid. Sew the boot together also in the back. Set a piece for button-holes along the right front of the boot; for this, bind the outside and lining with braid, make the button-holes, and sew it under the binding of the boot; then put buttons to correspond on the left side, as seen in the illustration. Bind the top of the boot, put on the fur trimming and join it to the sole, which is cut in one piece from Fig. 21. The frieze and oil-cloth of the sole must first be bound together. To set the sole on the boot, which must be done according to the figures on the pattern, turn the boot wrong side out, press the sole inward, bend the under edge of the boot about two-fifths of an inch outward, so that the sole lies on it flat, and back-stitch this edge to the sole. After which turn the boot again on the right side.

Jacket for Child from 2 to 3 Years old.

See illustration, page 197.

This jacket is of light gray flannel, bordered with a strip of red flannel an inch and a quarter wide, on which narrow black velvet is sewn, in the manner shown in the illustration. Small mother-of-pearl buttons complete the trimming of the jacket. Cut both fronts from Fig. 49, the left only to the dotted line, and the back whole from Fig. 50. Cut the sleeves from Fig. 51, taking care to observe the contour of the under part; the cuffs from Fig. 52; and the pocket lapel from Fig. 53. Join the fronts and back according to the figures on the pattern, bind the jacket with the aforesaid strip of red flannel, and put on the velvet. Trim the pocket lapel, and sew it along the dotted line on the right front. Sew up the sleeves from 41 to 42, and from 42 to 43; put on the cuffs, sew them in the arm-holes from 44 to 44, and cover the seam with a bias strip of red flannel double about an inch wide, on which two rows of narrow velvet are then sewn. Hooks and loops complete the jacket.

Gored Flannel Under-Skirt.

See illustration, page 197.

This under-skirt is of white flannel, scalloped round the bottom with red worsted, and also embroidered in point russe with the same material. For this skirt cut from Figs. 1 and 3 each one breadth, and from Fig. 3 the two side breadths, being careful to add the pieces turned down in the pattern of all these breadths. Sew up the breadths to correspond with the figures on the pattern, face the bottom with a strip of flannel two inches wide, and embroider as shown in the illustration. Make a slit in the middle of the back from 6 to X along the double line, and face the edges with muslin. Gather the top from the middle of the back to 3 on each side, and set it in the double muslin belt cut from Fig. 4. A button and button-hole complete the skirt.

Bodice with Lappets.

See illustration, page 197.

This bodice is made of narrow silk braid, notched on the edges and studded with beads, black watered ribbon an inch and a half wide, black lace two and four inches wide, studded with beads, jet buttons, and jet cloths. For the bodice, first cut a foundation of stiff lace from Fig. 18, two pieces for the fronts, and from Fig. 19 one piece for the back. Join the back and fronts to correspond with the figures on the pattern, and lay the bosom pleats. Having thus obtained the shape, arrange the braid thereon in the manner shown in the illustration along the dotted lines; fasten them where they intersect each other. Bind the upper part with narrow watered ribbon edged with narrow lace; and cover the seam with the bead braid. Finish the arm-holes in a similar manner, and set on broad lace. Set the bottom in a double belt of watered ribbon an inch and a half wide, covered with broad black lace, and sew the bead braid over the seam. Fasten to the belt lappets of watered ribbon, half a yard long and an inch and a half wide; point the ends of the same and trim them with gretots; sew the bead braid along the edges, and set jet buttons at the top of the lappets and at the place where they cross each other. Fasten the belt with hooks and eyes, covered with a rosette of the watered ribbon, an inch wide, dotted on the edge with beads.

THE GHOSTLY TEARS.

STILL go and come, and come and go,
Along Life's paths the ghostly Tears;
Forever pacing, fast or slow;
Now stayed by hopes, now sped by fears.
They hasten through the sunlit mead;
They loiter on the barren lea;
They halt where we beseech them speed,
And where we beg them stay, they flee.

No vision of a fevered dream,
Where spectral shapes flit to and fro,
More brief, yet strangely long may seem
Than these weird Tears that come and go.

We hail their glories as they rise;
We catch the promise of their dawn;
We cry: "The noon shall flush our skies
At last!" and lo! the days are gone!

So by these fond, phantasmal hopes
Still beckoned onward, we descend,
From year to year, Life's darkening slopes,
Till Death's wan finger writes—"The End!"

Yet Death but keeps the warder's gate
Upon the everlasting shore
Whose vast effulgence, consecrate,
The phantom Tears may mock no more!

LUMPKIN PAPERS.

A HEAVY, rustling, overbearing, aggressive, shining, purple silk, scenting of operas, lace shawls, and chandeliers! Naturally it was not well out of its wrapper when it began to bully us—that is, my wife, Mrs. Pleiades Lumpkin, and I. What, indeed, could such a silk be to a house with a three-ply carpet and an unmistakable flavor of dinner in its best room but an insult, in-silkate?

Why did Mrs. Lumpkin buy it? The Bazar, being a feminine oracle, may divine. For my own part, I have never yet succeeded in resolving a woman's "because" into any thing like a reason. From my view nothing could have been more inappropriate. When the makers of that silk laid the threads together and chose the tints, doubtless they had the wearer in mind—a round, rosy dame, stepping down from her coach with an air and a train. Apart from the facts of our little house, its "three-ply" and hair-cloth furniture, is Mrs. Pleiades that woman? On the contrary, she is an anxious woman. She has careful lines about the mouth, come of helping me in that long pull and strong pull needed to make both ends of our income meet. She has neither the roses, the swing, nor the plump contours. If she were a book her title would be "Thoughts on Pennyworths." You see then that whenever she wore it, this opulent silk must be a sly and constant satire upon her.

I have been speaking only of the silk in the raw, as it lay yet in its wrappings. Now it is true that it convicted us, whenever we looked at it, of our utter shabbiness. Still we had it then at a certain disadvantage. Mrs. Pleiades could do what she liked with it—make it into a coverlet if she pleased, and leave it to flout our imitation walnut bedstead and brown wall-paper. But for silks as for human beings there is no standing still. Following the lead of its destiny it must develop into a dress. From that moment it began to require:

First, a dress-maker. Mrs. Pleiades habitually made her own dresses; but from the very beginning it was so evident that she had nothing in common with her silk that she engaged a dress-maker without delay. The dress-maker was a great creature. She took my wife's measure—I mean her social measure—at a glance. She handled "the silk" audaciously, and threw my wife into an agony by suggesting that the pattern was short. She was a perfect Nena Sahib in our little domicile. She destroyed our petty illusions, and our modest aspirations, with a certain pleasure worthy of that monster. She would talk to us, poor minnows, of nothing but whales. She roused Mrs. Pleiades to a maddening envy of certain ladies whom she had never seen in her life. Finally she decreed that the dress should be piped, and trimmed with satin and lace.

Piped! Mrs. Pleiades came to me about it. My notion was of some such subterranean network as is under the pavements, a substitute for crinoline, perhaps, or something just discovered to be healthy.

"What are the pipes made for?" I asked in all innocence; "and won't they be weighty to carry about, my dear?"

And I protest I never was so astonished as when Mrs. Pleiades flew out in a rage, and vowed "that I had no sympathy, and was laughing at her."

The dress was piped out of our little fund in bank. Mrs. Pleiades had not once thought of trimmings. She had achieved the silk by months of clipping shillings here and hoarding pennies there: it was the one blossom of her self-denial. There was nothing left for leaves and buds. Nena Sahib scouted Mrs. Pleiades's timid suggestions of trimming with the silk, or of no trimming; and we were always at the disadvantage with this dress that we should have been with a white elephant or a fairy unexpectedly quartered upon us. Knowing nothing of the habits of the animal, we must believe whatever was told us concerning it.

So the dress was piped, and besprinkled with velvet and lace, and when Nena Sahib was paid also, it became clear that I should wear my old over-coat this winter. But who would not forego a new over-coat for the pleasure of teaching his wife a lesson?

A dress finished is like the child come to man's estate. You know then where to rank it. Mrs. Pleiades's silk had become a dinner-dress. But Mrs. Pleiades lays the cloth, broils the steak, and bakes the bread herself. Could Mrs. Pleiades broil and bake in a purple silk, piped and trimmed with satin? Or could Mrs. Pleiades, having dished the dinner in a calico, rush to her wardrobe and array herself in the purple silk, while the gravy cooled, and I thumped on the table? Or could Mrs. Pleiades wear the purple silk when she took her sewing of an evening across the way, or when "across the way" came over to us? No, a thousand times no! You may take liberties with an alpaca; there is adaptability in a merino; but it was not to be expected that Mrs. Pleiades's silk should conform to us. We were to conform to the silk. It was made for grand occasions. We were to manufacture the grand occasions. For people of our stamp there is but one grand occasion, and that is going to church.

But to what shall I liken this insatiable silk? It was like the relentless step-mother in the fairy tales. When the poor child has wound the tangled skein as thick as four persons, she must separate in their order thousands of mixed feathers, and when the feathers are in order she must find strawberries under the ice. One difficulty only hid another behind it. What should Mrs. Pleiades wear with the purple silk? Mrs. Pleiades has worn her cloak for three winters, and it is brown. Mrs. Pleiades's bonnet is two winters old, and it is green; and I think I have already hinted that we had exhausted our fund in bank.

Those were days of trial for Mrs. Pleiades. If wishing were a power, the brown cloak and green bonnet must have turned purple under our eyes. She ransacked the trunks and rag-bags; she pored over the fashion-plates; she shut herself up of evenings. I, on my part, watched her struggles with solicitude, and blindly rejoiced when informed that she had an idea. In all our wedded life I had never seen Mrs. Pleiades so careworn and harassed.

My wife has always been a model of punctuality. At precisely a quarter of ten she is ready to start for church. But on this Sunday—I am referring to the first appearance of the purple silk—she was late. She came down in a flustered state, and rather avoided my eyes as we went out of the door. I respected her nervousness, and talked about the weather; and it was only by degrees, and after quiet glances from under my hat-brim, that I came to a definite conclusion regarding her appearance.

Something had happened to Mrs. Pleiades's cloak. It had always been a large, matronly, cozy wrap, the sort of cloak for which you might feel an actual friendship, and by which you might know Mrs. Pleiades any where; and in my secret heart I had always fancied that she produced in it a majestic and imposing effect. Now it was short, it had sleeves, it had shrunken in about her. It looked as if, stricken with sudden terror by the purple silk, it had attempted to end its wretched existence, and only stopped in the mad attempt just below Mrs. Pleiades's waist. The effect was disastrous. Mrs. Pleiades is accustomed to fullness and folds about the shoulders, and in her skimpy and diminished condition was plainly at a loss how to dispose of her hands and arms. She was equally troubled with her train! Worthy woman, what had she to do with trains? She was doubtful about the gorgeous silk among the sober walking-dresses around her. She wondered what people said of her brown cloak and green bonnet. She wished that her gloves were fresher, and that they were not black. If she had committed murder, she could hardly have looked more conscious and uncomfortable. Mrs. Pleiades's savings, our fund in bank, her anxieties, researches, and struggles, had only made her ridiculous and uncomfortable.

You think, my dear Madam, that I had better have listened to the sermon than to sit there poking fun at my wife? But I was not poking fun. I was pondering, as became a philosopher, on one of the deepest mysteries in the feminine make-up. Mrs. Pleiades is a fair example, not a notable exception, to the rest of womankind. Plenty of women there are like her, for whom, given a merino, and the result is happiness; given a silk, and the result is misery. Why will nine out of ten of such women choose the silk? I am convinced, by wretched experiences, that there is some perverse domestic demon who breaks the bottle in the medicine-chest that is to be wanted next in the middle of the night, and keeps the trunk in which are the children's night-clothes when part of your baggage is left behind. Can there be a similar shopping-demon, airily promenading beside the walking clerks, and maliciously deciding the wavering woman in the plain shawl and the puzzled, apple-cheeked country girl secretly counting her money under the shelter of a pile of cloakings?

This reminds me of Cousin Berinthia. When Cousin Berinthia was in town she informed us that, before shopping, she should first take a stroll through Broadway.

"The fashions that we get in periodicals," she remarked, complacently, "are European, and American ladies may or may not adopt them. But what one sees worn in New York one can believe in; and I see no reason why, by using your eyes, a girl in Marlborough may not exhibit as much style as one on Broadway," concluded Berinthia, reddening in a way that showed that one girl from Marlborough would achieve "style" or perish in the attempt.

But Cousin Berinthia strolled through Broadway in those early autumn days in which slender young ladies were to be seen flitting in and out of up-town worsted stores, in striped petticoats and a hint at an upper-skirt that came short of the knee. Here were fashions at once charming and economical; and how Mrs. Pleiades and Berinthia did chatter! Berinthia had a striped petticoat, a gray sacque, and only a few dollars in her small porte-monnaie. They cheapened, they made the tour of the sales-rooms, they bought the Bazar; and nobody whispered to Berinthia that these were the pleasant and gracious days, and these the young ladies who would be found at church in velvet coats, and next week would be met in a Bismarck walking-suit, and next week in winsey, and in mid-winter would astonish Berinthia, if she could see them, with a Russian pelisse.

The result—no doubt you have divined it already from that hint about the sacque and petticoat. Give a lady a stripe, and she will give you the costume as readily as Agassiz will tell you a beast from one of his bones. But I, having no such inner light—I confess that I was agast when Cousin Berinthia stood at last before me in a gray and white skirt, a gray silk waistband, a gray sacque, and a jaunty gray felt hat. Very pretty, no doubt, and becoming for running about in worsted stores; though Berinthia, being a simple-minded girl, was evidently uncomfortable under a secret conviction that she was running about in her petticoat! But what a costume for Marlborough! Fancy Berinthia riding five miles to church over the snow, in the teeth of the fierce wind that comes down the gorge in her little sacque and petticoat, and with nothing about her ears! Picture her walking up the aisle with the farmers staring on one side and big-bonneted women peering on the other, and all wondering "how she could have forgotten her dress when she was coming to meeting?" Could any thing be more absurdly melancholy unless it should be the spectacle of Cousin Berinthia walking about on Monday morning among the wash-tubs with a train on her calico dress, or the reflection that Berinthia had hopelessly mangled her sensible sacque with sundry points, and dents, and tabs, already as obsolete as the ark?

Did I say these things to Berinthia? Certainly not, my dear madam. Should I send her home to Marlborough with a painful doubt ranking somewhere under the gray silk waistband? But I felt that sudden and violent indignation to which lethargic and quiet people like myself are occasionally subject—indignation against your—I beg your pardon, I mean your next neighbor's deity, Fashion. "Why," I said to myself, in a fine moral fume, "when points and scallops are as dew on the grass, and long tabs in extraordinary places are a delusion and a snare, and freaks of all kinds are simply the foam on fashion's tumbling wave, why should fashion insist on their adoption by young females like Berinthia who can expect but one suit a winter? By what right does her goddess-ship demand that Berinthia's one dress shall be of a color which will offer the most maddening temptations to spots, and why should this one dress be cut in a fashion that will make it wholly useless next year? If there are three new styles each month, each warranted to cut costly and handsome goods in smaller pieces than the other, shall there be no medium between these and dowdiness, the daughter of Economy?

Now I have always observed that if you begin a course of reflections on any subject, say fish-hooks, that your subject grows with marvelous rapidity. You discover, still talking of fish-hooks, that there are communities of people who are busy all their lives about nothing but fish-hooks; and from this you go on to so many more discoveries about the analogies in fish-hooks, the skill, triumphs, failures, treacheries, palpitations, and earnestness exerted in making and selling them, that fish-hooks begin to occupy for you a large place in creation; and you find yourself unable to withstand a secret suspicion that if the matter were properly investigated a fish-hook would be found in the mouth of every thing.

Just so, in my reveries on the tyranny of fashion; I touched and traced up so many connecting links between her despotism and social and political vexations, that I began to fancy Berinthia, in her poor, little, shivering petticoat, the embodiment of two or three of the questions of the day. I knew that satirists and reformers, even while they railed at this vexatious deity, declared in the same breath the hopelessness of their railing; but if a shepherd overthrew the dynasties of Egypt, and a brewer revolutionized England, and a candle-maker made Rome tremble, why should not I, plain Pleiades Lumpkin, at least try my luck? The bramble hedge opens of itself, you know, for the true fairy prince. Why should not my earnest and thoughtful papers attract the attention of solid and thoughtful men, who should recommend them to their wives, who should be conscience-stricken and speak of the matter to their friends, who should turn over a new leaf with their dress-makers, who should inaugurate a social reform, which should be commemorated on my tombstone, which should annually be kept so deep in laurel that you could not see the inscription, by thousands of grateful women, especially country women, who should visit my tomb before going to the Central Park?

I am a cautious man, however. The vision was dazzling, but before commencing the earnest and thoughtful papers, I felt that I should make sure of the proofs of this tyranny, under which Mrs. Pleiades must be ridiculous and Berinthia chilly all winter. I devoted a day to the purpose. I intended to see with my own eyes the ladies in petticoats, like Berinthia the stores in which, as Mrs. Pleiades said, "there was nothing pretty that was cheaper than silk;" the furnishing establishments in which were no hint of anything to cover the head; in a word, all the abominations under which women are groaning, and I looked savagely at the pretty Bazar, which has seduced my wife from her allegiance to the other periodicals, and which is four times worse than them all, being a weekly instead of a monthly pest.

What did I mean to do with these things when I had seen them? Do them in an article, my dear, like Thackeray's enemy—grilled and with Cayenne sauce; and I looked about in an ogreish way for the ladies first.

I looked, but I did not find them. The ladies not only wore skirts, but two of them; and they were wrapped to the chin. I saw no Berinthia any where. Poor Berinthia! yes, and poor Lumpkin, for here was the head, the beginning of my article, which I had already elaborated, taken away from me. I could not commence with a stinging delineation of Berinthia, as I had intended, for here were no Berinthias. I do not know why; but I suddenly remembered the story of the man who ran a mile with a pail of water to put out a fire, and found that his neighbor was only burning a brush-heap; and I don't know why again, but it provoked me to remember it, and the more I tried to forget the more I remembered; so that I had nearly asked the clerk for brush instead of serviceable walking-goods, "or were there no such goods?" I added, with a fine sneer.

On the contrary, they had a large assortment. There were serges. There were winseys at a dollar and upward a yard—would bear the test of all weathers, and very stylish when made. There was ladies' cloth, a yard and a half wide, two dollars a yard, much used for walking-suits. There was—

I believe that the fellow would have continued his "there was" to this day if I would have listened to him. I believe that he knew that it plagued me, and took delight in doing it. I shall always detest that store! and that smiling clerk! And for patience! Would you be patient if you had discovered a crying evil, and the remedy, and fine things to say about it; and then should be convinced by a monotonous clerk, with his "there was," that your crying evil did not exist?

Still I am not easily discouraged, and, like old Mother Hubbard, I went to a furnishing store and "supposed" across the counter "that they had nothing but round velvet dishes or triangles for the tops of the heads of young girls in the country."

The milliner gave a suppressed giggle, brought out a little cherry hood, tied it around her own fresh face, and directly looked bewitching.

"Ladies in the country generally insist on city fashions," said my pretty little friend in the hood; "but here, as you see, is a hood, and they are so becomingly made that they are quite as pretty as a bonnet. This, you see, is in merino—two colors; and you observe this pointed cape, exactly fitting and comfortably covering the shoulders. This came from Paris; but they are made also in tannet, silk, or velvet. How old is the young lady?"

"The young lady would freeze her ears, or sit with them of a fine beet-color as many hours as you please, rather than wear any thing so pretty and so sensible," I answered, tartly; for in that sentence I said good-by to my earnest and thoughtful papers.

It is not the Fashion, but the Ladies, who are in need of reformation. Mrs. Pleiades and Berinthia had peeped into half the shops in New York; and Mrs. Pleiades had inflicted on herself that purple silk agony, and Berinthia had gone home in her petticoat—why, I ask again? Let a stronger and braver man than I answer if he can.

ONLY ONE.

TEN aside to give her passage, in the city's crowded way:
Only one of many thousands we are passing every day.

Is there something in her vesture, poor but neat, her modest mien,
Differing from the struggling masses every where around us seen?

Fie! 'tis but an idle fancy of a shrinking form more frail,
Or the drooping of an eyelid on a cheek more thin and pale.

It were easy romance-weaving, would we give such folly way,
Musing thus on one of thousands, met, forgotten, day by day.

Yet 'tis strange and sad, I grant you, human hearts can grow so cold
As to read, without a quiver, all the story daily told.

In the mournful eye uplifted, mute, appealing to our own;
In the weary step that falters; in the heart-revealing tone;

In the lips that close so firmly, smothering down the frequent sigh
Of some burdened fellow-creature, whom we pass unnoticed by.

Oh, the weary round of labor, with so little change or cheer!
Oh, the thought that no one pities the slow-falling, bitter tear!

Oh, the longing for the sunshine that a smile on life would shed!
Oh, the hunger for caresses, that is keener than for bread!

Not for such among the thousands as she, gone a moment hence,
Is the need of food or raiment, or the grudging dole of pence,

As the word of fellow-feeling, or the kind, considerate care,
That admits the equal spirit to an equal right and share.

In life's hopes and aspirations, and its needs so many fold,
Which to us God never measures by our gain or loss of gold.

MRS. TYPESET'S DIARY.

Tuesday Eve.—We were chatting around a cozy fire this evening, when Uncle Fred, who notices some trifling changes in New York and its customs after his six years' absence, remarked: "I perceive it is quite the common practice for gentlemen to retain their seats in the cars even when there are ladies standing."

"The ladies have taught gentlemen to do so," said I, "some ladies, at least; apt scholars they found—less than 'six easy lessons' needed—lessons not quickly forgotten. However, I need not complain, for in truth it is the rarest thing in the world for me not to receive the offer of a seat, even when the cars are full. But Aunt Anne told me I should be 'reported' because I thanked the gentleman who gave me his seat to-day! For my part I always feel, if I get into a crowded car, that I should expect to stand, and if a gentleman offers me his seat I regard it as a courtesy—a gift for which I am grateful, for it is very tiresome to stand during a long ride."

"You have given the clew," replied Uncle Fred, "to your receiving the attention—you don't regard it as one of your rights, and don't appear to demand it, probably. In general I like to give a lady my seat. But when a smart, strong, pert individual bustles in, looking better able to stand than most gentlemen, and she gives a withering stare at each one of the male sex in particular, and at all in general, as much as to say, 'Why don't you all get up?' Why—well—I very seldom see her!"

"An incident occurred in the car as I came up town to-night," interposed Mr. Typeset at this point. "Of course the car was crowded. A lady, or what looked like one, got into the car. Gentleman rose and offered his seat; lady (?) dropped into it, as if it were her special-bought-and-paid-for 'reserved seat,' made not the slightest acknowledgment, didn't even look at the donor. Presently another lady entered; another gentleman offered his seat, which was accepted with a bright, grateful glance, and a pleasant 'Thank you!' Gentleman No. 1 looked envious, felt he had been defrauded, pondered the matter a few moments, leaned across intervening standers, and touched Gentleman No. 2 on the shoulder. 'I say,' said he, in lieu of more formal introduction. Gentleman No. 2 turned, inquiringly. 'I congratulate you,' said No. 1. 'What for?' said No. 2. 'Because you have given your seat to a lady.' No. 2 bowed, with a slightly surprised air. 'And have been thanked for it,' continued No. 1, warming with his subject. 'Ladies do occasionally ride in the Sixth Avenue cars, I am happy to say,' responded Gentleman No. 2, as if to close the conversation, for sundry blushes on fair cheeks in the vicinity indicated an appreciative audience. No. 1 was not to be easily put down. 'You are fortunate,' he began; but just at this juncture I left the car, and think the unfortunate first-mentioned lady would have been glad to leave also."

"The rough points in human nature come out in the cars," said Uncle Fred, meditatively. "Gentlemen are rude—contradictory terms, rather—because ladies are impolite, and vice versa. A little more oil on the wheels would make the machinery of life run much more smoothly."

January 1, 1868.—Gone, quite gone, is the dear old year! I am listening to the faint echoes of the departing footsteps of 1867! I know it is quite the fashion to look coldly on the old man when December snows have whitened his locks, and his days are short and sunless. But I have an affection for old friends—I love them for what they have been, even when time changes them. So, with a lingering regret I bid farewell to 1867. Yet always the New Year comes, nodding and smiling, bringing glad wishes, and bidding us peep—if we can—into that unrevealed future which to our vision is so bright and glowing.

The fashion of making New-Year's calls is a very pleasant one; but, really, it is of no use to pretend that this has been a pleasant day to make calls. Dreadfully dismal has it been without—snow, and rain, and wind have seemed to combine to render atmosphere and streets disagreeable. There have been fewer calls than usual. Gentlemen felt that the weather—which has been the common topic of conversation to-day—was really a good excuse for delinquencies. Those who have braved the elements, however, have been uncommonly cheerful and chatty in spite of dripping umbrellas and spotted kid gloves.

Thursday.—Some of the foreign papers have special and peculiar departments which are novel and amusing to American readers. For example, a London newspaper for ladies has what is called "The Exchange," which affords a medium for effecting an exchange of various articles between parties who happen to want something they have not more than something which they have. The articles offered are restricted by certain rules. I am often amused in looking over this page. Here are a few extracts:

"I wish to exchange a pebble bracelet, set in silver, for a piece of work for a sofa cushion."

"I have a very handsome Bird of Paradise, suitable for a hat, which I wish to exchange for a new seal-skin hat, not round, or a piece of seal-skin large enough to make a hat."

"I want a very small dog of the Prince Charles breed or toy terrier, about 5 pounds in weight. I can offer jewelry, lace, and many other things, of which I will send a list."

"I have a handsome ivory flute in rosewood case, a long-haired fox muff, and an Astrakhan muff, both as though just from the shop. In exchange I should like a photographic album, or any thing useful in a house."

"I wish to get a considerable quantity of wide gold braid, also narrow, and fringe of the same; it need not be new; also some strings of large white beads. What will any one take in exchange for these?"

Four or five columns of similar specimens make quite a show of articles of almost every kind.

A pleasant little incident is related of Dickens at one of his readings in London. In the midst of a droll passage he stopped abruptly, caught up the glass of water on his desk, hurried to the edge of the stage, and handed it down, exclaiming to an usher, "Here, Peak, quick, a lady is fainting!" And as the pretty, pale girl was taken out he looked after her with an expression of fatherly solicitude so different from his stage manner that we caught a glimpse of the real man, and gave him a hearty round of applause, for that little bit of nature pleased every one.

A Western paper tells a story of a little child which narrowly escaped death last week. It had, baby-like, picked up a piece of green-enameled card, and was vigorously chewing it when discovered. The card was highly poisonous, but, fortunately, the child had swallowed so much of it that it acted as an emetic, and thus its life was saved. Parents can not be too careful what they allow their children to play with. Between the painted poisons which little ones suck from toys and candies, and the prepared poisons which are medically administered, the wonder is that so many live, in spite of all.

As a general rule mothers may be sure that their little children will not fret and cry if they are well and comfortably cared for. Many mothers and nurses seem to have the idea that babies fret because they like to—or because they have nothing else to do. Often a little investigation would disclose a pricking pin, or some more serious cause of irritation. A lady, living near Boston, went out to spend the day recently, taking with her an infant child, which showed great uneasiness through the day, crying nearly all the time, without apparent cause. Upon undressing the child at night it was found that one of its toes was bent entirely back, broken and turned black. What an easy matter it would have been to address the child before night!

This is just the season—when alternate snows and rains, thaws and frosts produce sudden atmospheric changes—for children to be seized with the croup. It is of little use to study up remedies, to send for the doctor, or to run to the druggist's, when a child is struggling for breath. A remedy should be known, should be where it can be found at a moment's notice, and should be promptly administered. An emetic of some kind—I always keep Syrup of Ipecac, or Hive Syrup at hand—is a safe and usually an efficacious remedy. To-day I saw this recipe to relieve croup, which may be worth remembering:

"Apply to the chest, under the arms, the palms of the hands, and hollow of the feet a mixture of one ounce sweet oil, and half an ounce of gum opal. It will generally relieve the most severe case of croup in five minutes. Remember it is to be used externally, and drink plentifully of cold water."

Newspapers are becoming more personal in these days than is at all admissible according to the rules of good taste. There are certain items respecting individuals which are interesting to be known and proper to be made public, particularly if the individuals have in literary, artistic, or political life, or otherwise, gained a reputation. Some personal items, however, may be interesting to the over-curious, which, according to my thinking, it is a gross violation of good taste to parade before the public. To me, it seems improper and indelicate to invade the sanctity of private life, and bring retiring persons prominently before the public, unless they give their consent, or have done something so unusual or so strange that it demands notice. Certainly, engagements are not unusual, neither is it a strange thing for men and women to live a single life; and the press is not expected to proclaim abroad matters which are more appropriately kept within the family circle. A while ago some New York papers published lists of bachelors living in their vicinity, and this morning I read that a paper in Troy "undertook to improve upon this style of literature," by publishing a list of the 'Old Maids of Troy.' The publisher of the enterprising sheet got himself soundly horsewhipped by the brother of a young lady whose name appeared in the list, and now finds himself in jail for libel."

Friday Eve.—The streets are in a shocking condition—snow, mud, water. Broadway seems afloat. Riding is disagreeable, and walking nearly impossible. To get into an omnibus or to get out of it without being submerged is a feat that requires uncommon dexterity; and it is a matter of deep interest to watch the various expedients adopted for crossing the street.

Then again, omnibuses and carriages come splashing through the "slush," and most unmercifully bespatter the pedestrians on the sidewalk. Many a time to-day have I seen a lady retreat hastily from the edge of the sidewalk, gazing ruefully upon her mud-sprinkled dress and shawl, and cast an indignant look of resentment at the unconscious horses or more unconscious driver. 'Tis of no use to wear pretty walking-dresses now—the plainest dresses and water-proof boots for such days as these.

I notice a statement that the "boot and shoe" trade has wonderfully improved since short dresses have been adopted by ladies. For years the ladies' and misses' shoe manufacturers have not known the cause of their distress. They knew that their old customers came very seldom for new shoes, but they did not know that the long, trailing dresses were the cause. Now, since the shortening of the dresses of the ladies, the whole mystery is solved. This change of fashion is certainly sensible and economical, since new boots cost far less than the three or four extra yards of silk which served the double purpose of "street wiper" and covering to a most artistic portion of the person. One of our most observing city physicians recently remarked "that this change of fashion would compel a more complete covering of the feet, the neglect of which, under cover of long trains, had, in his judgment, caused the death of thousands."

A communication from San Francisco states that the great "demand" at present in that far-off country is women—women in the shape of waitresses and chamber-maids, who receive in the city of San Francisco from $20 to $25 in gold per month; women in the shape of cooks and girls-of-all-work, who are paid $30 in the same metal for their services. Great inducements are also offered for the female teachers who may come well recommended. These ladies receive from $50 to $75, also in gold. But probably the most interesting statement on this subject is contained in the announcement that "nowhere in the world are women treated as well or so much needed. In the mining regions four out of five men are said to be bachelors."

A remarkable phenomena of low-water has recently occurred at Niagara Falls. A strong easterly gale sent the waters of Lake Erie westward, leaving the Niagara River and its tributaries lower than were ever known before. Buffalo Creek was so low that all the vessels in it were grounded, and Niagara Falls was a rivulet compared with its native grandeur. The Three Sisters were accessible to foot-passengers, and many traversed where human foot had never trod, with perfect impunity and dry feet. Below the falls was the wonder of wonders. The water was full twenty feet lower than usual, and the oldest inhabitant gazed in wonder at the grand transformation.

Sack with Velvet Trimming.

See illustration on double page.

This sack is of black Astrakhan cloth, bound round the edge with crimson velvet, and trimmed with a bias strip of crimson velvet, an inch and a quarter wide, and large, round, white mother-of-pearl buttons. Cut from Figs. 38 and 39 each two pieces, from Fig. 40 the back whole, and from Figs. 41 and 42 each two pieces for each sleeve. Join the back, side-pieces, and fronts to correspond with the figures on the pattern, bind the edge with narrow velvet, and put on the bias trimming as shown in the illustration. Having sewed on the buttons, face the fronts with a bias strip of black silk about three inches wide, and the neck with a strip an inch wide, and make the button-holes in the right front, edging the same with red velvet. Sew up the two pieces of each sleeve from 26 to 27, and from 29 to 30; put the bias trimming and buttons on the under part, as seen in illustration, and join the aforesaid piece of the under part from 28 to 29, from 29 to X, and from 28 to ● to the upper part of the sleeve. Cover the seam of the sleeve from 29 to 30 with a narrow strip of velvet. Face the bottom of the sleeves with silk, sew them in the arm-holes to correspond with the figures on the pattern, and cover the arm-holes with the bias velvet trimming.

Sack with Cord Trimming.

See illustration on double page.

This sack is of light gray velours, trimmed with fine gray silk cord and narrow light brown silk braid, put on in an arabesque design. The jacket has flowing sleeves, is pointed round the bottom, and is closed in front with flat, round mother-of-pearl buttons. It is cut after the same pattern as the sack, with velvet trimming, except that the sleeves are a little fuller. Fig. 27 gives the design.

Pompadour Waist.

See illustration on double page.

This waist must be worn with a white or light skirt, which must match the trimming of the waist in color. The original is of mull, trimmed with needle-work insertion an inch wide, Valenciennes insertion two-fifths and four-fifths of an inch wide, and Valenciennes edging three-fifths and four-fifths of an inch wide. A black velvet ribbon is run through the narrowest insertion. Black velvet ribbon, two inches wide, and small embroidered rosettes, complete the trimming. For the waist, cut the two fronts from Fig. 11, and the back from Fig. 12. Arrange of the needle-work insertion and the broader Valenciennes insertion, two pieces after Fig. 13, and one piece after Fig. 14. Lay the pleats as marked from X to ● in Figs. 11 and 12; join these parts to correspond with the figures on the pattern, with Figs. 13 and 14, pleating the muslin in front, as marked on the pattern from 21 to 22, and 24 to 25. Set a double strip of muslin up the fronts, for buttons and button-holes, and cover the same on the right with the broad Valenciennes insertion, bordered on both sides with narrow edging, and laid over black velvet ribbon. Join the back and fronts to correspond with the figures on the pattern, trim the neck with the narrow Valenciennes insertion and edging; run a narrow black velvet ribbon through the former, leaving the ends hanging about a quarter of a yard. Hem the bottom and side slit narrow, and face the same with double muslin, about three inches wide. Cut the sleeves from Fig. 17, and trim as seen in the illustration; run black velvet ribbon through the narrow insertion at the bottom of the sleeve, and tie the ends in a bow. Cord the arm-holes, sew in the sleeves, and put black velvet ribbon over the shoulders, as seen in the engraving: the ends of this ribbon are formed into a loop four inches long, which is confined by a needle-work rosette edged with lace. Finish with a rosette of black velvet in front of the waist.

Pompadour Gored Dress.

See illustration on double page.

This tasteful dress is of light gray velours, trimmed with gray silk rouleaux and silk fringe, and is worn over a chemise of puffed lace. Gray silk buttons up the front. Figs. 34-37 give the pattern of half the dress. Cut from Figs. 34-36 each two similar pieces, and from Fig. 37 the back. The sleeves are cut from Figs. 41 and 42, omitting the lapet on Fig. 42. The breadths of the dress must be lengthened at the bottom as much as may be required, taking care to preserve the contour. For the waist, cut the lining somewhat larger than the outside, face the fronts with velours, sew the bosom pleats, and put on the buttons and button-holes; then join the parts to correspond with the figures on the pattern. Cord the neck, face the bottom of the skirt, sew in the sleeves, and finish with the trimming.

BEDOUN (OPERA CLOAK).
For pattern see Supplement, No. X., Figs. 23-25.

Opera Cloaks.

The material of the various opera cloaks which we give may be varied to suit the taste or purse of the wearer, they can be made of simpler stuffs, such as black or white cashmere, black silk, white alpaca, or velours, without losing their elegance of form. In like manner the trimming can be varied, without, therefore, becoming less effective.

Bedouin (Opera Cloak).

The original of this cloak is of white silk, trimmed in the manner shown in the illustration, with blue velvet ribbon an inch wide and broad Angora fringe. For the Bedouin, cut one piece a yard long (the middle of the back) and a yard and a half wide, which is rounded at the bottom, in the shape shown in Fig. 23, which gives the Bedouin reduced to one-sixteenth of its size. Face the bottom with a strip of white silk, two inches wide, and cord the edge with white silk. Cut the lappet for the back double, sew Angora fringe, three inches wide, between the edges, and set it on the Bedouin to correspond with the figures on the pattern. Then put the velvet trimming round the neck, as shown in the illustration, so as to form a triangle five inches long and four inches wide, which trim with velvet ribbon and cross stitch of blue silk. Fig. 24 gives the triangle in miniature. Lastly, set the velvet ribbon round the edge of the Bedouin.

Scarf Mantilla.

The original of this mantilla is of white Irish poplin, lined with white silk, and trimmed with satin rouleaux and with tabs of poplin bound with satin, and set on the back of the mantilla. The ends of these tabs are trimmed with white silk fringe. For this mantilla cut of the outside and lining, from Figs. 30 and 31, each two pieces. Sew the outside and lining, Fig. 31, together in the middle of the back, and join the back and fronts, filling the lining over the seam. Run the edges of the mantilla together, and set the tabs around under the back, as seen in the illustration; these tabs, which are lined, are twelve inches long and six inches wide, and are bound with very narrow satin ribbon. The standing collar also consists of large and small tabs, of which Figs. 32 and 33 give the pattern; these are also bound with satin, and set on so that the smaller tabs lie over the larger ones. Lastly, trim the mantilla with five rows of satin piping and with silk fringe, as shown in the illustration.

Talma (Opera Cloak).

This talma is of Irish poplin, lined with silk. It is scalloped round the bottom and bound with satin; and satin rouleaux simulate scallops up the front. The bottom is trimmed besides with Angora fringe, six inches deep, which is set on underneath, so as to leave the scallops loose. Give place, two inches wide, laid over a bias fold of satin, and satin buttons, complete the trimming. Before cutting the talma, care must be taken to complete the pattern by tacking together the pieces turned down, as well as the breadths cut across the middle. Figs. 6^a and 6^b; in doing this, make the letters on the different pieces come together. Scallop the bottom, making each scallop one and three-fifths inches deep and two and two-fifths inches wide. Baste the outside and lining together, sew up the seam in the middle of the back, and lay the shoulder pleats; then bind the talma with satin. The standing collar consists of lappets of poplin, lined with silk and bound with satin to correspond with the rest of the garment; these lappets lie over each other, and are set on underneath the neck. Finish with trimming, as shown in the illustration.

Scarf Bedouin (Opera Cloak).

The original of this cloak is of white cashmere, trimmed with a bias strip of white silk two inches wide, white silk braid, rosettes of white silk cord, and Angora fringe three inches wide. The small standing collar is scalloped. Cut from Figs. 28, 29^a, and 29^b, which give one half, each two equal pieces, having first taken care to lengthen both parts of Figs. 29^a, 29^b, which are cut across the middle. Having joined the two parts of Fig. 29 from 3 to 4 and from 4 to 5, lay the shoulder pleat from 1 to 2, and turn the edges down narrow on the right side on the fronts and back, and cover it with the bias strip of silk before mentioned, which trim on each side with braid. This bias trimming only reaches about half the way up the front, the edge of which is turned in, and bound with a narrow strip of silk. Lay three pleats in the middle of the back, which are marked by × and ● in Fig. 29^b, and join the fronts and back to correspond with the figures on the pattern. Lastly, put on the collar and the remaining trimming.

WHAT OUR ARTISTS ARE DOING.

THE public is certainly indebted to the artists for a great pleasure in the cordial opening of their studios to the public. At the Tenth Street building the rooms are opened every Saturday, and when the welcome is not with open doors the string is often out of the latch. It would seem to be a great tax upon their time and courtesy to receive visitors so frequently; yet, appreciating the sacrifice it costs, we can not but enjoy it heartily and thankfully. May it be long before the artists weary of their weekly entertainments! And if to give pleasure could grow an insufficient reason for so doing, there is the twin motive of conferring a great educational good upon the community. Accepting the hospitality for the first time during this week, we were perhaps too much delighted to speak calmly of these attractive rooms. One afternoon, indeed, could give us but a kaleidoscope vision of things beautiful and rare, of scenes grand and homely; and we come out with a bewildering impression of having been not merely for an hour within the brick walls upon a city street, but under the palms of the tropics, on the prairies of the West, in sweet New England valleys, or in the white silence of the icebergs of Labrador.

A long look at the lovely emerald and crystal icebergs on Mr. Bradford's easel could for a brief space nearly console one for not having been of the party on that very pleasant trip to Labrador. The furry wardrobes of the Esquimaux hanging from the walls, some quite charming, and all, possibly, with more claim to absolute beauty than our own broadcloth suits would have adorned the igloo walls of an Esquimaux artist, are irresistibly fascinating to one who reads the tales of Arctic voyagers with envy. It is singular to see Southern civilization creeping up to the Pole as illustrated on these same walls in the odd interruption of a white cotton bridal suit of jacket and trousers trimmed with a border of scarlet. Mr. Bradford has other pictures greatly interesting from all that they suggest. In one, a huge rock standing in shadow against the sun looks as if it were designed as a model for all icebergs to shape themselves by. Another picture is Mr. Bradford's vivid recollection of a fearful passage through a narrow strait opening out from the Bay of Rocks, upon which a sudden and violent storm has fallen. The desolation and terror of the scene are softened by the promise of the coming sun in the golden light beyond the walls of rock.

Scarcely more than a threshold lies between this Arctic circle, over which Mr. Bradford presides, and Mr. Church's studio; but it seems a step into the sunny region of the tropics as you stand under palm branches while you dreamily look upon the canvas at the land where those palms are growing. Below this is another in which the sun is breaking through heavy purple cloud masses with broad beams of golden light. These pictures, with two high up on the walls in which we recognize with pleasure old friends—the lower a painting of the falls of Niagara and above it the bright, fierce face of the Esquimaux dog—alone represent Mr. Church. But the room is full of suggestions of the tastes and travels of this artist. It is indeed a treasure-house of other beauties and wonders than those upon the canvases, from the queer, wise owl for whom many foolish butterflies have died to the arm-chair offering you rest and quiet upon the fierce-looking skin of a tiger. The pictures of Mr. Heade, whose name appears with that of Mr. Church upon the door, are attractive, especially the painting of a glowing sunset sky and others of branches of apple-blossoms.

Mr. Hays's studio is another room fascinating us by its complete isolation from the outer world. The giant antlers and head of the moose and the elk, the great soft skins and branching horns and skeletons of deer and buffalo, frame the pictures of the same grand animals that confront us from the canvas, in fierce attack or in motionless dignity. When the tide of human life in its westward flow has swept away every vestige of these wild dwellers on our prairies and among our mountain ranges, we shall realize the service that such men as Mr. Hays have done us in preserving for us on canvas their noble portraits.

In Gignoux's room we are startled back into medieval times by the figures dressed in full armor that frown upon our entrance. But there is nothing medieval in the skating scene, bright with lingering autumn hues and sunset sky. Mr. Gignoux has also upon the reverse of his easel an interesting picture of the Horse-shoe Fall at Niagara, seen from a little height.

In William Hart's room, filled from floor to ceiling with studies and pictures, are some of the bright bits of autumn views, so attractive and so pleasantly suggested whenever this artist's name is heard.

The battles of the sun with the mist, as usual, adorn the easels of Gifford, and attract by their appeals to the imagination. One, representing a strip of beach at Coney Island, with its alternating rise of sand, partially covered with grass, and its hollow filled with shadow, shows the mist suddenly retiring in defeat, and the sun on the verge of a dazzling triumph. In another, a "View of the Bay from Staten Island," a gentle compromise has been effected, and a lovely union of sun and mist is the result. But Mr. Gifford has also proved by his picture that in such compromises the dominion is mainly with the darkness. Upon the walls were many studies promising much interest, but the waning light in the corridors forbade any longer stay.

In Le Clear's rooms we had the pleasure of meeting again the faces of Bryant and Booth, rarely absent, in color or marble, from the exhibition rooms, indicating something of kin with the souls of the artists in the poet and the artist-actor. Other familiar faces greeted us here. One small painting was very pleasant to look upon. It pictured a plain old man who was entering into the land of Beulah, and could afford an occasional day of rest from labor and peaceable enjoyment of his book.

In Latent Thompson's studio the always wonderful process of moulding the human form, this time not less interesting as representing the stalwart figure of General Sedgwick, detained us irresistibly.

Oliver Perry has completed his picture of the husking, with its merry life, so prominent in the rooms of the Academy last spring. His walls are covered with work suggesting study in Italy, and of later work there are some pleasant stories told in color.

In entering Mr. Von Elten's room our breath is taken away by the innumerable number of sketches and studies and paintings of landscape in oil and pencil that cover the walls from floor to ceiling, and we are surprised to be greeted by a young man rather than by one stricken in years.

Entering the studio of Mr. Whittredge our first admiration is given to the patriarchal beard of the artist, rivaling that of Mr. Brevoort, to whose room in the Dodworth building we shall be welcomed on his next reception. But, if he will pardon us, we soon forgot the artist in his work. The prominent picture this afternoon soars mighty in proportions above the modest little study for it standing below. The scene represents the plains near Denver City, with the mountains rising into snowy heights. Indians are encamping in picturesque tents under the trees, before which slowly glides, over sandy bottom, a quiet river. The sand and the grass harmoniously alternate in giving the artist soft patches of color. The study would be to some more interesting as being a defiant little bit of form and color, not softened by the warm atmosphere of the great picture above, nor brightened by the light and color in the wigmans and figures, nor made more tender and graceful in form by art. Those people who would prefer the study to the finished picture represent perhaps an element in the human mind which inclines it to prefer promise to fulfillment, possibly a noble tendency. Thrown into the back-ground by this interesting picture were many studies which we had no time to enjoy.

Many studios which we would have liked to enter bore the announcement upon their closed doors of the absence or engagement of the artist, but we could only gratefully forgive all absent artists after an afternoon of so much enjoyment.

AN IMPERIAL MASQUERADE.

IN the month of April, and in the year 1860, any one walking, driving, or riding in the broad avenue of the Champs Elysées, in Paris, could scarcely have failed to observe the large number of working-men in blouses who were seemingly employed in making repairs on a very magnificent residence which stands about midway of the street, and which is known to sojourners and residents of Paris as the Hôtel d'Albe. The Hôtel d'Albe is a roomy and imposing mansion which has been devoted to the service of the mother of the Empress Eugénie, whenever that august parent chooses to seek the brilliancy of the gay capital. The august parent seeks that brilliancy seldom. The festive and dirty city of Madrid seems to suit her better; and it is also whispered that her Imperial son-in-law is no more devotedly attached to his noble mother-in-law than less illustrious sons-in-law are commonly devoted to less illustrious mothers-in-law. However that may be, Madame the Countess de Montijo has very comfortable lodgings in the Hôtel d'Albe whenever she goes to Paris.

In the month of April, in the year 1860, the Countess de Montijo was not thinking of coming to Paris; and yet here was a small army of working-men busy as bees about the Hôtel d'Albe, refusing to answer the questions of inquisitive idlers, eating their scant meals of white grapes and black bread, and staring not altogether good-humoredly at the glittering throng which swept past in carriages and on foot, bound for that fairy garden-spot for duels and flirtation, the Bois de Boulogne.

Before many days the secret of the immense preparations being made in the Hôtel d'Albe became bruited about on those mysterious wings by which secrets travel when there is most desire they should be kept close. The Empress Eugénie was going to give there a grand bal masqué—something which in gorgeous magnificence was to eclipse any thing that Paris had seen since the fête given by the Duchess de Berri in 1830, which was of unheard-of splendor. The Imperial couple had frequently given bal masqués at the Tuileries; but this was to be the Empress's private and particular ball—her own ball in her own Hôtel d'Albe. No invitations were to be given except by special permission of the Empress, to whom every guest's name was to be submitted. The excitement in the world of titles and of gentility was intense. "Shall I be invited?" "Will any of the Faubourg St. Germain aristocrats go?" And among both sexes arose that question which is generally confined to the weaker vessels, "What shall we wear?"

This question was one of great general curiosity. Not alone among ladies and milliners and modistes was it discussed, but it formed for many days the chief topic of the clubs, the chit-chat of the theatre lobbies, the astonishment of groups at tables in cafés. The Empress Eugénie was going to appear at this ball in the dress of a ballet-dancer! The graceful ankles of the beautiful Majesty of France were to be exposed to the gaze of a select ball-room crowd! A very clever pencil sketch was circulated from one salon to another of the Bourbonite residences in the Faubourg St. Germain, representing Eugénie clad as Diana the Huntress (for this was the character she was to represent) dancing on the stage of a minor Boulevard theatre with the Faubourg St. Antoine laborers as an audience all hissing vigorously. And still the workmen worked at the Hôtel d'Albe.

The whole town was pervaded with the one idea. All the leading tradespeople were engrossed with orders; and still the cry rang from the fortunate invited ones, "What shall we wear?"

Two young English lords, prominent in the Volunteer movement which was the main idea in England at that time, had resolved to wear their Volunteer uniforms, and not until I called their attention to the fact did they perceive how very great a mark of disrespect such a step would be. The Volunteer movement was a demonstration of hostility toward France, and started subsequently to that other wild rumor to the effect that the Emperor Napoleon now felt that the moment to revenge St. Helena had arrived, and seriously contemplated an invasion of the soil of perfidie Albion. The motto of the Volunteers was "Defense—not Defiance." My English friends, however, considered that such a very pacific motto would not be offensive to Imperial eyes. The true secret of their desire to wear the dress was that it happened to be becoming; the soft gray was admirably suited to their blonde locks and their rosy cheeks. But they reconsidered their decision and appeared, one as a very fat Henry the Eighth, the other as a Knight of the Garter.

When the tickets were issued we found that the invitation was made out in the name of the Duke and Duchess de Tascher la Pagerie, a titled couple bearing one of those mysterious and illy-defined relationships to the Emperor which are so frequent in the Bonaparte family. Of course it was well understood among the invited that these persons were only the nominal givers of the fête, and that the Empress was still its leading spirit. Indeed, one of our party who had been at the Tuileries a few days before heard the Minister of Finance and the fair Eugénie squabbling over the expense of the ball in loud and angry terms, and it was supposed that, owing to his representations to the Empress that this vast and worse than useless expenditure could not fail to awaken indignation among the working-classes, it was resolved to shift the responsibility of it to the shoulders of the Duke de Tascher, who, being a private individual, was at liberty to do what he chose with his money, without the least regard for the hungry and disaffected of the lower Boulevards.

The eventful night arrived, as all eventful nights do, and as early as eight o'clock in the evening the avenue of the Champs Elysées was filled with numbers of gens d'armes a-horse and sergents de ville afoot, all occupied in keeping the way open that the countless throng of equipages, filled with human freight in masquerade costumes, and bearing down for the Hôtel d'Albe, might approach the semi-imperial residence without impediment. Before ten a line of carriages reaching the entire length of the avenue from the Place de la Concorde to the Rond Point was moving slowly along, creeping snail-like up to the halls of dazzling light where the hearts of the occupants had already impatiently flown. Having had much experience of Parisian fêtes I had taken care to be dressed early, and to be on my way shortly after nine o'clock; but although I lived within ten minutes' walk of the hotel, my carriage was over an hour and a half reaching the house. I could scarcely feel impatience at the delay; for a finer sight than that presented in the street that night it has never been my lot to witness. The broad avenue was one flood of light shed by a Drummond reflector, or some other apparatus, which threw silver gleams through the tree-tops and danced in a poetical way upon the brazen helmets of the mounted police, whose brawny Norman horses pranced wildly about, shaking the accoutrements of their riders till the air rang with the metallic music of clanking steel. Nor was vocal utterance lacking; for loud and shrill, like a command on the tented field, rose the shouts of "En avant!" "Pas si vite!" "Hé là-bas!" "Retirez-vous!" "Avancez!"

The carriages were for the most part gala equipages, not the broughams, caleches, and coupés of everyday use. Lord Cowley brought out a time-honored vehicle, painted that canary-color which is so affected by the English aristocracy; with hammer-cloth of red velvet, and burly coachman be-wigged and be-calved, and two long footmen, in scarlet liveries, hanging on behind. The De Mornys turned out in half-imperial style, with outriders and postillions in blue and gold; and from the whole street was excluded every vehicle which was not exclusively aristocratic, and whose occupants did not bear tickets for the fête.

Slowly came our turn to draw up before the door; and as we alighted we found ourselves in the midst of a number of gorgeously-dressed servants wearing the Imperial livery de gala and ranged on each side of the entrance, which was draped with rich velvet hangings and ornamented with the golden bee. Here we left what wrappings we chose to dispense with, which were quickly cared for by the servants, who, men as they were, stooped to the ground to remove the warm knitted stockings which covered our satin boots. Here also, wearing the Imperial livery, as they on occasion wore other disguises, were stationed half a dozen police detectives who eyed us closely to see if we had any nefarious designs. Not having any we passed on and reached a still more richly decorated ante-chamber, which, like the entrance-room, had been erected for the occasion. Here we were met by the nominal givers of the fête, the Duke and Duchess de Tascher la Pagerie. Removing our masks, we courted our best-practiced courtesies, and bowed our most gracious bows; bow and courtesy were returned and a word or two of welcome given. This little ceremony over, we entered the ball-room. Words are futile to express the delights which are furnished by color, sound, and fragrance. It may be, too, that the fervent enthusiasm of one's first youth gilds these things with a charm such as the cool judgment of maturer years fails to indorse. However this may be, the recollection of that ball-room must be to me forever a dream of indescribable splendor.

The walls of the dancing-room seemed to be one mass of gilding, the dead richness of which was relieved by myriads of natural flowers and boughs of evergreens, whose beauty and fragrance were alike grateful. The inevitable flags, which seem to be indigenous to ball-rooms, coeval with evergreen, were happily suppressed, and nothing used but such decorations as could be approved by the most delicate taste. At one extremity a band of musicians was hidden in a niche in the wall, behind a hedgework of lilies and daffodils, such as Titania might have slumbered on; and above the flowers and the vines was to be seen the world-renowned Strauss waving his baton, which a fanciful imagination might easily transform into a fairy's wand, while sweet music filled with richest tones the brilliant halls, which were crowded with a dazzling throng.

Masked balls are all much the same, and except in the extraordinary richness of jewels and the extreme brilliancy and costliness of the costumes, this imperial masquerade was very like the masquerade with which we are all familiar. Here was the usual motley crew. The queens and the peasant girls, the courtiers, knights, magicians, punchinello, sailors, soldiers, Turks, Arabs, money-lenders, Jews, Christians, and infidels, and the lions, the tigers, and the bears.

As I met my friends in the ball (for though we were all masked, our own little coterie had agreed upon a distinguishing badge), my first question was, "Have you seen the Empress? Is she really wearing that extraordinary dress?"

No one had seen her; at least to know her; and there was no lady present wearing the dress of Diana the Huntress. Just then one of our party approached, who had just left the Countess Cowley. Her ladyship had been talking to the Empress, and said she was wearing a rich black domino. "Ah, but she will soon change that!" said the young Count de Choiseul, who in all fashionable matters was an authority.

Ah, here was the Emperor. No mistaking him, though he was masked, and had a blue silk domino thrown over his usual court dress. We all recognized him by his walk—that painful dragging of the leg—which we then attributed to rheumatism, but which we have since learned from newspaper correspondents is something scientific with a hard name. He seemed to be enjoying himself on this occasion, however, and vigorously engaged in that lively pastime which with us less illustrious is called flirting.

Their Highnesses Mathilde, Clotilde, and Anna Murat were seated together. The first-named wore the costume of a gipsy, or magicienne. Her arms were bared to the shoulder and bronzed, as was her face. Her head-dress consisted of a long white shawl of fine knitted wool, which was bound to the head with a circlet of Moorish coins, and fell in folds down her back. The material of her dress was costly, and the whole costume, perhaps, might have been called picturesque; but as she sat there with her bronzed face, and rather a displeased expression of countenance, she was certainly the least attractive woman at the ball. Next her sat the fair little Clotilde (wife of Prince Napoleon), looking fairer than usual by contrast with her sister-in-law. This little lady wore a shepherdess costume copied from Watteau, in which the pleasant tints of pink and white predominated. On her head was placed a jaunty little hat such as the shepherdesses of fiction always wear—those of reality never—and about her neck was placed a necklace of roses, pinned together with diamonds. Anna Murat was also clad as a shepherdess with different colors.

At the witching hour of twelve, when graveyards yawn, the Duke de Tascher, relieved from his duties as guest-receiver at the entrance, was flitting over the ball-room floor in an agitated sort of way, and in the politest of French phrases requesting all lingerers to "move on" and become wall-flowers. The request complied with, the floor was cleared, and Strauss striking up a lively march—composed, as was all the music played on this night, expressly for the occasion—thus gave the entrance signal for sixteen ladies who were to dance a quadrille which for weeks they had been practicing, and which was called "The Elements." Sixteen ladies of the highest rank, in costumes of bewildering beauty, representing respectively Water, Air, Earth, and Fire, swayed through the mazes of this graceful measure. Their names follow:

Foreigners.—Metternich, Rozezdziecka, Sneykowska, Viazabytowska, Ischetwertinska, Rosk, Errazu, Sinelwifok, Wallembrasa, Schonkoska.

French.—De Morny, Walewska, De Grétry, Persigny, Pourtalès, De Labedoyère.

A singular fancy took possession of the Duke de Dino at this ball. He had dressed himself up in the singular costume of a tree; and as there were numerous trees serving as decorations, it was not so strange that one of the ladies should have leaned up against him to repose herself. Her horror at finding the tree had legs, and that it ungallantly walked away, was very amusing.

Two o'clock arrived, and on its stroke a clang of trumpets was heard, and a heavy yellow silk curtain, which had been let down during the evening about midway of the Conservatory, was suddenly lifted. Near by stood the Empress, now clad in white, and wearing a burnous of striped silk. No trace yet of the reprehensible Diana costume. The lifted curtain discovered a more dazzling and fairly-like scene than had yet been displayed—a seemingly almost endless hall, surrounded by balconies and balustrades, covered with hanging vines and flowers, while myriads of wax-lights streamed their soft brilliancy upon the tables heavily laden with a feast which was almost hidden from our gaze by heaps of flowers. At the end of the hall a fountain was plashing its waters in rays of light, which to our bewildered imagination rivaled the brightness of the sun. Over all, above all, rose the voluptuous strains of music; and at a feast worthy of a Roman proconsul we were served by pages in feudal dress, who bent the knee when they proffered their viands and their wine.

How long the supper lasted I can not now remember. At the table, in groups, was again discussed the Empress's dress. Some averred that the whole thing was a scandalous report which had been set afloat by her enemies, and that her Majesty had never entertained such an idea; others insisted that she had intended to wear it, and had persisted in her determination until the very last day, when the Emperor had peremptorily informed her that if she did not abandon such an absurd fancy he would prevent the ball taking place. I can vouch for the truth of nothing except that she wore no costume whatever, save two dominoes.

At twenty minutes past six by my watch I stood at the entrance (now the exit) door of the Hôtel d'Albe waiting for my carriage. As it rolled away I cast one look behind. The day had broken broad and cold, and in its light I saw fays, sprites, sylphs, queens, kings, and peasants winging their flight, like the marvelous guests of Aladdin's Enchanted Palace, speeding away at the magician's bidding.

O. L.

THE LOVER'S MISTAKE.

I.

SHE sat leaning forward a little, so that her face—a face for Greuze—was framed by the brougham window, and the light from the great lamp under the Embassy portico fell full upon it. What might have been dangerous for most women at that hour of the morning Alice, Lady Brankston, probably felt was quite safe for her. So there she sat a moment before she drew her hand away from his unconsciously long pressure.

He, poor fellow, stood bareheaded on the Albert-gate paré, looking at her as if he would have liked to stand there looking at her for an indefinite period; thinking what a darling she was, and wondering more than usual whether he should ever have the pluck to tell her so.

A linkman repeated his raucous yell for Lady Clancrankie's carriage, the nearer approach of which had been barred for the last five minutes by the lingering brougham. The occupant of the latter smiled as she lifted her eyes, and saw over her cousin's broad shoulder the angular, grim-visaged peeress glaring down upon her from the steps. Two A.M. was not exactly the time of a summer's day that the countess showed to the best advantage; and she was shrewd enough to know it. So she stood where she had been entrapped by her inexperienced North British footman, and cursed the Greuze-face more viciously than before. The Greuze-face smiled back sweetly on her. But Lady Brankston was a wise little child; and the most perfect little patte of all Boivin's clientèle had got somehow out of its detainer's close grip the next instant. He was her cousin; of course every one knew that. But he was only her cousin—yet. And so—

And so the violet eyes dropped down again to his; and a voice that a blind man would have loved her for said to him:

"Good-night, Durham. Don't forget, now. To-morrow."

And then the glass was pulled up, and the brougham drove away.

Quite unconscious of the grinning linkmen, of the half dozen street Arabs who proffered hansom cabs, requests for backsheesh, boxes of cigar-lights, and an impromptu exhibition of "caten-wheeling," all in a breath, and under the nose of a stern but powerless member of the Force; quite unconscious of Lady Clancrankie, who swept past him into her family ark, trumpeting in her wrath like a "rogue" elephant, Durham Vandeleur remained where Alice Brankston had left him, twisting a great golden mustache that dropped in ambrosial curls below his chin, and staring steadily at the lamp-post at the corner, round which the fervida rota of the little lady's chariot had whirled fully a minute ago.

"Regular thingamy, you know!" the Guardsman muttered to himself, but, from long habit, apparently addressing the brandy-faced linkman at his elbow; "note of what-d'ye-call-it she is to me. Riddle, ain't she? Pretty, but puzzling. Awful, you know. By Jove!"

The expletive came out in a long-drawn sigh, that seemed to rouse the utterer from his trance. He shook himself together and turned up the steps to get his hat and coat. It was about the best ball of the season, that night at the Embassy, and just in full after-supper swing; but what was there for him to stop for now that she was gone? he asked himself.

"I'll walk home," he determined, dropping his hat on his curly head, and diving into the dust-coat pockets for a cigar case. "I'll walk home, and have a pipe, and—think," he added, desperately, as if he had made up his mind to commit suicide.

"Going, old boy?" a cheery voice asked behind him. "Same here. We'll go together. Half a jiff, while I loot a tile." On which errand, his own head-covering having temporarily disappeared, the Honorable Tom Savile strolled off, rejoining his friend though in what might be fairly considered an approximation to the infinitesimal modicum of time he had stipulated for.

upon the last step, where in a melancholy manner Vandeleur was kindling a cabana.

"Mind walking?" mumbled Mr. Savile, struggling with a large-sized cheroot on his own account.

"Rather walk," returned the other.

"Right you are, then. Fact is, Durham," Mr. Savile went on, hanging on to his taller Damon's arm, as they turned into Knightsbridge and set their faces toward the east; "fact is, I've been wanting to talk to you for the last hour, only I saw you were so busy with that flirting little B."

"Alice ain't a flirt, Tom! At least"—poor Durham felt constrained to qualify the flatness of his denial—"at least, I don't think she is, you know."

"Oh!" Tom returned, looking up at him rather curiously; "you don't think the little B.'s a flirt, eh? Ah, well, then—"

"Well, what?"

Tom whistled a bar or two of his pet Soldaten-Lieder, and looked up into the other's face that was calm as ever, but with just a shade of anxiety across it.

"Then," resumed Mr. Savile, slowly, "you don't think she means any thing with that fellow Colocynth?"

The puzzled look on Vandeleur's countenance deepened. He sucked hard at the big cabana till it blazed an angry red, but for a whole minute made no answer.

"Tom, old boy," he sighed out at length, flinging away, as it were, the Guardsman's mask before his bosom friend, and rather shocking the latter by the unwonted display of emotion—"Tom, I don't know what to think. By Gad! I don't."

"Whe-e-ugh!" whistled the acute youth, who saw it all now; "spoons, eh? Poor old Durham!"

There was a heart-felt, honest pity in the young philosopher's tone at the notion that his senior had taken the terrible disease he (the young philosopher) had hitherto managed by wise precautions to escape, that broke down the guileless Grenadier's reserve altogether; and out of the fullness of his heart he spoke. By the time the two had got as far as Down Street, Tom Savile knew all about the course of his captain's true love.

"That's how it is, you see," perorated Durham; "I can't make her out. She's a regular note of interrogation to me, she is! A co—you know."

"Yes," prompted Tom—"nundrum. Go on!"

"Conundrum. I've spooned her all my life, I believe. But of course they'd never have let her have me while I was only a younger son; and so I went away from her with Frank Beadesert and his brother, after the big game out in Africa, the year she came out. When I heard she'd married old Brankston, I used to wish I might never come back. I did, by Jove!"

"No good in that, you know," observed the practical Tom.

"However," Durham went on, "I did come back. Old Brankston was dead before they'd been married six months. She was prettier than ever; and I keener on her. She was very jolly to me after a while. At first she seemed savage with me about something. But by-and-by we got to be just as we always had been. That's how we are now. She's heaps of coin; and I'm the head of the house since poor Denis went under. And I might ask her to-morrow."

"Why the deuce don't you, then?"

"How the deuce can I? I tell you I can't make her out. Sometimes I think she does really care for me, you know. But then I know I ain't clever and that, like that fellow Colocynth, and can't talk pretty to her by the hour as he can. And he seems to be making awful running with her; and she seems to mean him. And sometimes she bullies me and is so hard on a fellow; and sometimes she's just the other way. And I don't know what to make of her, or what to do. I'm not exactly afraid of her, Tom, though she is awful sharp and satirical when she likes; but I could no more walk into her drawing-room and tell her right off the reel that I spooned her, and ask her to marry me, than I could ask her to play blind-hokey. I've tried it often; and it's no go. I get stumped directly I open my mouth. If I felt pretty safe I might do it; but I never can be sure whether she'd take it all right, or whether she thinks I'm a fool, and it don't matter; or that I'm only Cousin Durham, and she don't care; and so she'd simply laugh and chaff me. So I've gone on keeping it dark from her."

"Well, but," put in the acute Savile, "if you keep it dark from her, how's she to know?"

Vandeleur wagged his head, and looked down pityingly on his interlocutor.

"Women know every thing, Tom," he replied, solemnly. "There's nothing they ain't fly to, in these times. She'd know fast enough—if she cared, that is."

"Perhaps she does know?" suggested Tom, adroitly adopting his senior's reasoning. "And care, too. But, hang it, you can't expect her to tell you till you ask her, old boy! Women do cool things enough nowadays, every body's aware; but the little B. wouldn't do such a thing as that, by George! You go to Curzon Street, and ask her properly, to-morrow. Perhaps she's only working Colocynth to bring you on, after all!"

"Think so?" Durham asked, with temporary animation. "But no," he added, moodily;

"Alice ain't a flirt, you know."

"Ain't she?" observed the Honorable Thomas, sotto voce; "deuced good imitation of one, anyhow. Never mind," he continued aloud; "you go and ask her like a man, and get it settled one way or the other before dinner to-morrow. Look here," as a brilliant idea struck him, "I'll tell you how to do it. Write to her!"

Vandeleur pulled up short, and laid his hand on his sub's shoulder. A stray policeman under the Green Park trees on the other side of Piccadilly stopped to wonder what the two swells were up to.

"By Jove!" Durham said, feelingly, "what a clever beggar you are, Tom! I never thought of that."

Pythias smiled modestly, but immensely flattered by Damon's praise.

"That's what I'd do," he said; "and do it to-night too. Then she'll be able to give you your answer when you call to-morrow. She told you to call, you know; so you're sure to find her at home."

"I'll go and do it now," the other replied resolutely, flattering himself for a moment that it was as easy for him to do as it looked.

"All right," Tom nodded. "Make it pretty strong, I would; and quite plain. A note of interrogation, you know. And now here we are at my corner. Good-night, old boy! Stop, though! I've forgotten what I wanted to tell you. I heard just now there's a screw loose with Bayadère. So I'd recommend you to hedge all you can. Ta-ta!"

"See about that in the morning," answered Durham, his mind too full of another matter to care much about that promising outsider he had invested so largely upon. "Good-night."

And there at the Clarges Street corner the two men separated; Tom Savile to sleep the sleep of the just, and Vandeleur to indite his note of interrogation in the quiet of his chamber in Dover Street.

He put on a smoking-coat, mixed a glass bucket of b.-and-s., lit a black brûle-gueule of cavendish, and a lamp on his side-table, and set to work.

Just as he dipped his pen slowly into the ink, a letter lying on the table, which he had failed to notice before, happened to catch his eye.

He took it up and looked at it, not sorry, after all, for the moment's respite it gave him.

"Spavin's fist," he muttered aloud. "Something about the filly, I suppose."

The scroll was from Mr. Spavin, and did concern the Bayadère. It was also much more satisfactory than the intelligence Tom Savile had imparted to her backer half an hour previously.

"I'll send Tom a line," Vandeleur thought, "and catch him before he goes down to the Corner. I fancy there's nothing to hedge about. Other way on!"

The sun had risen over the London chimney-pots two full hours when the note of interrogation for Lady Alice in Curzon Street, and the line for Tom Savile about Bayadère, were both written and lying before their greatly-tried author on the blotting-pad.

"Jove! it was a pull," sighed Durham, as he picked out a couple of envelopes and directed them; "but it's over at last, all right. Wonder what she'll say to it?"

He put the missives in the inclosures; left them where Potts couldn't fail to see them when he should enter the room by-and-by, and betook himself thoughtfully to bed, where Durham Vandeleur dreamed that Lady Alice said "Yes."

II.

Noon in Curzon Street. The little lady was dawdling over her coffee-cup and her rusk up stairs, invisible as yet to other mortal eyes than those of Pauline the privileged. That demoiselle was gliding down on some errand when scarlet on the hall door-mat met her glance. Barker, butler, was in colloquy with a militaire. Mademoiselle at once recognized the martial Potts. Potts came to Curzon Street pretty often in these days; and the susceptible Parisienne was conscious of feeling rather a tendresse for the stalwart but stolid grenadier, who irritated Barker every time he came by persistently ignoring the area, and effecting an improper entrance in front of the fortress.

However, Barker was no fool, and had never yet indulged in the luxury of a row with the captain's man, contenting himself for the present by administering a haut-en-bas style of treatment, which would have been intensely amusing to a by-stander, but which was productive of no perceptible effect whatever on the recipient.

"Ha!" Mr. Barker was observing, when Mademoiselle Pauline came gliding noiselessly down the staircase behind him; "ha! and that's hall, eh, Potts? Only a billy this mornin'? No message, no booky?"

"That's all," Potts returned; "that and the note for Mr. Savile was all the captain gave me this morning." And Potts opened the door.

"Very good, my man—ve-ry good. You can re-tire."

The dismissal was pronounced simply pro forma, for the other had already swung to the door from the outside, and left nothing for Mr. Barker to address himself to but the letter-box. Potts had gone, and hadn't even seen the disappointed Pauline.

She was close upon Barker now. The latter had just fixed a double eye-glass majestically upon his nose, and was scrutinizing the superscription of Durham Vandeleur's note of interrogation, when the French woman sprang upon him, like a cat, from his unguarded rear, and snatched the letter lightly out of his podgy fingers.

"Aha!" she cried, holding it behind her with one hand, and shaking the forefinger of the other at the speechless majordomo. "Aha! qu'est-ce que tu fais là, vieux polisson, hein? Les lettres de madame—ça me regarde, à moi. Ose encore les visiter—voyons!"

Mr. Barker cleared his throat as though about to give utterance to a severe rebuke; but the unknown tongue and the truculent air of the soubrette were too much for him, and he was fain to execute a strategic movement with silent, and by no means dignified, expedition, and leave "that sassy Frenchy," as he called her in his heart, in possession of the field.

Mademoiselle watched his retreat with a satisfied smile, and then leisurely betook herself back to my lady's chamber, carrying Durham's letter with her.

"De la part de Monsieur le Capitaine, miladi," she said, demurely, as she placed it on the little "sulky" drawn up close to the sofa, and glanced as she turned away at a mirror opposite, just in time to see the prettiest little flush possible cross miladi's cheek.

Lady Alice took up the scarlet-monogrammed missive that she had recognized the moment she saw it in Pauline's hand, and twisted it about meditatively in her own.

"What can the goose want to write for," she thought, "when he is to come here about the box this afternoon? To tell me he can't come, perhaps. And yet he seemed delighted enough in his way when I told him I was to, last night. But then I don't think I understand Durham. I fancied once he cared for me. And now I fancy—No, I can't make him out. Durham's a puzzle. He follows me about every where, but he's so provokingly imperturbable I don't know what he means by it. He never says any thing. Then he'll sit here by the hour; but I've never quite decided whether it's in silent adoration of me or intricate calculation of the odds on the next race he's an entry for. Provoking! He won't get jealous of that donkey Colocynth. When I bully him he pulls that great stupid mustache of his and looks at his boots; and when I talk prettily to him he goes on pulling his mustache and looks at me—and that's all. What am I to do with him? I care about him, don't I? I'm afraid so. More about him than any one? I'm afraid so, again. Because, if he don't happen to care about me more than any one else, why—it will be awkward, won't it? Now, does he? I don't know. But I will though! I'll put an end to this this afternoon. It's too much to be perpetually confronted with an eternal note of interrogation! A nous deux, Monsieur! But, perhaps, he isn't coming?"

And thus brought back to Durham's unopened letter the little lady pulled it out of its envelope.

She glanced at the first line, and then looked back at the address. The address was her own—perfectly correct.

"Then what," she asked herself aloud—"what does he mean by calling me 'Dear Tom'?"

Then she read what follows, and what we will read over her shoulder.

"Dear Tom," Durham had scrawled, "don't hedge a half-penny. Bayadère's all serene. I shall stand the lot on her; and if you can get the long odds you may put on an extra pot for me in the shape of an additional monkey or so. I'm bound to be in Curzon Street this afternoon, or I'd be down at the Corner myself. Ever yours, D. V."

The little lady looked rather bewildered when she'd finished.

"What ever does it all mean?" she wondered.

You see, mesdames, her education was hardly up to your mark; she honestly didn't understand "stable."

She laid the letter down and laughed. "I see!" she told herself at length; "the goose must have been writing to 'Dear Tom' and me at the same time, and made some stupid mistake in the envelopes. And 'Dear Tom' must have got my letter! Pleasant! I wonder what he wrote to me about?"

She rose rather impatiently, and crushed poor Durham's unlucky scrawl close in her little clenched hand.

"Care for me! He cares twice as much about his Bayadère! I've no patience with him! But what could that letter I ought to have got have been about?"

III.

Two o'clock. My lady had got into armor and her drawing-room, and was waiting in a coign of vantage there, under arms, for the enemy's appearance. The note about Bayadère, carefully torn in two, had been tossed on to the top of a basket of feminine chiffons, where it was well within range of its author's eye-glass when he should have taken up his usual position in his peculiar chair.

Five minutes past two by the Louis-Quinze clock. The little lady looked up from the thoughtful cutting of the Modes de Paris portion of a new magazine she was engaged in, and began tapping the cover impatiently with the bright blade of a big Algerian poniard she had taken a fancy to, one day when she and Blanche Vandeleur had amused themselves by pulling to pieces a little stand of arms Durham had got fixed up in his smoking-recess, under the delighted eyes of the proprietor. Lady Alice had carried off the dagger in its workmanlike plain shagreen sheath, and was wont to use it, somewhat to the danger of her pretty fingers, as a peaceful paper-knife. She had rather a vicious grip on the heavy silver handle just now, though, and the violet eyes were darkening with anger against some one.

"He's nearly ten minutes late," she murmured. "After last night, and that letter I ought to have had this morning, if he don't come in five minutes I'll order the carriage. The great goose! What can he be about? Calmly lunching at the club, I suppose, while I'm—Ah! take care, monsieur mon cousin—take care!"

She looked delicious in her wrath, that was about half real. Perhaps, meeting her own reflection in the glass of a convenient console at the moment, she thought she did. For the little cloud vanished; the sunshine of a smile shone out again: there was plenary absolution for all the sins he was not committed in the tone of the—

"Poor Durham!"

The "great goose" was not calmly lunching at the club; on the contrary, the "great goose," having spent the greater part of the morning in the service of an ungrateful country, had driven back from Barracks in a swift hansom, had changed the habiliment of its exterior, and, with no better preparation for its ordeal than a glass of sherry swallowed in haste, was at that very moment turning, with mien impassible as ever, but more nervous really than it ever had been in all its life, round the corner into Carzon Street.

A clatter of hoofs outside; Durham's voice distinctly audible through the open windows of the drawing-room; then a knock at the street door.

"At last," the little lady thought, giving a final glance at her preparations, and taking up her magazine ready to be absorbed therein when Barker should "discover" her.

But it was not the respectable Barker who burst open the drawing-room door so unceremoniously, and charged into that dainty apartment crying out:

"Oh, auntie! auntie!"

That was Lord Edric Brankston, a nephew of my lady's; a young swell of the tender age of ten, in an elaborate riding-costume, and with a decided black eye. This youth had just returned from his morning ride; and it was his pony and his attendant's horse who had made all that clatter below.

"Good gracious, Edric! What have you been doing, you dreadful child?" his horrified relative inquired, when she became aware of his condition.

"He did it!" his lordship explained, unearthing a bombonniere from the basket on the table, and turning over its contents to get at a particular "goody" he much affected.

"I say!" he went on, reproachfully; "how jolly greedy you are, auntie! You've eaten all the chocolate creams! I left four of 'em on purpose for myself, you know; and now there ain't one. And I hate these beastly burnt almonds."

"Put that down, Sir, and attend to me directly!" Lady Alice said, with great severity. "Now, who did it, if you please?"

"Young cad outside," mumbled my lord, with his mouth full of the despised burnt almonds. "He checked me, and I hit him with my whip. And then he called me a coward; and then I got down and pitched into him; and I licked him too, though he was twice my weight, Uncle Durham said. And then Uncle Durham gave me a sovereign."

"Did he! Uncle Durham ought to be ashamed of himself, then. But you are a brave boy, dear. Only it's very wrong to fight, Edric. I won't have you do such things; and if Uncle Durham chooses to encourage you—Where is he all this time, darling?"

"Down stairs talking to the Peeler about the row; he'll be up directly," my lord returned.

"Ah! Then you come with me to Pauline, and have your face washed, Sir! I'm going to give Uncle Durham a good scolding," the little lady said, rising as she spoke, and marching off her prisoner.

"What are you going to scold him for?" inquired, aptly enough, the captive, as the two passed through the portières. "Because he's afraid of you, you think? Awful bullies you women are!"

When, after arranging matters with an intelligent guardian of the peace, who had witnessed the duel with great interest, and who only interfered at the last moment, to recommend the vanquished street Arab to take himself off with all convenient speed, lest he should find himself in trouble; and having applied a golden salve to the vanquished one's wounds, thereby causing that bleeding hero to affirm energetically his willingness to be "wopped worse twice a day" for an indefinite period on similar terms; when, by-and-by, Durham got into the drawing-room, my Lord Edric was in Mademoiselle Pauline's safe-keeping, and Lady Alice intrenched securely once more.

"Afraid of me?" she thought, when the door opened, as the boy's words recurred to her; "is that it, I wonder? Fancy a London man in this year of grace being afraid, though! Well, he shan't go till I know!—Oh! there you are, Durham!" she said aloud, as he came toward her; "good-morning!"

"Good-morning, Alice!" the victim responded, getting the little patté close within his, and depositing his hat on the table. He was more at a loss than ever what to make of her. She must have got his note of interrogation. Potts had delivered it all right, he knew. And yet, here she was, looking as unconscious as possible; as if she hadn't an idea what he had come for.

"Looks bad, her being so confounded cool. She don't mean to know any thing about it. And then, how the deuce am I to tell her?" he thought, struck speechless at this last notion.

"Well, what's the matter, Durham?" she inquired, finding he stood there silently stroking his mustache, and staring at her rather helplessly. "You got the box, I suppose?"

"Yes," he returned, calling her heartless in his heart. "Yes, I got the box you wanted, Alice."

"Very well. Then sit down, Durham. I've got to scold you."

He sat down in his usual chair—for him, quite nervous.

"She's savage about the letter!" he said to himself. "Knew she would be. Wish I'd let it alone!"

"How can you be so absurd—such an utter goose?"

"Knew she'd call me a goose," he thought, staring moodily at his boots. "It's all up with me, of course."

"Giving that child sovereigns for fighting street-boys! You know how anxious I am about him while I've charge of him; and you go and—"

"Oh," he said, brightening up again; "is that all? Jove! I thought you were angry with me about—about the other thing, you know."

"But I don't know. What other thing, pray?"

"Awful unkind her pretending not to twig!" he muttered. "How ever am I to bring it out now? Gad! it's worse than if I hadn't written at all, you know."

"Well, Durham, I'm all attention. What is it?"

He got up and walked across the room and back before he spoke again. She looked at him wondering. The man was actually excited about something or other. About what?

"Look here, Alice," he said, stopping in front of her; "didn't you get a—note this morning?"

"A note!" she laughed; "dozens, of course."

"But one from me, I mean?"

"Oh, that!" And she laughed again. "Yes, you silly Durham, I had that, too."

"Knew she'd think I was a fool," the "silly Durham" told himself, cut to the heart, and showing his pain by never the quiver of a muscle. Not a Red Indian at the stake ever had to take last of a box of vestas; "you tore 'em up, eh, and left 'em for any other fellow to read?"

"No; for you to read. To show you how absurd you'd been."

"Me to read! Just as if I didn't know 'em by heart. You might have burned 'em, Alice."

"Dear me! What did it matter, pray? Besides, there's no fire, you goose."

"Might have had one lit, you know," he responded, completing his preparations for an auto-da-fé on the broad end of a letter-balance.

She was so used to him that she barely noticed that last remark of his. Besides, she was wondering what could have made him so eloquent about his absurd letter. Couldn't he see he had made a mistake? Or was he thinking still about the one she ought to have had? It suddenly flashed across her that the goose might be meaning one thing and she another; in which case—

Here Durham scraped a vesta, and set the scraps of the unlucky note alight on the paper-weigher. He had got his answer—that cruel laugh just now. She cared nothing for a duffer like him, he saw; nor for his love either, though no one in all the world loved his darling as he did. It was all up with him. There was no use in saying any thing more.

She couldn't see what he was about from and turned him round to the light. He was quite helpless while she held him so. She looked at him curiously.

"Durham," she said, emphatically, "you're excited! Don't deny it now!"—as he moved uneasily—"you are! Now be good enough to tell me what is the meaning of this phenomenon?"

Chaffing him still, he thought she was, and tried to free himself. She twisted him about as if he had been a fractious child, this strong, stalwart grenadier.

"Answer me, Sir!" she said, imperiously, thinking she must make him speak now or never. And she did make him speak.

"You know what I mean fast enough!" he said, rather huskily; "and—and I'd rather not be chaffed any more. Let me go."

"Who is chaffing you, you great goose?"

"You are!" he broke out rather desperately; "you have been all along. I was a fool ever to think you'd care for me. But you needn't laugh at a fellow and call him names."

"Laugh at you?" she repeated.

"It's—it's heartless of you, Alice! By George it is!"

"Durham!"

"I beg your pardon," he said, humbly, utterly ashamed of himself; "I told you I'd better go. I'm not fit to stop here. Good-by, Alice! We've been friends ever since we were little beggars at the Grange together. We mustn't quarrel now, you know."

He had got her hand again, and was bending over it; so that he never saw how pale her face was grown, nor the tears that had leaped into her eyes.

"Jolly little paw!" he muttered; "Colocynth or some other lucky devil will get this, I suppose. And I love her better than any of 'em. It is lines for a fellow, you know!"

"He does care for me, after all!" she was thinking. "What does he want to go for, then? He shan't go!"

And, as she felt her hand being released, the little lady slid gracefully into her chair, and murmured behind her handkerchief the never-failing feminine ducadme:

"Oh, Durham! how can you be so unkind!"

He had got half-way to the door; but he was beside her, bending over her, calling himself a brute, before the words were fairly out of her mouth.

Should he ring for Pauline? No? Should he go away? No? Should he stay? A hand was put back into his once more. He was to stay, when she knew how he—how he—

"How you what, Durham?" my lady murmured, still behind the handkerchief.

"How I love you, Alice!"

"At last!" she said triumphantly to herself. "Do you?" she answered aloud. "Say it again, then. No!" she whispered, with a sudden sharpness that frightened him awfully; "hold your tongue, and get away directly!"

She had seen the door-handle turn, this clever little woman, even then, and knew Barker was coming in.

As he did, before Durham had recovered from this last shock. He stuck his glass in his eye, and stared at the correct butler, who bore straight down upon him.

"Letter for you, Sir," Barker said, exhibiting one on his salver.

"For me, Barker?" Durham asked, taking the document.

"How stupid of Barker!" thought his mistress.

"Wonder whether the beggar saw me!" thought her lover, as he tore open the envelope.

"Mr. Savile's man inquired if you was here, Sir," the unconscious creature explained; "and said it were immediate, if you was."

And then the intruder majestically took himself off.

"From Tom," the lover muttered.

"That must be 'Dear Tom,'" my lady said, guessing what had come in that envelope at last; "you wrote to 'Dear Tom' about Bayadère, this morning, I know."

"How do you know?" he questioned, astounded.

"Because the letter to 'Dear Tom' came to me! I was not to hedge a half-penny; but to put an extra monkey in the pot; and the rest of it. Don't you remember?"

"Gad!" he exclaimed, enlightened all at once; "I must have mistaken the envelopes! You got Tom's note; and he—"

"Got mine, I suppose, you great—I beg your pardon, Durham! I mustn't dare call you names any more. Well; he's sent it back—my note?"

"Yes. Says it don't tell him exactly what he's to do about Bayadère. Jove! I should think it didn't!"

"And what does it tell me, Sir?" she asked, reading it over his arm, on which her hands were crossed. Oh, a note of interrogation! Why couldn't you ask yourself?"

"Afraid of," he replied; "I never could understand you, Alice."

"And you were a puzzle to me," she returned.

"Jove! Fancy that!" he ejaculated, wonderingly.

"And you were afraid to ask me," she went on, with her eyes still on the note of interrogation she had got into her own hands, at last; "and so you wrote this: and will I read it, and tell you if you've a chance when you call this afternoon? Oh, my poor Durham, what did you think of me just now?"

Barker, entering again just then, might have been an even more unwelcome intruder than on the first occasion.

"And the answer, darling?" Durham whispered, presently. And then—well, then Captain Vandeleur's dream came true; for Lady Alice said "Yes."

"YOU'VE EATEN ALL THE CHOCOLATE CREAMS!"

punishment more stoically than the Sybarites of our day must learn to do.

"How could you make such a ridiculous mistake?" she went on.

"Mistake, indeed," he returned, just a little bitterness apparent in his tone; "I see it was a jolly mistake, Alice."

"Of course. Fancy sending that unintelligible jargon to me, Sir!"

"Jargon?" This was rather more than the author could stand quietly. "Jargon? Why, there wasn't a word in it that ain't in the dictionary."

"Your dictionary, then—the Slang Dictionary. Just look at it now. There it is in that basket. There's enough of it left for you to read, I dare say."

He picked the pieces mournfully out of the tumbled chiffons, and crushed them in his hand without looking at them.

"Well?" she asked, her eyes upon some woman's work she had taken up; "can you decipher your own hieroglyphics? It was a long while before I could."

He was behind her now, looking for a light of some sort on the davenport.

"Was it?" he answered. "Ah! and when you had de-what's-his-named-em—"

"No. Deciphered, please."

"Well, deciphered my hiero—"

"—glyphics," she prompted. "Don't go to sleep, Durham!"

"—glyphics," he repeated, getting hold at where she sat; but she heard the crack of the vesta.

"Light that cigar in the hall, Durham," she said, "or go into the conservatory if you want to smoke, please."

"I ain't going to smoke, Alice," poor Durham answered, crushing out the embers of the auto-da-fé, and taking up his hat by its deep-curved brim; "I'm going away now."

She looked up at him and read something she had never seen on that mask of a face before—it is true without quite understanding what she read. But in that moment he wasn't quite master of those quivering muscles. The great golden mustache couldn't hide altogether a certain spasmodic twitching about the mouth. And his voice wasn't quite his voice either, she thought. What was the matter with him?

"Going?" she asked; "what are you going for?"

"I can't stay any longer," he said; "and it's better I should go. I shan't trouble you about this again, Alice. I quite understand. Shake hands, won't you? It'll be the last time, perhaps."

And he held out his honest hand to her.

She was mystified still; yet little by little she began to see plainly into her puzzle—to read her riddle aright.

She got up; she took the curly-brimmed hat out of his hand and put it back on the table again. Then she took both his hands in hers

CORD AND CREESE;

OR,

THE BRANDON MYSTERY.

By THE AUTHOR OF "THE DODGE CLUB."

CHAPTER XXI.

THE DIVING BUSINESS.

In a little street that runs from Broadway, not far from Wall Street, there was a low doorway with dingy panes of glass, over which was a sign which bore the following letters, somewhat faded:

BROCKET & CO., CONTRACTORS.

About a month after his arrival at New York Brandon entered this place and walked up to the desk where a stout, thick-set man was sitting, with his chin on his hands and his elbows on the desk before him.

"Mr. Brocket?" said Brandon, inquiringly.

"Yes, Sir," answered the other, descending from his stool and stepping forward toward Brandon, behind a low table which stood by the desk.

"I am told that you undertake contracts for raising sunken vessels?"

"We are in that line of business."

"You have to make use of diving apparatus?"

"Yes."

"I understand that you have gone into this business to a larger extent than any one in America?"

"Yes, Sir," said Brocket, modestly. "I think we do the leading business in that line."

"I will tell you frankly my object in calling upon you. I have just come from the East Indies for the purpose of organizing a systematic plan for the pearl fisheries. You are aware that out there they still cling to the old fashion of diving, which was begun three thousand years ago. I wish to see if I can not bring science to bear upon it, so as to raise the pearl-oysters in larger quantities."

"That's a good idea of yours," remarked Mr. Brocket, thoughtfully.

"I came to you to see if you could inform me whether it would be practicable or not."

"Perfectly so," said Brocket.

"Do you work with the diving-bell in your business or with armor?"

"With both. We use the diving-bell for stationary purposes; but when it is necessary to move about we employ armor."

"Is the armor adapted to give a man any freedom of movement?"

"The armor is far better than the bell. The armor is so perfect now that a practiced hand can move about under water with a freedom that is surprising. My men go down to examine sunken ships. They go in and out and all through them. Sometimes this is the most profitable part of our business."

"Why so?"

"Why, because there is often money or valuable articles on board, and these always are ours. See," said Brocket, opening a drawer and taking out some silver coin, "here is some money that we found in an old Dutch vessel—that was sunk up the Hudson a hundred years ago. Our men walked about the bed of the river till they found her, and in her cabin they obtained a sum of money that would surprise you—all old coin."

"An old Dutch vessel! Do you often find vessels that have been sunk so long ago?"

"Not often. But we are always on the lookout for them," said Brocket, who had now grown quite communicative. "You see, those old ships always carried ready cash—they didn't use bank-notes and bills of exchange. So if you can only find one you're sure of money."

"Then this would be a good thing to bear in mind in our pearl enterprises?"

"Of course. I should think that out there some reefs must be full of sunken ships. They've been sinking about those coasts ever since the first ship was built."

"How far down can a diver go in armor?"

"Oh, any reasonable depth, when the pressure of the water is not too great. Some pain in the ears is felt at first from the compressed air, but that is temporary. Men can easily go down as far as fifteen or sixteen fathoms."

"How long can they stay down?"

"In the bells, you know, they go down and are pulled up only in the middle of the day and at evening, when their work is done."

"How with the men in armor?"

"Oh, they can stand it almost as well. They come up oftener, though. There is one advantage in the armor: a man can fling off his weight and come up whenever he likes."

"Have you ever been down yourself?"

"Oh yes—oftener than any of my men. I'm the oldest diver in the country, I think. But I don't go down often now. It's hard work, and I'm getting old."

"Is it much harder than other work?"

"Well, you see, it's unnatural sort of work, and is hard on the lungs. Still, I always was healthy. The real reason why I stopped was a circumstance that happened two years ago."

"What was that?"

Brocket drew a long breath, looked for a moment meditatively at the floor, and then went on: "Well, there happened to be a wreck of a steamer called the Saladin down off the North Carolina coast, and I thought I would try her as a speculation, for I supposed that there might be considerable money on board one way or another. It was a very singular affair. Only two men had escaped; it was so sudden. They said the vessel struck a rock at night when the water was perfectly still, and went down in a few minutes, before the passengers could even be awakened. It may seem horrid to you, but you must know that a ship-load of passengers is very profitable, for they all carry money. Besides, there are their trunks, and the clerk's desk, and so on. So, this time, I went down myself. The ship lay on one side of the rock which had pierced her, having floated off just before sinking; and I had no difficulty in getting on board. After walking about the deck I went at once into the saloon. Sir," said Brocket, with an awful look at Brandon, "if I should live for a hundred years I should never forget the sight that I saw. A hundred passengers or more had been on board, and most of them had rushed out of their state-rooms as the vessel began to sink. Very many of them lay on the floor, a frightful multitude of dead."

"But there were others," continued Brocket, in a lower tone, "who had clutched at pieces of furniture, at the doors, and at the chairs, and many of these had held on with such a rigid clutch that death itself had not unlocked it. Some were still upright, with distorted features, and staring eyes, clinging, with frantic faces, to the nearest object that they had seen. Several of them stood around the table. The most frightful thing was this: that they were all staring at the door."

"But the worst one of all was a corpse that was on the saloon table. The wretch had leaped there in his first mad impulse, and his hands had clutched a brass bar that ran across. He was facing the door; his hands were still clinging, his eyes glared at me, his jaw had fallen. The hideous face seemed grimacing at and threatening me. As I entered the water was disturbed by my motion. An undulation set in movement by my entrance passed through the length of the saloon. All the corpses swayed for a moment. I stopped in horror. Scarcely had I stopped when the corpses, agitated by the motion

Brandon of course expressed all the gratitude that so generous an offer could excite.

"But there's no use trying just yet; wait till the month of May, and then you can begin. You have nerve, and I have no doubt that you'll learn fast."

After this interview Brandon had many others. To give credibility to his pretended plan for the pearl fisheries, he bought a dozen suits of diving armor and various articles which Brocket assured him that he would need. He also brought Cato with him one day, and the Hindu described the plan which the pearl-divers pursued on the Malabar coast. According to Cato each diver had a stone which weighed about thirty pounds tied to his foot, and a sponge filled with oil fastened around his neck. On plunging into the water, the weight carried him down. When the diver reached the bottom the oiled sponge was used from time to time to enable him to breathe by inhaling the air through the sponge applied to his mouth. All this was new to Brocket. It excited his ardor.

The month of May at last came. Brocket showed them a place in the Hudson, about twenty miles above the city, where they could practice. Under his direction Brandon put on the armor and went down. Frank worked the pumps which supplied him with air, and Cato managed the boat. The two Brandons learned their parts rapidly, and Louis, who had the hardest task, improved so quickly, and caught the idea of the work so readily, that Brocket enthusiastically assured him that he was a natural-born diver.

All this time Brandon was quietly making arrangements for a voyage. He gradually obtained every thing which might by any possibility be required, and which he found out by long deliberations with Frank and by hints which he gained by well-managed questions to Brocket.

Thus the months of May and June passed until at length they were ready to start.

"AN ISLAND COVERED WITH PALM-TREES LAY THERE."

CHAPTER XXII.

THE ISLET OF SANTA CRUZ.

It was July when Brandon left New York for San Salvador.

He had purchased a beautiful little schooner, which he had fitted up like a gentleman's yacht, and stored with all the articles which might be needed. In cruising about the Bahama Isles he intended to let it be supposed that he was traveling for pleasure. True, the month of July was not the time of the year which pleasure-seekers would choose for sailing in the West Indies, but of this he did not take much thought.

The way to the Bahama Isles was easy. They stopped for a while at Nassau, and then went to San Salvador.

The first part of the New World which Columbus discovered is now but seldom visited, and few inhabitants are found there. Only six hundred people dwell upon it, and these have in general but little intelligence. On reaching this place Brandon sailed to the harbor which Columbus entered, and made many inquiries about that immortal landing. Traditions still survived among the people, and all were glad to show the rich Englishman the lions of the place.

He was thus enabled to make inquiries without exciting suspicion about the islands lying to the north. He was informed that about four leagues north there was an island named Guahi, and as there was no island known in that direction named Santa Cruz, Brandon thought that this might be the one. He asked if there were any small islets or sand-banks near there, but no one could tell him. Having gained all the information that he could he pursued his voyage.

In that hot season there was but little wind. The seas were visited by profound calms which continued long and rendered navigation slow and tedious. Sometimes, to prevent themselves from being swept away by the currents, they had to cast anchor. At other times they were forced to keep in close by the shore. They waited till the night came on, and then, putting out the sweeps, they rowed the yacht slowly along.

It was the middle of July before they reached the island of Guahi, which Brandon thought might be Santa Cruz. If so, then one league due north of this there ought to be the islet of the Three Needles. Upon the discovery of that would depend their fate.

It was evening when they reached the southern shore of Guahi. Now was the time when all the future depended upon the fact of the existence of an islet to the north. That night on the south shore was passed in deep anxiety. They rowed the vessel on with their sweeps, but the island was too large to be passed in one night. Morning came, and still they rowed.

The morning passed, and the hot sun burned down upon them, yet they still toiled on, seeking to pass beyond a point which lay ahead, so as to see the open water to the north. Gradually they neared it, and the sea-view in front opened up more and more widely. There was nothing but water. More and more of the view exposed itself, until at last the whole horizon was visible. Yet there was no land there—no island—no sign of those three rocks which they longed so much to find.

A light wind arose which enabled them to sail over all the space that lay one league to the north. They sounded as they went, but found only deep water. They looked all around, but found not so much as the smallest point of land above the surface of the ocean.

That evening they cast anchor and went ashore at the island of Guahi to see if any one knew of other islands among which might be found one named Santa Cruz. Their disappointment was profound. Brandon for a while thought that perhaps some other San Salvador was meant in the letter. This very idea had occurred to him before, and he had made himself acquainted with all the places of that name that existed. None of them seemed, however, to answer the requirements of the writing. Some must have gained the name since; others were so situated that no island could be mentioned as lying to the north. On the whole, it seemed to him that this San Salvador of Columbus could alone be mentioned. It was alluded to as a well-known place, of which particular description was unnecessary, and no other place at that day had this character except the one on which he had decided.

One hope yet remained, a faint one, but still a hope, and this might yet be realized. It was that Guahi was not Santa Cruz; but that some other island lay about here, which might be considered as north from San Salvador. This could be ascertained here in Guahi better perhaps than any where else. With this faint hope he landed.

Guahi is only a small island, and there are but few inhabitants upon it, who support themselves partly by fishing. In this delightful climate their wants are not numerous, and the rich soil produces almost any thing which they desire. The fish about here are not plentiful, and what they catch have to be sought for at a long distance off.

"Are there any other islands near this?" asked Brandon of some people whom he met on landing.

"Not very near."

"Which is the nearest?"

"San Salvador."

"Are there any other in about this latitude?"

"Well, there is a small one about twelve leagues east. There are no people on it though."

"What is its name?"

"Santa Cruz."

Brandon's heart beat fast at the sound of that name. It must be so. It must be the island which he sought. It lay to the north of San Salvador, and its name was Santa Cruz.

"It is not down on the charts?"

"No. It is only a small islet."

Another confirmation, for the message said plainly an islet, whereas Guahi was an island.

"How large is it?"

"Oh, perhaps a mile or a mile and a half long."

"Is there any other island near it?"

"I don't know."

"Have you ever been there?"

"No."

Plainly no further information could be gathered here. It was enough to have hope strengthened and an additional chance for success. Brandon obtained as near as possible the exact direction of Santa Cruz, and, going back to the yacht, took advantage of the light breeze which still was blowing and set sail.

Night came on very dark, but the breeze still continued to send its light breath, and before this the vessel gently glided on. Not a thing could be seen in that intense darkness. Toward morning Louis Brandon, who had remained up all night in his deep anxiety, tried to pierce through the gloom as he strained his eyes, and seemed as though he would force the darkness to reveal that which he sought. But the darkness gave no token.

Not Columbus himself, when looking out over these waters, gazed with greater eagerness, nor did his heart beat with greater anxiety of suspense, than that which Brandon felt as his vessel glided slowly through the dark waters, the same over which Columbus had passed, and moved amidst the impenetrable gloom. But the long night of suspense glided by at last; the darkness faded, and the dawn came.

Frank Brandon, on waking about sunrise, came up and saw his brother looking with fixed intensity of gaze at something directly in front. He turned to see what it might be.

An island covered with palm-trees lay there. Its extent was small, but it was filled with the rich verdure of the tropics. The gentle breeze ruffled the waters, but did not altogether efface the reflection of that beautiful islet.

Louis pointed toward the northeast. Frank looked.

It seemed to be about two miles away. It was a low sand island about a quarter of a mile long. From its surface projected three rocks thin and sharp. They were at unequal distances from each other, and in the middle of the islet. The tallest one might have been about twelve feet in height, the others eight and ten feet respectively.

Louis and Frank exchanged one long look, but said not a word. That look was an eloquent one. This then was unmistakably the place of their search.

The islet with the three rocks like needles lying north of Santa Cruz. One league due north of this was the spot where now rested all their hopes.

The island of Santa Cruz was, as had been told them, not more than a mile and a half in length, the sand island with the needles lay about two miles north of it. On the side of Santa Cruz which lay nearest to them was a small cove just large enough for the yacht. Here, after some delay, they were able to enter and land.

The tall trees that covered the island rose over beautiful glades and grassy slopes. Too small and too remote to give support to any number of inhabitants, it had never been touched by the hand of man, but stood before them in all that pristine beauty with which nature had first endowed it. It reminded Brandon in some degree of that African island where he had passed some time with Beatrice. The recollection of this brought over him an intolerable melancholy, and made the very beauty of this island painful to him. Yet hope was now strong within his heart, and as he traversed its extent his eye wandered about in search of places where he might be able to conceal the treasure that lay under the sea, if he were ever able to recover it from its present place. The island afforded many spots which were well adapted to such a purpose.

In the centre of the island a rock jutted up, which was bald and flat on its summit. On the western side it showed a precipice of some forty or fifty feet in height, and on the eastern side it descended to the water in a steep slope. The tall trees which grew all around shrouded it from the view of those at sea, but allowed the sea to be visible on every side. Climbing to this place, they saw something which showed them that they could not hope to carry on any operations for that day.

On the other side of the island, about ten miles from the shore, there lay a large brig becalmed. It looked like one of those vessels that are in the trade between the United States and the West Indies. As long as that vessel was in the neighborhood it would not do even to make a beginning, nor did Brandon care about letting his yacht be seen. Whatever he did he wished to do secretly.

The brig continued in sight all day, and they remained on the island. Toward evening they took the small boat and rowed out to the sand-bank which they called Needle Islet. It was merely a low spit of sand, with these three singularly-shaped rocks projecting upward. There was nothing else whatever to be seen upon it. The moon came up as they stood there, and their eyes wandered involuntarily to the north, to that place, a league away, where the treasure lay beneath the waters.

THE VICTIM.

BY ALFRED TENNYSON.

I.

A PLAGUE upon the people fell,
A famine after laid them low,
Then thorpe and byre arose in fire,
For on them brake the sudden foe;
So thick they died the people cried
"The Gods are moved against the land."
The Priest in horror about his altar
To Thor and Odin lifted a hand.

"Help us from famine
And plague and strife!
What would you have of us?
Human life?
Were it our nearest,
Were it our dearest
(Answer, O answer),
We give you his life."

II.

But still the foeman spoil'd and burn'd,
And cattle died, and deer in wood,
And bird in air, and fishes turn'd
And whiten'd all the rolling flood;
And dead men lay all over the way,
Or down in a furrow scathed with flame:
And ever and aye the Priesthood moan'd
Till at last it seemed that an answer came:
"The King is happy
In child and wife;
Take you his nearest,
Take you his dearest,
Give us a life."

III.

The Priest went out by heath and hill;
The King was hunting in the wild;
They found the mother sitting still;
She cast her arms about the child.
The child was only eight summers old,
His beauty still with his years increased,
His face was ruddy, his hair was gold,
He seem'd a victim due to the priest.
The Priest exulted,
And cried with joy,
"Here is his nearest,
Here is his dearest,
We take the boy."

IV.

The King return'd from out the wild,
He bore but little game in hand;
The mother said "They have taken the child,
To spill his blood and heal the land:
The land is sick, the people diseased,
And blight and famine on all the lea:
The holy Gods, they must be appeased,
So I pray you tell the truth to me.
They have taken our son,
They will have his life.
Is he your nearest?
Is he your dearest?
(Answer, O answer)
Or I, the wife?"

V.

The King bent low, with hand on brow,
He stay'd his arms upon his knee:
"O wife, what use to answer now?
For now the Priest has judged for me."
The King was shaken with holy fear;
"The Gods," he said, "would have chosen well;
Yet both are near, and both are dear,
And which the dearest I can not tell!"
But the Priest was happy,
His victim won.
"We have his nearest,
We have his dearest,
His only son!"

VI.

The rites prepared, the victim bared,
The knife uprising toward the blow,
To the altar-stone she sprang alone,
"Me, me, not him, my darling, no!"
He caught her away with a sudden cry;
Suddenly from him brake the wife,
And shrieking "I am his dearest, I—
I am his dearest!" rush'd on the knife.
And the Priest was happy,
"O, Father Odin,
We give you a life.
Which was his nearest?
Which was his dearest?
The Gods have answered:
We give them the wife!"

CULTURE OF BULBS AS HOUSE PLANTS.

BULBOUS roots are most easily cultivated in the house, and few plants better repay the amateur florist for his care and attention. Hyacinths rank first on the list.

In glasses they are grown with little care. Place a small bit of charcoal at the bottom of the glass; fill with rain or spring water; place the bulb half an inch from the water, and put your glass in a dark, cool closet for six weeks. By that time the roots are well developed, and the flower spike has pushed up two or three inches. Now bring your glass into the light and give it all the sun you can. Two drops of liquid ammonia every week will intensify the color and increase the beauty of your flower. The water need not be changed, the charcoal keeping it sweet; but as it evaporates add a little more. If moss can be easily obtained a margin of it around the glass adds to the beauty of its appearance and keeps the bulb moist. People in the country can not easily supply themselves with hyacinth glasses. The mail-bags will bring them bulbs from any seed-store or florist, but not the fragile glass. Yet every housewife's closet will furnish a glass or china dish, or even a white pudding dish may be made "a thing of beauty."

Place several bits of charcoal at the bottom of the dish; fill up with sand, heaping it toward the centre. Then place your bulbs, leaving the crown above the sand. In the interstices plant smaller bulbs—crocuses, scillas, snow-drops. A mingling of all is effective. Now immerse your dish in water to settle and thoroughly wet the sand. Place in a dark, cool closet for six weeks, by which time the tender rootlets are well developed, the flower spike has pushed up. Now give all the sun possible. Add once a week in a half tea-cup of water (if the dish is large) three drops of ammonia; and the result will fully repay the expense and care. We arranged a large dish last year as follows: six hyacinths (the single kinds bloom best in the house), one dark and one light blue; one white, one yellow; one dark and one light pink, were placed around the edge of the dish. In the centre a polyanthus narcissus, Étoile d'or, reared its stately head; all around it the blue, yellow, and variegated crocuses opened their bell-shaped flowers, and blue and white scillas; and the lovely snow-drops grouped about produced a most charming effect. The miniature garden was admired by all. Three dollars would more than purchase the bulbs, and to a lover of flowers would give weeks of unalloyed pleasure.

Hyacinths, crocuses, and scillas may be grown in wet moss alone. Take a bunch of moss, thoroughly saturate it, place your bulbs in the centre, leaving a large circumference for the roots to develop in; make the ball of moss six inches in diameter. Take small wire, twist all around the ball in every direction. You can suspend it from the window or chandelier with tasteful cords, or the same wire; but first keep in a dark, cool place for six weeks. This is needful for all bulbs grown in the house. The tiny rootlets must be well grown before air and light are given.

These balls of moss with a lovely flower in bloom are pretty ornaments for parlor, boudoir, or chamber, and are most easily made. Exceedingly pretty rustic baskets are made of the small round boughs of the oak or maple. Gather the sticks about an inch in diameter; saw them ten inches long; pierce each end (an inch from the end) with a heated iron wire; procure a thin board ten inches square; pierce a hole through each corner; now have some wire (a good-sized wire is needed) ready; take your sticks and place one upon another, as children in the olden time made cob-houses, or put your fingers one upon the other, and you will see the effect; now run your wire through the burned holes and the bottom board, turn it up with pincers at the top and bottom; proceed in this way at each corner, and you have your basket! Now line each side and the bottom with moss; crowd in the moss well on the sides so that it will project between the sticks; fill up with any good soil; plant a hyacinth in the centre and at each corner, in the interstices snow-drops or crocuses, and set it away; when you bring it out you can add any vines you please. Attach cords to the four sides and suspend your basket. If you are not satisfied with the effect of your work you are no lover of the beautiful. We once saw an herbaceous house where fifty of these baskets hung from the walls and the rustic boughs. The effect was perfect! The most costly parian marble, or Wedgewood ware could not equal it.

Cyclamens are easily grown, and are very lovely. A common saucer filled with moss will grow them nicely. In pots, four bulbs can grow in a six-inch pot. The flowers are star-shaped, and of every shade of red and pink, often mingled with white. The blossoms are very numerous and lovely, and well repay the needed care.

Oxalis is a beautiful bulb. It blooms in the winter and spring in great profusion. In hanging-baskets, or in pots suspended from the window, it is a great ornament. The colors are rose, white, bright yellow, and variegated pink and white. Three or four should be planted in a five-inch pot. The leaves are clover-shaped and very ornamental; the flowers are salver-shaped and bloom in clusters. The best time for planting is October or November. This bulb does not need seclusion from the light at any time. Oxalis bona and alba are very handsome, and can be purchased from fifteen to twenty cents each.

Anemones are highly ornamental, and deserve more extensive culture. The flowers are large, with large outer petals, the centre being filled with numerous small petals, like the hollyhock, and they continue a long time in bloom. Use pots four or five inches in diameter, fill with strong, loamy soil, mixed with old cow-manure. Fill to within two inches of the top, place on the tubers, three in a pot; cover with sand; then fill up the pots with loam; give a good watering; place in the dark for six weeks, and then remove to the sunlight. Your pots will soon be a mass of beauty. The colors are scarlet, red, pink, blue, and variegated.

Ranunculus: For symmetry of form and brilliancy of color of almost every hue, this bulb is unequalled. They are difficult of culture in the open ground, but may be cultivated with good success in pots or boxes in the parlor. Proceed in every respect as with the anemones. When the flowers are past and the tops are decayed, take up the roots and put them away till next October or November, and they will bloom as finely the following winter.

Hyacinths will not bloom the next season. They can be planted out in the ground the following October, and in a year or so will make fine bulbs. Anemones can be treated like the ranunculus. Crocuses and snow-drops can also be kept till the next winter.

Early dwarf Duc Van Tholl tulips are much sought for now, and universally admired. They are finely adapted for winter blooming, either in sand, moss, or water. If planted in October, or very early in November, they will bloom in January. Their colors are very brilliant. Twelve bulbs in a good-sized pot make a great show, and require very little care. After planting set away from the light for four or six weeks. The gold-striped is the greatest novelty. Single bulbs are twenty-five cents; others range from five to twenty cents.

DEALINGS WITH THE DEIL.

PLAY-GOERS must have observed that no class of pieces are so uniformly successful as those in which the devil, or diabolical agency, or a personage possessing diabolical attributes, is introduced. If no devil nor imp in any shape can be brought in, it is sometimes enough to pay the fiend the compliment of recognition by mentioning him in the title—as, for instance, in Fra Diavolo. In support of the general proposition, Don Juan, Faust, Der Freischütz, Robert le Diable, the Devil on Two Sticks, the Devil to Pay, and a long list of favorite works, including three or four master-pieces, might be pointed to. Recourse to the devil's aid may be had in various ways; but when a diabolical atmosphere pervades the whole play, as in Der Freischütz, it is not found necessary to do homage to the evil spirit in the play-bill; nor when his name is made so conspicuous, and is repeated so often as it is in Fra Diavolo, does it seem requisite that he or his should be mixed up with the action of the drama. Let the least acknowledgment of his power in any shape be made, and the Prince of Darkness, who is notoriously a gentleman, is sure to respond.

It is true that in Faust, Der Freischütz, Robert, and most works in which a struggle between the principles of good and evil is exhibited, the devil in the end generally comes off second-best. Still, there he is. Instead of being ignored, as practically he is in modern everyday life, he is caused to figure as an important and irresistible agent in human affairs, and only succumbs at last to that higher Power, beneath whose blows even the Napoleon imagined by Victor Hugo fell crushed at Waterloo. Besides, how many people wait to see the dénouement of these pieces? Robert le Diable is a magnificent opera, but it is in five acts; and if every one does not leave the theatre after the trio in the fifth, even the few who remain begin to think of going; and the final overthrow of the satanic Bertram is scarcely witnessed by any one.

But in every literary work in which the hero makes a formal compact with the fiend diabolical interests are, on the whole, very well served; and this from the time of Theophilus of Syracuse, the first man who is recorded to have formally sold himself to the devil, though by no means the first, and certainly not the last, who has done so informally, perhaps even unconsciously, but actually all the same. In all these cases it is a decided advantage to the hero to have bartered away his soul, as per agreement. He invariably gets it back again in the end, and in the mean time he is all-powerful in worldly matters. No woman can resist his eyes, nor can any man stand against his sword. Every wish that he may form, while the compact lasts, is gratified; and finally, when he wants to cheat the devil, all he has to do is to repent for five minutes and be eternally saved. This is not a bad career; and it is pretty nearly the career of Faust, as the drama, whether in a purely dramatic or in an operatic form, is represented on our stage; of Robert, in Meyerbeer's celebrated work; and of Rodolph, in Der Freischütz.

Don Juan, who has come to no regular understanding with the fiend, does not escape so easily; and this shows the disadvantage of not conducting your affairs, whatever they may be, in a proper business-like manner. Don Juan has opened an account with the infernal regions, but without seeing the head of the establishment, and without making any arrangement as to when and where he is to pay. It seems to have been the usual practice at this shop to make customers enter into personal recognizances beforehand; and as their agreements and bonds were always proved to be worthless when payment was demanded, all who conformed to the rules of the establishment got off scot-free. Don Juan, however, was too lawless even for the infernal regions. Otherwise the eternally devoted Elvira might have saved him, through the artful device of shifting his responsibility on to some other and more unfortunate man.

That stories of diabolical agency have a great charm for the public can not be denied; it may be argued, however, that it is not because the agency is diabolical, but simply because it is supernatural, that they are found so fascinating. When the opera of Robert le Diable was first produced it excited a perfect storm of disapprobation; and "shocking," "revolting," were the mildest epithets applied to it. Since then, however, the devil has become a perfectly well-received personage at nearly all theatres.

GASTRONOMY.

ENGLISH PLUM-PUDDING.—1½ pounds raisins, ½ pound currants, ½ pound bread crumbs, ½ pound flour, ½ pound beef suet, nine eggs, one wine-glass of brandy, ½ pound citron and orange peel, half a nutmeg, and a little ground ginger. Chop the suet fine and mix it with the bread crumbs and flour, add the currants washed and dried, the citron and orange peel cut in thin slices, and the raisins stoned and divided. Mix it all well together with the grated nutmeg and ginger, stir in nine eggs well beaten and the brandy, stir the whole again thoroughly, put into a buttered mould, tie it up tightly; and boil for six hours. Pour brandy over it when served. This pudding may be made a month before using, boiled in a cloth and hung up in a dry place. When required for use put it into a sauce-pan of boiling water, boil for two hours and a half, turn it out, and serve as above.

The following recipe for mince-meat may be found useful at this season, divested of rhyme:

A POETICAL RECIPE FOR MAKING GOOD MINCE-MEAT.

I've a scheme in my head—one not void of reason,
As perhaps you'll admit—this being the season
When of large meat and fat meat there's always a choice,
And the meat I shall treat of has every one's voice.
My scheme is to lay now before you in rhyme
How good mince-meat is made—much consumed at this time.

To begin, then: Take first of beef suet two pound;
Mark! the choicest around the ox kidneys is found.
You must chop this as fine as you possibly can;
And your spice mix well with it—'tis far the best plan;
Take of cinnamon, cassia, and mace quantum suff—
Say one ounce (or more, if that be not enough);
Ground ginger and allspice, together one ounce take;
And with two nutmegs grated a fine mixture make;
But please your own palate. Add of sweetmeats cut small,

Citron, lemon, and orange-peel, one pound in all.
Your raisins be sure to stone well—two pound like-wise—

And chop with your russets. Are these of good size?
Two dozen will answer; but if small, two score,
And mix all well up with what's mention'd before.
Next three pounds of new currants, well wash'd, picked, and dried,

And the rind of four lemons, chop'd fine, add beside.
Stoneless raisins there are, but the stalks take away—
Sultanas they call them; and these, the folks say,
Increase much the richness—so just add two pound,
If your patience to pick them clean equal be found.
Of loaf sugar, crush'd fine, take two breakfast-cups full,
And on this squeeze your lemons. Then out your corks pull,

Of port-wine a gill add, a half-pint of brandy,
Some essence of lemon, or any thing handy
Which may heighten the flavor. Some people put beef,
But I think the omission is quite a relief,
For without it the compound has small chance to spoil,
And improves to the last, as reward for your toil.

VEAL À LA MAINTENON.—Take three pounds of lean veal; two thin slices salt pork; chop all very fine. Add two slices stale bread rubbed through a colander; three well-beaten eggs; three table-spoonfuls tomato catchup; one glass claret wine; one tea-spoonful pepper; one table-spoonful heaped of salt; two table-spoonfuls sifted sage or marjoram. Mix all well together. Take a biscuit pan, put in the mixture, arranging it in the shape of an omelette, high in the centre. Pound fine two Boston crackers; sprinkle all over the top. Melt two table-spoonfuls of butter in a tea-cup of water, and as the loaf bakes baste it thoroughly with this. Bake three hours. Make the day before using. Cut in very thin slices. Is excellent for breakfast, or supper, or side dish.

GUNPOWDER, $1 25; best, $1 50 per lb.

Coffees roasted and ground daily.

Ground Coffee, 20 cents, 25 cents, 30 cents, 35 cents; best, 40 cents per pound.

Hotels, saloons, boarding-house keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our

FRENCH BREAKFAST AND DINNER COFFEE, which we sell at the low price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 50 cents to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St., (Post-Office Box 5643,) N. Y.

To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea Trade (previous to the establishment of the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,) we will start with the American Houses, leaving out of the account entirely the profits of the Chinese factors.

First. The American House in China or Japan makes large profits on their sales or shipments—and some of the richest retired merchants in this country have made their immense fortunes through their houses in China.

Second. The Banker makes large profits upon the foreign exchange used in the purchase of Teas.

Third. The Importer makes a profit of 30 to 50 per cent. in many cases.

Fourth. On its arrival here it is sold by the cargo, and the Purchaser sells it to the Speculator in invoices of 1000 to 2000 packages, at an average profit of about 10 per cent.

Fifth. The Speculator sells it to the Wholesale Tea Dealer in lines at a profit of 10 to 15 per cent.

Sixth. The Wholesale Tea Dealer sells it to the Wholesale Grocer in lots to suit his trade at a profit of about 10 per cent.

Seventh. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail Dealer at a profit of 15 to 25 per cent.

Eighth. The Retailer sells it to the Consumer for ALL THE PROFIT HE CAN GET.

When you have added to these EIGHT profits as many brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, and add the original cost of the Tea, it will be perceived what the consumer has to pay. And now we propose to show why we can sell so very much lower than small dealers.

We propose to do away with all these various profits and brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, with the exception of a small commission paid for purchasing to our correspondents in China and Japan, one cartage, and a small profit to ourselves—which, on our large sales, will amply pay us.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city. Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a Club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a Club say how much Tea or Coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price-List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete, send it to us by mail. We will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost—so that there need be no confusion in their distribution: each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the Club can divide equally among themselves.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford.

We send no complimentary package for clubs of less than thirty dollars.

COUNTRY CLUBS. Hand and Wagon Peddlers, and small stores (of which class we are supplying many thousands, all of which are doing well), can have their orders promptly and faithfully filled, and, in case of Clubs, can have each party's name marked on their package and directed, by sending their orders to Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey street.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than thirty dollars had better send post-office drafts, or money, with their orders, to save the expense of collecting by express; but larger orders we will send by express, to collect on delivery.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third by sending directly to

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.

Beware of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are

BOGUS OR IMITATIONS.

We have no branches, and do not in any case authorize the use of our name.

Post-Office Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.

RISE AND FALL OF CRINOLINE.

THE RISE AND FALL OF CRINOLINE.

IV.

ANNO 1756, DRESDEN.—A few weeks before the commencement of the Seven Years' War certain lords and ladies of the Saxon court were making great preparations for a French comedy, with which they wished to astonish King Augustus III. Frederick the Great, however, astonished him beforehand by a sudden advance on three sides of Saxony. The king and his all-powerful minister Brühl fled to Warsaw; the French comedy came to nothing; and La Saxe galante died, as it were, of suicide. To understand this phrase thoroughly, we must read Pölnitz's book under the same title, which tells us that Brühl kept 200 servants, and that his guard of honor was better paid than the king's. His table was the most costly, his wardrobe was the most splendid, and his general style of living the most magnificent of any in the kingdom. He was the man of his century who possessed the largest quantity of clothes, watches, lace, boots, shoes, and slippers. His library, which he never used, contained 60,000 volumes, and his garden and palace still exist to show to what lengths a minister of La Saxe galante could go. "Have I any money, Brühl?" was the constantly recurring question of Augustus III.; and, in order to answer "Yes, Sire," Brühl had to exhaust the treasury, and burden the country with debts. By this means the luxury of the court of Dresden exceeded any thing ever known in Germany. Louis XIV. was the chosen model; and Pölnitz was an accurate copy of Versailles. A courtier must smell of musk ten paces off; his wig must be white, pink, or sky blue, according to the day; his gait must be a strut, his voice small, and his eyes short-sighted. Such was a man comme il faut. The ladies, of course, were not far behind. The arrangement of their hair required a wire structure from half to three quarters of a yard high; white and black ostrich feathers waved on all sides; patches heightened the colors of their painted faces; their dresses were embroidered with gold and silver; and five thousand dollars' worth of lace on their arms was nothing extraordinary. A change had arisen, however, in the cut of the skirt, which does credit to the inventiveness of those days. The enormous dimensions of the Pompadour skirt had gone out; and secret pads were worn on the hips and round the waist—a fashion which was named à la Kolowrat, after the maiden name of Brühl's wife.

FACETIÆ.

THE following advertisement lately appeared in a journal: "Wanted, a general servant, in a small family, where a man is kept. The house-work and cooking all done by the members of the family. The gentleman of the house rises early, but prepares breakfast himself. All the washing is put out, and the kitchen provided with every comfort and luxury. Cold meat and hash studiously avoided. Wages no objection to a competent party. References and photographs exchanged."

Little Susie, poring over a book in which angels were represented as winged beings, suddenly remarked, with vehemence, "Mamma, I don't want to be an angel, and I needn't, need I?" "Why, Susie?" questioned her mother. "Humph! leave off all my pretty clothes, and wear fudders like a hen!"

In a pool across a road in the county of Tipperary is stuck up a pole, having affixed to it a board with this inscription: "Take notice, that when the water is over this board the road is impassable."

It is supposed by learned theologians, such as Petros Camotor, that Adam entered the Garden of Eden in the Spring. However that may be, it is certain that he came out in the Fall.

PROPHECIES FOR 1868.

January.—More or less ice, skating, and pantomimes may be predicted. Falls of snow and old gentlemen on pavements; falls of stocks; falls of lace on ladies' bonnets.
February.—Probable rain and consequent borrowing of umbrellas. The Fenians, and several other people, will exhibit signs of discontent.
March.—Numerous March airs will play among the barrel-organs. Several bankruptcies will take place this month.
April.—On the first day of this month several people will be made fools of; on the following twenty-nine days many others will make fools of themselves.
May.—Moving scenes to be witnessed every where. Probable prevalence of hot or cold weather.
June.—During this month you may expect the Pope to quit Rome of his own accord. N.B. You will be disappointed.
July.—The weather very hot, unless atmospheric influences prevent it.
August.—Terrible agitation in all the cities. Most of the inhabitants exiled to the mountains or sea-shore. Fearful slaughter in consequence.
September.—Outbreak among the natives of the Uninhabited Islands. This movement is of great political importance.
October.—A revolution in some part of South America, such as occurs about every week, may be safely predicted.
November.—Great political excitement, culminating in an election, in which somebody will be chosen president.
December.—Great torture of the English language by pantomime writers. Feast of St. Rosbif; after which, Vigil of St. Dyspepsia. Brilliant illumination by the appearance of the Christmas Number of Harper's Bazar.

Which is the oldest tree?—The elder tree, of course.

Why is a washer-woman the most cruel person in the world?—Because she daily wrings men's bosoms.

When does a bill remind us of the morning?—When it's due.

When is it like a thief?—When it's taken up.

Why are persons born blind unfit to be carpenters?—Because they never saw.

A MUSICAL CATECHISM.

What is a slur?—Almost any remark one singer makes about another.
What is a rest?—Going out of the choir for refreshments during the sermon time.
What is singing with an "understanding"?—Making time on the floor with your feet.
What is a symphony?—Flirting with the soprano singer behind the organ.
What is a staccato movement?—Leaving the choir in a huff because you are dissatisfied with the organist.
What is a swell?—A professor of music who pretends to know every thing about the science, while he can not conceal his ignorance.
How do you cause a discord?—By praising a lady singer at the expense of a rival, who overhears you.
How is a shake produced?—By catching the bellows' boy asleep when the choir is ready to sing.
What is a flat?—A singer who supposes himself or herself indispensable to the success of the choir.

QUARTER-MASTERS—Landlords.

Nonsense has been described as sense that differs from one's own.

A butcher-boy says he has often heard of the fore-quarters of the globe, but has never heard any person say any thing about the hind-quarters.

An indiscreet man confided a secret to another, and begged him not to repeat it. "It's all right," was the reply, "I will be as close as you were."

"Doctor, what will cure the fever of love?"—"The chill of wedlock, mademoiselle."

DIOGENES'S TUB TALK.

The fewer relations or friends that we have the happier we are. In your poverty they never help you; in your prosperity they always help themselves.
Make friends of your creditors if you can; but never make a creditor of your friend. It only gives him another excuse for being disagreeable.
If you have talent and ambition, never look to your family to help you on in life. They will do all they can to keep you under; but if you still succeed in rising, they will all want to stand on your shoulders.
When a rogue means to utter a worse lie than usual he generally prefaces it with "To tell you the truth."
Men show such gross credulity in love that they can not wonder if women show a little in religion.
When a wife is indifferent as to how her husband spends his time you may be sure she is more indifferent as to how she spends her own.
Men say truth lives at the bottom of a well—and they take care not to disturb her.
Take this as a general rule in life: The more reasons a man or woman has to be grateful to you the more excuses he or she has to injure you.

Promenade and Demi Toilettes.

Fig. 1.—Dress of Metternich green velours, trimmed with wide black military braid, set on in blocks round the bottom, and simulating lappets with buttons on each breadth of the skirt. Short paletot of the same material as the dress, and trimmed with wide braid and buttons to match the latter, the braid simulating a berth on the upper part of the paletot. Bonnet of Metternich green velvet, with grebe trimming, and fall of black lace over the chignon.

Fig. 2.—Under-skirt of purple gros grain, trimmed with three rows of wide black galloon. Fourreau of black gros grain, festooned with the same galloon, down the middle of which passementerie buttons are set. Castellated, scalloped trimming, bound with silk and surmounted with galloon, adorns the alternate breadths of the fourreau. Short paletot of black velvet, trimmed with heavy silk fringe, galloon, buttons, and velvet scallops. Bonnet of purple velvet, with a deep fall of lace over the chignon, and a gilt band with cut steel ornaments in front. Astrakhan muff, without tassels.

Fig. 3.—Gored dress of Mentana red poulx de soie, with ladder trimming on the sides, consisting of satin folds of the same color, edged with black guipure lace and studded with passementerie buttons. The same satin folds and buttons form a graduated turret trimming around the back and front, as seen in the illustration. The bottom is trimmed with a heavy satin cord, surmounted by scalloped satin, edged with guipure lace. High waist and close sleeves, trimmed to match the skirt.

TOILETTE ARTICLES.—Fig. 1. Cravat of scarlet and black satin, trimmed with scarlet net fringe.—Fig. 2. Coiffure of black velvet leaves, ornamented with jet bugles; black lace barb behind.—Fig. 3. Necklace and cross of ruby velvet.—Fig. 4. Black velvet collar, trimmed with cut jet beads.—Fig. 5. Swallow cravat of blue ribbon, embroidered with jet beads; an elastic cord, fastened behind, passes under the collar.—Fig. 6. Louis XIII. bow of violet velvet.—Fig. 7. Cache-peigne of artificial flowers.—Fig. 8. Ribbon sash-bow, ornamented with jet bugles.

Fig. 1.—Baby a year and a half old. White cashmere dress embroidered with white silk; blue cashmere shoes.

PROMENADE AND DEMI TOILETTES.

Fig. 2.—Boy from eight to ten years old. Full suit of black velvet; full trousers reaching just above the knee; Russian blouse, buttoned diagonally; black and white striped stockings; cloth boots.

Fig. 3.—Young girl seven years old. Dress of scarlet cashmere trimmed with a Greek border of velvet set between two bias folds of satin, one black and the other white, and finished with scarlet, black, and white fringe; pockets trimmed in the same manner; broad black sash, tied behind; paletot of black cashmere lined with scarlet, and embroidered with scarlet and white; red boots.

Fig. 4.—Young girl from eleven to twelve years old. Dress of light blue pout de sole trimmed with three rows of satin piping, the same piping simulating points under the aforesaid rows; low waist, with epaulets; high muslin under-waist, with long sleeves.

Fig. 5.—Girl eight years old. Pleated under-skirt of black silk; fourreau of black velvet; polonaise of of garnet satin, trimmed with black Astrakhan; toquet of garnet velvet, with black Astrakhan trimming.

Fig. 6.—Girl ten years old. Under-skirt of mauve velvet; fourreau and paletot of the same material, with swan's-down trimming; toquet of gray velvet, trimmed with mauve velvet.

Fig. 7.—Girl six years old. Under-skirt of green cashmere; fourreau of green and white striped poplin, trimmed with rouleaux of green ribbon, terminating each in three ends; waist and sleeves of the same material as the under-skirt.

A WIFE'S PRAYER.

GRANT him, when I am gone,
To wear his grief with holy gracefulness;
Let him not wildly mourn,
Making his days forever comfortless.
Inform him with pure piety to see Above my grave, tear-blinded though he be,
The anadem of immortality.

Fix in him faith, I pray,
To meet the shadowy changes as they fall,
Seeing, day after day,
The darkness gathering that endeth all.
Until the last, O let him linger near,
And through the dark transition let me hear
His prayerful voice, to strengthen if I fear.

When Hope is wearied,
Drooping, dejected, her aspirant wings,
And life looks at the best
A troublous tangle of unmeaning things,
Heal in his heart the wounds that make him faint,
Calm on his lips the murmur of complaint,
Nerve his weak trust with godlike self-restraint.

Let choral voices sweet,
And visions fair, his loneliest nights adorn.
Let angels lead his feet

In slumber to the promised realm of morn,
That sorrow, when he wakes, shall lighter weigh Upon his soul than autumn on the spray,
Or evening on the eyelid of the day.

MARRIAGE LENGTHENS LIFE.

IF our young men, already very uxoriously inclined, required any additional inducement to matrimony beyond the natural attractiveness of American girls—confessed to be the prettiest in the world—they might find it in the fact that marriage is favorable to length of life.

No less an authority than the Scotch Registrar-General, one Dr. Stark, as quoted by the London Saturday Review, tells us that twice as many bachelors as married men die out of every thousand between the ages of twenty and twenty-five years. From twenty-five to thirty there are nearly fifteen in every thousand bachelors who die, while only about eight of the married give up the ghost. Between the ages of thirty and thirty-five the difference is still more in favor of the Benedicts, of whom eight and a fraction out of the thousand are extinguished, but as many as sixteen of the same number of the unfortunate single men are lost to the world.

So it would seem that there is nearly double the chance of life with, as life without, a wife. This fact is an emphatic argument, were such wanted, in favor of matrimony, and should be regarded by the wise calculators of profit and loss as a large item to set off against the inevitable expenses so much complained of in these days of connubial costliness. It is difficult, no doubt, with the modern requirements of female gentility, which must have a brown-stone house to go into, and silk and cashmere to go out in, for the most industrious man to get the wherewithal to lodge, board, and clothe a wife of the genteel sort in accordance with her exorbitant expectations. The necessary strain of effort, however, may be considered worth the while when it is now apparent that if a man allows himself to be frightened from matrimony by its cost he must make up his mind to lose in bachelorhood one-half of his best years. "Which of the two to choose, slavery or death?" for it seems that one or the other is inevitable. Marry, work, and live, or remain a bachelor, enjoy your ease, and die?

The prolongation of life by matrimony is supposed to be owing to the fact that a married man is diverted by the wholesome enjoyments of connubiality from the baneful pleasures in which single men are too apt to indulge. There is, however, besides this negative, a positive benefit in having a wife at one's side. Be she gentle or shrewish, it is astonishing what a corrector she becomes of man's perverted disposition. Under her guidance he is at once turned from the irregular and dangerous ways so often pursued in his unrestrained bachelorhood to the straight and safe avenues of matrimonial respectability. He goes to church at least twice each Sunday, so he is secure for that day, which of all others is the blackest and most perilous in the calendar of the American's life. As for the rest of the days of the week, business ordinarily supplies occupation enough for them; and for the evenings and nights, these are secured against any chance of being misspent by the parties, tea-drinkings, and lecture-goings; and when these fail, as they sometimes but rarely do, by the early shutting of the house and turning into bed. Mark, too, how the attentive wife checks every tendency of perverse man to excess. If the first glass of wine be allowed, the second is sure to be stopped in its course to the thirsty lips by the reminder: "My dear, you know it never agrees with you. Now don't, my dear!" The home cigar is, of course, entirely abandoned; for what husband is cruel enough to persist in smoking when each puff is followed by the exclamation of his wife: "I've such a headache! Where in the world did you get those cigars?"

The cuddling of a tender wife, too, has, no doubt, something to do with that prolongation of man's life accredited by the statisticians to matrimony. How necessarily reckless is the forlorn bachelor of his health, and how carefully tended, on the contrary, is every little ailment of the married man! The slipper and dry stocking are at hand to take the place of the soaked boot; and the hardly perceptible sneeze or huskiness of throat is at once conjured away with those domestic charms—flannel, gruel, and hot water.

If it were only that matrimony compelled to the consumption of less wine and tobacco, and to the care of the health on the slightest indication of disease, there would seem to be reason enough to account for the fact that the married man lives nearly twice as long as the single. We would therefore advise our bachelors to lose no time in getting wives, and when they have got them to submit unresistingly to a short allowance of wine and cigars, and accept gratefully the domestic gruel and cuddling.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Another Letter to Epicurus.

MY DEAR YOUNG FRIEND,—I am very glad indeed that my letter was so agreeable to you that you wish me to write a little more upon the same subject. I do so very willingly, because, although there is a great deal of gormandizing and extravagance in eating in our beloved country, we have not yet learned the great art of eating in the best way and for the least money. There are people among us who are pinched upon an income which ought to enable them to live comfortably here, and even luxuriously in many pleasant parts of Europe; and one chief reason is the waste in the kitchen department. By this I mean not the waste of extravagance merely, but of ignorance. It is a waste akin to that of some foolish Western farmers, who build their stables near running brooks in order to get rid of the manure easily. Now manure is the farmer's gold mine, and he might as well use his greenbacks to light his pipe as throw away the sweepings and scrapings of his stable.

You will think it very strange in me to say so, but when you are engaged to Miss Lucille—and I hope, dear Epicurus, it may be very soon; for I have watched you and her for months, and I knew what would come of it, almost as soon as you did, such is the perception of the long experience of a social sentry in the higher circles!—I say, when you are engaged, you can do no wiser thing than to dine once a week at Delmonico's with Lucille and her truly dignified mamma, upon condition that you get permission to explore the kitchen and ask questions. You will find, as the erudite and experienced M. Blot would tell you, that there is positively no waste. Every thing is made to tell. The very dry bones furnish a delicious nucleus of soup. The shreds and parings are invaluable for garnishing, and flavoring, and seasoning. The cook in that renowned eating-house would serve you an exquisite dinner from what your own domestic Biddy would reject as impracticable and useless.

I can see you smiling as you read because you are thinking that it would not help your future kitchen to see how economically a French cook manages; and you are quite ready to tell me that the French are not a proverbially neat folk, and that cat cutlets are not attractive even during the bewilderment of the honeymoon. Very well. Did it ever occur to you and to Miss Lucille to ask why our kitchens are such roots of family bitterness? You will very soon, I hope, have a kitchen of your own. You will be willing to spend a very pretty sum for your housekeeping, and you will expect, and have a right to expect, a good dinner—not a dinner like a public banquet to a distinguished fellow-citizen, but a feast which is both economical and wholesome, physically and morally, because it is well cooked. The true excellence of dinner is not in the variety and rarity of the viands, but in the skill of the preparation. The great tests are very simple. The making of bread, the boiling of potatoes, the broiling of a steak to a juicy turn, these are the perilous points. If Biddy can double these she is safe.

The question then is, how will you secure the good dinner which you will properly expect and will gladly pay for? It is a question to be answered, Miss Lucille, not in Paris nor in Vienna (where the cooking is in some material respects even better than in Paris), but in—Wisconsin or California as well as in New York or Philadelphia. And it is a question, dear Epicurus, which we can, at least theoretically, answer. There is but one way in which you can be sure of a wholesome and economical kitchen; and that is not only by the personal supervision but the practical knowledge of Mrs. Epicurus. Can Miss Lucille bake a loaf of bread? Can she boil a potato and serve it so that it breaks asunder with dry meanness? Can she broil a beef-steak so that it transcends the finest filet of horse aux truffes at the best of the Paris cafés? Don't sneer at the question, and with a noble toss of your handsome and indignant head inform me that Miss Lucille Chignon is neither a cook nor a chamber-maid. How shall we ever understand each other if you take to the lofty style? I beg leave to inform you, Mr. Epicurus Ingot, that every American young woman, of whatever wealth or society, ought to be a good cook and a dextrous chamber-maid.

Why, my dear Epicurus, you have dined with me at my bachelor quarters on a roast leg of mutton and a dish of scalloped oysters and an apple Charlotte; and you complimented me upon my waiter, as the quietest and nimblest and best you had encountered any where. I flatter myself that you spoke truly. But why is he so good a waiter? Because I am a good waiter, and I taught him. When he first came to live with me he was no wiser as a waiter than your Biddy will be as a cook. The very first day revealed to him the great truth that I was master of his business; and his progress from that moment was consequently astonishing. We all like to shirk work a little, you know; but when we discover that the boss understands the details just as well as we do ourselves, we may throw up our engagement but we don't try to shirk. Look at this in its highest aspect. We all know that conscience is the most powerful impulse toward a divine life. What is conscience but the sense of the constant observation of perfect wisdom?

Dear me! I have got up into a very high pulpit, but I descend again to the kitchen; and I say that Miss Lucille ought to know how to cook in order to direct her Biddy who does not know. For the simple fact with which we have to deal is, that the vast majority of people who cook our dinners are not cooks at all. They are generally poor Irish women who must make a living, and who therefore warm more or less various articles of food and demand high wages for it. That is not cooking. The performance that takes place in most kitchens of which you know any thing is not cooking. The feast to which people sit down is generally any thing but a dinner. By paying very high wages you may sometimes obtain a person who does pretty well. But some of us can not pay very high wages, and besides they are not always sure to secure what we wish.

Now I ask Miss Lucille, as a sensible American woman, to look straight at the situation, and answer me whether it is not a great deal easier and wiser to acquaint herself with the mystery of cooking at the necessary cost of time and trouble than to be utterly helpless in the hands of ignorance and laziness? If she does not, her housekeeping will be a mere lottery. Sometimes she will draw a prize, larger or smaller, but generally she will draw a blank. There will be horrid and constant disappointment. My good Epicurus will be as gentle as he can. He will bite his lips and hold his tongue over the daily wreck and waste of the dinner-table. He will feel his digestion and his health succumbing to the Biddian atrocities which are daily served for food. But, I greatly fear, that sometimes the barriers of forbearance and silence will give way, and a tremendous freshet of wrath will overwhelm for a time that happy household.

As you are perfectly aware, my dear Epicurus, it is constantly said that marriage in this country becomes more and more impossible. Why? I think the reason is simple. It is because the woman is ceasing to be a helpmate for the man. Last Thursday evening I went to the great ball at Mrs. Top Nottery's. It was a brilliant, and beautiful, and profoundly melancholy spectacle. The dancing music reminded me of my youth, when Mrs. Nottery was plain Susan Simple, and I used to step with her in the decorous quadrille. In those delightful days, I remember, I used to cut the most irreproachable pigeon-wings, and as for Susan—however, I must not betray myself by garrulity. Let it suffice that I find very little of the Susan Simple in Mrs. Top Nottery. Now at this famous ball I saw the loveliest young women bedecked with flashing gems and clad in the most shining raiment, who, as they floated and glided through the waltz, would certainly have persuaded his Highness the Sultan of Turkey, had he been present, that he was assisting at a reunion of hours in the blissful paradise of his faith. The Sultan, however, was not present; but Frank Blithely was, and as he came panting out of a prolonged and triumphant whirl, he looked at me perspiringly, and said,

"Uncle Bach, I am Ixion in heaven."

"Why so, Frank?" I replied.

"Because I can be admitted to the society of these angels only in this evanescent way. It's only Tom Ruby, and Jack Pearly, and Ned Turquoise who can live in heaven. Look at this lovely partner of mine. Do you think I could keep her in precious stones and silks, laces, kids, carriages, and silver plate? Splendid dancer—but matrimony? Why, what could she bring to the partnership? Smattering of French, a little crochet, expensive habits, social ambition, and—practically—total helplessness. Charming girl! Fine figure-head for Ruby's table. Stunning Mrs. John Pearly. But Mrs. Francis Blithely? Jingo, no! Couldn't afford it."

At that moment a soft voice, proceeding from the rose mist of drapery and gleaming lights which he called his partner, said, quietly, "Shall we have another turn?" and away went Ixion whirling through heaven.

Now, my dear Epicurus, do you understand why I called it a melancholy spectacle? If that pretty girl, that lovely young woman, instead of being a mere Parisian doll for the holidays, had been able to boil a potato as well as to waltz—had been, in a word, as fit to be the mistress of a household as she was to judge of the exact height at which her hair should be coiled upon her head—I should have laughed the Intelligence Offices to scorn. For here would have been a woman instead of a puppet, and I should never have mistaken her for the wax lay-figure in the window upon which Madame Modiste drapes her costliest wares. It is agreed upon all sides that there must be a reform in the kitchen. So there must, and it must begin in the parlor. The forecask will be what the captain's cabin is. If he knows every rope in the ship woe betide the lubber who is ignorant. If Lucille will practically master the art of Delmonico's kitchen, Biddy will be as valuable as Soyer; and you, dear Epicurus, in the happy future days, will not be obliged to give me an invitation, which I hereby most cordially accept, to dine at Delmonico's, instead of at your own table. Good-by, then, until Thursday at six.

Your grateful friend,
AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

INFANTS' CLOTHING.

WE have been repeatedly requested by our correspondents to furnish some information about infants' clothing. We gladly comply, premising, however, that in our search through the best furnishing-houses in the city we have found but little novelty in long-clothes.

White goods with soft finish are selected for infants' robes. Nansook muslin and mull have the preference. The robe may vary from a yard and an eighth to a yard and a quarter in length. Skirts longer than this are only made to order. They are inconvenient, and seldom called for. Puffed dresses, with robed front, require from three and a quarter to four yards of muslin; tucked robes from two and a half to three, according to the number of tucks.

Clusters of cord-like tucks, puffs of sheer muslin rolled on each side, and cambric ruffles evenly gathered and fluted, are pretty and inexpensive trimmings for these tiny garments. When neatly fashioned, a skillful laundress will make them rival in beauty elaborate dresses of lace and embroidery. Valenciennes is the most suitable lace. Embroidery should not be used at all, unless it is of superior needle-work and small figure.

A handsome mull dress has a wide embroidered border around the skirt. Above this are eight rows of insertion, of the same pattern as the scalloped border, alternating with clusters of fine tucks. This trimming composes nearly half the skirt, which is a yard and an eighth long. The body and sleeves are made of tucks and embroidery, with a Valenciennes fluted edging about the neck. The price is $70. For descriptions of more elaborate dresses we refer our readers to former Numbers of Harper's Bazar.

A dress easily imitated has a robed front of diagonal puffs an inch wide, separated by tucked bands edged with Valenciennes.

A gored neck-slip of soft cambric is cut with sleeves, body, and skirt in one piece. The high neck is formed by a circular yoke of puffs half an inch wide and narrow cambric insertion. Draw-strings under an embroidered band make a belt in front, to which are sewn long strings that tie behind. The skirt is a yard long, with tucked border above the hem. $7 is the price.

Flannel skirts are elaborately embroidered with silk in vines and scalloped. Others have narrow tucks, with braid above them, or a Greek pattern in chain-stitch, or a moiré embroidery. The new braiding attachment to Wheeler & Wilson's machine makes a pretty trimming for infants' flannels, resembling star-braid.

A skirt of linen lawn is cut with neck-fall and sleeves in one piece. Hexagon-shaped medallions of Valenciennes set in narrow embroidered bands with fluted lace border make the pointed fall in front and back. Price $10. One at $14, of fine linen cambric, has the entire neck-piece of French needle-work. Sleeves of wide lace. Another of the same price is made with a yoke formed of lace, barred with transferred leaves.

White cambric bibs wadded and quilted are preferred to those made of Marseilles, as they are softer and thicker. When prettily embroidered in medallions and scalloped at the edge they are sold in sets of half a dozen for $10. Plainer ones are trimmed with Cluny lace and Irish tatting.

A christening cap of Valenciennes has clusters of needle-work transferred on the crown and head-piece. Narrow satin loops form a ruche around the face. Lining of soft white Marseilles silk. The price is $9. Those used for ordinary wear are of patent lace, with pink lustrous ribbons.

There are pretty little embroidered shoes of white and blue satin at $2 a pair. Others knit of zephyr wool wash without losing shape. Still others are of cashmere, braided and embroidered.

A curtained Fanchon for a baby girl is of white satin, quilted in diamonds, with crystal beads on the points of the diamonds. Ruche of looped ribbons bordering the front. Strings of white lustrous. Price $8.

A boy's hat of blue velvet is turban-shaped, with a half rosette in front of double bias velvet plaits and lace; ear-tufts of lace and white satin—$12. Another of blue satin has a covering of Irish tatting.

An infant's Afghan, or carriage blanket, of white double zephyr is knit in rows of open work with shell border. Colored ribbon inserted through the openings may be removed when the blanket part is washed. Price $9.

INFANTS' BASKETS.

A beautiful basket, round, instead of the usual oblong shape, is lined with blue satin. Swiss muslin puffs an inch wide of reversed plaits, with Valenciennes and appliqué insertion between, cover, without concealing the satin lining. The curtain of blue satin is pointed with a quilted ribbon border. A chenille tassel is placed at every point. Satin pockets at the side are covered with Valenciennes set in bands of Swiss to make it strong. Each pocket has a different medallion. The pin-cushion in the centre is covered with an exquisite piece of lace with a scalloped edge. The top of the basket is surrounded with a double row of large field daisies of blue and white crape. $60 is the price asked, including combs and brushes of yellow ivory, pins, and Lubin's violette powder.

A plainer basket is of Swiss, over pink cambric. The gathered curtain has a tucked border. A double ruffle around the top is also tucked. Pink ribbon quilting on the pockets, and large rosette in the centre. A square basket covered with dimity is neat and serviceable. One at $10 is prettily embroidered and scalloped around the curtain. Wreath in the centre and corner pieces. Cushions at the side, and pockets.

Necklace and sleeve loopers to correspond are made of the pale Naples coral and of turquoise.

SHORT CLOTHES.

A French slip, intended as a day-dress for a child in short clothes, is made of soft lawn. It has a high-necked, pointed yoke, into which a width and a half of the goods is gathered, forming the body and skirt. There is no belt to the dress. A ribbon sash is tied around the waist. The yoke is formed of narrow puffs, with cambric insertion between. Skirt and sleeves are trimmed with puffs and bunches of tucks. Lace around the edge of the skirt, at the wrist and neck.

There are pretty little aprons of dimity, of linen, and of diaper, made high at the throat, with long sleeves, and circular skirts sewn to a plain body. Short lappets are placed around the waist merely for ornament. The trimming is tatting, Cluny edging, or shell ruffles. More dressy aprons are sacque-shaped, low at the neck, and open under the arms, fastening at the sides with ribbon bows. These are elaborately embroidered. Yoked aprons with belts and gored aprons with bibs are very pretty. The trimming of puffs and tucks is placed down the gored seam and around the whole garment. The pockets and ends of the strings are also trimmed. Colored lawns, blue and pink, are inserted around others as a border. Some imported aprons are of sheer cambric with bretelles, belt and pocket beautifully embroidered with French needle-work.

We have spoken before of the walking dresses with large capes. A pretty one for a child of three years is of white silk plush with blue polka dots. It is wadded and lined with silk, and trimmed with blue and white cords. The price is $20. For a boy of the same age there is a sacque of scarlet and white plush lined with scarlet silk and wadded. It is slashed and vandyked on the sleeves, at the sides, and in the centre of the back, disclosing white silk bands quilted. The vandykes are piped with red and white silks. A button is placed on each point. A hood collar is lined with alternate red and white plaits, with points and tassels. Price $15.

A white corduroy over-coat for a boy of four years old has a blue satin trimming pointed and edged with crystal braid. Another is a gored pelisse of white cloth dotted with blue. Triangular pieces of white quilted silk, with revers of blue plush form the trimming.

A convenient suit for a boy is a low-necked blouse of gray poplin, with gored skirt, and an over-jacket to be worn with it in the street.

Fancy dresses for children should always be made of material that is easily washed. A pretty little evening dress of India muslin, to be worn over a blue glacé slip, is made with a belt and full-gathered waist. The white skirt is formed of lapels left separate from each other and flowing, trimmed with Valenciennes insertion and lace. Sleeves and body to correspond. Blue ribbon an inch wide is latticed over the skirt in large diamonds to keep the lapels in position.

For boys there are shirt waists of linen with embroidered fronts, collars, and cuffs, handsomely made, for $5. Others more elaborate are of linen cambric, front and back trimmed alike with puffs and embroidery. These are worn with round velvet skirts, or with trousers. The graceful Bismarck suits, which we have described before, are now cut diagonally across the breast. The full trousers are gathered below the knee. Made of gray tweed they are prettily ornamented with Amozine embroidery. Handsome suits are of black velvet without trimming. The pantaloons are scalloped on the outer seam, and bound with a black silk braid. Large crocheted buttons. Three yards of single-width material is required for a boy of seven years.

Full Highland costumes of gay plaid are worn. A serviceable and graceful coat, called the Grant, is shaped like the loose Knickerbocker, but with belt in the back. Vests are only worn with fly jackets, cut away in front, and loose behind.

Over-coats are of the Balmoral and Mackintosh shapes. The former has a cape in the back, the latter in front. The Balmoral is preferred. A yard and a half of material is required for a boy six years of age.

EVENING ATTIRE.

The Pompadour colors, blue and pink together, are in vogue for evening dress. A Parisian ball-dress has an over-skirt of blue crape dotted with silver, on white crape. Knots of pink satin sprinkle the skirt, and bouquets of pale roses from an apron and bertha.

Satin is very much used in conjunction with tulle, not only beneath it as transparent, but as peplum over-skirts, as tabliers or aprons, and as open trains over two or three tulle skirts. It is made into berthas and sashes, and the Marie Antoniette fichus that form a noticeable feature in the best toilettes of the season. It is also arranged in folds with pearl trimming and blonde lace to form braces or bretelles for low-necked dresses of gauze and self-colored silk.

A graceful dress of black tulle, suitable for mourning, has the whole skirt formed of waving puffs with black satin rouleaux between. It is worn over a gored dress of soft lustreless silk. A full parure of cameos, white onyx heads in an elaborately-carved jet setting, without a particle of gold visible, were the ornaments.

White crape is used for trimming ball-dresses. It is scarcely so becoming as tulle, but is preferred on account of its novelty and its peculiar glistening in the gaslight like hoar-frost. A beautiful evening dress, worn by a blonde, is of a delicate new shade of green faïence (another name for poud de soie noire), with white crape bertha and tunic, with reversed plaited puffs around the trained skirt. The coiffure for this Undine costume is a wreath of miniature water-lilies of white crape, rising like a diadem above the short curls on the forehead, twining around the chignon and falling on the shoulders. The jewels are of the novel stone called chrysopras, now so much sought after in Paris, and just introduced here by one of our leading jewelers. It is a lovely green shade, lighter than the emerald, and not so brilliant, slightly clouded, but a clearer, purer color than malachite.

The Parisiennes have a new invention for looping ball-dresses, called a porte-jupe. Two jeweled brooches united by a gold chain are placed, one at the waist and the other near the edge of the skirt, looping gracefully the long material between them.

Another French caprice is a jeweled chate-laine. A gold hook, set with precious stones, is fastened to the belt. Suspended from this hook are chains to which are attached a locket, a pencil, tablets, and a vinaigrette.

Enameled humming-birds, peacocks, butterflies, bees, and even spiders, are fashionable French ornaments. One lady, it is said, wears aquarium ear-rings—tiny crystal globes, filled with water containing gold-fishes, a lobster, etc. The ring passing through the ear is of enameled gold representing sea-weed. Collars of scarabæi and of Brazilian beetles, with long pendants, are linked together by gold chains.

BASCHLIKS.

Baschliks, or hood-bonnets, are worn for driving and for evening parties. It is not necessary to describe their shape, as they have been illustrated in former Numbers of Harper's Bazar. They are warm and comfortable and exceedingly becoming. Young ladies wear them of blue or rose-colored satin, quilted in diamonds and bordered with swan's-down, or of white cashmere or silk, with quilted lining, and embroidery of floss and seed pearls. They are fastened by buttons and loops, or silk cords and tassels of camel's-hair. Very elegant ones are made of lace, lined with silk. Chantilly is worn over crimson, and point lace over blue silk. Elderly ladies prefer them of black velvet or satin, trimmed with lace or fur.

A kind of baschlik is also worn in Europe by skaters. It is of the material of the dress and redingote, and trimmed to match. A square head-piece is continued in long lappets down the front, crossed under the chin, again at the back, and fastened upon the breast with a brooch.

VARIETIES.

The highest Parisian authorities affirm that flat, gored skirts are soon to be superseded by ample flowing garments. Already costly materials are ceasing to be cut up into Gabrielle and Empress dresses, and pleats are worn at the sides and behind. We sound the note of alarm to our readers most regretfully, as we are convinced they will not willingly relinquish the present graceful style.

Pretty work-baskets of Russia leather, pale gray or brown, more durable than wicker, are lined with blue satin and quilted. Pockets at the side contain all the essentials for needle-work. Chatelaines of the same material hooked to the belt have long chains, holding cases for scissors, needles, and thimble.

A pretty cravat, or necklace, to be worn with a standing collar, is a band of black velvet studded with jet nail-heads. Bow and ends in front. Trelled loops of jet beads are suspended around the band.

Diadems of gold, of cut steel, and of silver ornament imported bonnets. Velvet tiaras and coronets of flowers for evening coiffures are high in the centre. Foreign correspondents talk of high-crowned hats without brims, all of which seems to foreshadow a decided change in the shape of chapeaux.

An elaborate breakfast-dress of imperial satin serge is of the brilliant ruby shade called Mentana. It is a regular Gabrielle in shape, with long train and flowing sleeves lined with white. The trimming which surrounds the whole garment, forming a pyramid on the back width, is a vine of black velvet appliqué, with jet braided border. Black velvet collar and long girdle lined with satin. The carriage-dress described in our last article was $175, unmade, and not $175, as the types made us say.

PERSONAL.

The droll story of Mr. GEORGE FRANCIS TRAIN'S advertising in London for a small party to accompany Mrs. ELLET on the Continent, and several infants having been sent to the lady's residence, turns out to be a canard, as we are assured by the eminent authoress herself.

—MR. OAKLEY HALL is one of the quickest but most demure of wits. In the Recorder's Court, on the last day of December term, he called Judge HACKETT's attention to the fact that this day was the last of his official term, and therefore begged to recommend his successor [himself] to the favorable consideration of the Court.

—Foreign musical people are not forgotten by lovers of the heavenly art in the outlying region of Westchester. The great Norwegian violinist has been remembered by Mr. GEORGE QUINTARD, of Rye, who has some famous imported stock, and who has given to one noble animal, a bull, the name of "Ole."

—Senator THOMAS J. CREAMER, of this city, the youngest member of our State Senate, graduated with the highest honors of the Free Academy, and has fought his own way to his present position. He is a gentleman of fine address, and a clear, fluent, and forcible speaker. Not long since Mr. A. T. STEWART presented him with a house and lot worth $30,000, as a testimonial of respect for having vindicated his (Mr. S.'s) character on the floor of the Assembly.

—Ex-President FILLMORE is said to be writing a history of his administration, to be published after his death. Buffalo has a Club, somewhat like the Union Club of this city, of which Mr. FILLMORE is President, and Mr. WILLIAM G. FARGO Vice-President. Most of the clever people of the town are members.

—Commander RALPH CHANDLER, of the United States Navy, is the first officer who has practically applied the use of steam on board ship as a disinfectant. Several cases of yellow-fever of most malignant type occurred on the United States Steamer Don, at Vera Cruz, and though the ship was thoroughly impregnated, complete disinfection was at once brought about by the application of a high degree of heat to all parts of the vessel by means of steam-pipes. Captain CHANDLER is from Batavia, New York, and is esteemed one of the most accomplished and competent of the new crop of American naval officers.

—The Hon. ALBERT CARDOZO, who took his seat as Judge of the Supreme Court in this city on the 2d instant, is the first gentleman of purely Jewish origin, who was ever honored by a seat on the bench in the United States or in Christendom, so far as we are informed. Judge C. is a gentleman of fine legal attainments, and enjoys the respect of the bar of New York.

—A gentleman who professes to know the fact, states that at the time of Mr. LINCOLN's death his debts amounted to $38 31.

—MR. W. T. BLODGETT, of this city, for whom CHURCH painted the "Heart of the Andes," and who possesses some of the finest paintings in the United States, has just received from Paris, where he purchased it of the artist last autumn, GUSTAVE DORE's large drawing, about three feet by four, representing the contest between "Michael and his Angels, and the Dragon and his Angels," described in the twelfth chapter of the Book of Revelation. It is a superb work of art, and the only considerable original by Dore that has yet found its way to the United States.

—HENRY BEWLEY, Esq., of Dublin, is eccentric in his way of diffusing his surplus moneys. A large stockholder in the Atlantic Telegraphic Cable Company, he made a vow to devote the income from it to the distribution of tracts, and has just sent a little consignment of nine tons to the Young Men's Christian Association of Chicago. It was chiefly, if not solely, by his liberality that the Kiosk was erected in the grounds of the Great Exhibition at Paris for the distribution of tracts and Bibles.

—MR. JAMES M. McLEAN, President of the Citizens' Insurance Company, has for four years past filled with great dignity and usefulness the important office of President of the Board of Education of this city. Having declined a re-election his term expired on the 31st ult., prior to which his brother members presented to him a series of highly commendatory resolutions. It is seldom that so important a branch of the public service as that of Instruction is fortunate in having for its official head a gentleman who combines high mental ability and culture with energy, common-sense, business talent, and a wide knowledge of affairs.

—We do not undertake to indorse the statement of the New Haven Palladium that the Rev. ALBERT S. HUNT, an unmarried Methodist minister at Brooklyn, received for a Christmas present from his parishioners an India-rubber model of a young lady, stuffed with $500 in greenbacks; but such pleasant little benefactions are worth making a note of.

—INA HILLGREEN is the name of a Swedish maiden who is said to possess greater vocal and operatic talent than JENNY LIND or CHRISTINA NILSSON at their best. She's pretty too. Just now she is warbling at the Royal Theatre, Stockholm.

—MR. GEORGE AUGUSTUS SALA's book, "Notes and Sketches of the Paris Exhibition," just published by TINSLEY BROTHERS, London (1868), is dedicated "To JAMES LORIMER GRAHAM, Jun., of New York, in Memory of a Thousand Kindnesses." Mr. GRAHAM's library is one of the choicest private collections in New York, and no gentleman is better known or more highly respected among men of letters and artists at home or abroad than he. Possessed of an ample income, he is enjoying himself among the cultivated people of the Old World.

—MR. and MRS. RISTORI and the two youthful Ristoris take a lesson in English every day. The children get on very well, but with the old folks the work is a little tough.

—Bishop SELWYN, the new Bishop of Litchfield, was one of the three bishops who rowed in the first Oxford and Cambridge boat-race—the other two being the Bishop of Newcastle and the Bishop of St. Andrews. It is not stated whether they won.

—MRS. HARRISON GRAY ORIS, of Boston, who is honored with a prominent place in Mrs. ELLET's "Queens of American Society," is connected by blood and marriage with the oldest and most distinguished families in the country. She has wealth, literary accomplishments, speaks fluently four or five languages, and is quite a humorist. During the war she devoted all of her time and much of her income to our sick and infirm soldiers, ameliorating their condition and looking after their interests.

—Bishop BENJAMIN BOSWORTH SMITH, of Kentucky, now Presiding Bishop of the Episcopal Church in the United States, is advanced in years and unequal to the active discharge of Episcopal duties. He is a Low Churchman. Last year the Rev. GEORGE D. CUMMINS, of Chicago, was elected his Assistant and does most of the duty. Next in order of succession is Bishop McILVAINE, of Ohio, who is 70, and so infirm as to require the services of an Assistant Bishop (BEDEL). Bishop McILVAINE is a very Low Churchman. Next to him is Bishop KEMPER, of Wisconsin, High Church, quite old and infirm, and has an Assistant (ARMITAGE). Next is Bishop McCORMY, of Michigan, High Church, a man of stalwart frame and in fine health.

—J. ROSS BROWN, one of the most agreeable and humorous of American authors, combines in an unusual degree an aptitude for statistics and great gravity of style in official correspondence, with the keenest sense of the ludicrous, and an irresistible drollery of expression in his books of travel. He is, moreover, a fine draughtsman, a capital musician, and has the felicity of being the father of two girls who were pronounced among the most beautiful seen in Washington on New-Year's Day.

—President JOHNSON has purchased in Greene County, Tennessee, a fine farm of several hundred acres, to which he intends to retire at the expiration of his term of office.

—MR. ROBERT POMEROY, of Pittsfield, Massachusetts, who is much in the woolen-mill line and a gentleman of taste and culture, has recently received from Europe a fine statue of Rebecca, by BENZONI, a distinguished Italian sculptor. The Emperor of Austria bid high for it, but, being unsuccessful, ordered a copy.

—Italy has broken out with a new and brilliant young dramatist, M. A. TOZZELLI. He had previously written some clever essays, but a new five-act comedy, entitled "I Marii," has fairly taken Florence by storm. After the fourth representation he was designated for the prize of 3000 francs offered by the Government for the encouragement of the drama in Italy. The moral that the play aims to inculcate is that "good husbands make good wives."

—The decease of the venerable Mr. GRIMES, generally mentioned as "Old Grimes," has become quite known to intelligent Americans, and the peculiar circumstances connected with the general style of his garments has occasioned much mirth; but how few knew the name of the author of the poem, or that he died only on the 3d of January last. The Hon. ALBERT G. GREENE, of Rhode Island, was the author of that and several literary pieces that have become historical. He was a cultivated gentleman of some note in Rhode Island, and was, we believe, one of the few prominent men who had not held the office of Governor of that State.

—They are poking a little fun in England at Mr. LAYARD. His attack in the House of Commons on Dr. BEKE has revived a bon mot concerning him which was some years ago frequently repeated in London salons. A certain wit, on being urged to show compassion to the then aspirant for literary fame, answered, "Well, I admit we are all indebted to LAYARD for discovering Nineveh; but I can never forgive Nineveh for discovering LAYARD!"

—Major-General D. E. SICKLES has been elected and inaugurated Commander of the "Grand Army of the Republic" of the State of New York. His competitor was General H. A. BAENDT.

—It was not Home the Spiritualist, but HOLMES the violinist, who married the sparkling Madame MOZT, of Champagne celebrity. Madame has four "pledges" from the departed MOZT, each older than her new husband; but she is pretty, possesses infinite tact, and is well known in Paris for her literary cleverness. When she went to the altar, and blushing faltered out the customary brief statement as to "love, honor, and obey," she wore a pearl-colored satin of that delicate shade which is gladdened by a rosy tint and silver sheen, and an exquisite black lace mantilla, and over her head a black lace veil. You say, Black for a wedding! Yes, because she was a widow. Her slippers were of satin to match her dress.

—The Rev. Dr. BELLows, whose letters from Germany to the Liberator form a prominent feature of that journal, furnishes, in a recent Number, a graphic sketch of the scene at the dissolution of the Prussian Parliament, and what BISMARCK did, how BISMARCK looked, and what BISMARCK wore on the occasion. "He was dressed," says the Doctor, "in the same white uniform I had seen him in at the Emperor's ball at Paris. He wore jack-boots and spurs. His fine, great head upon his tall, full figure gave him a marked superiority over the whole assembly. Power, prudence, self-possession, capacity, success, are stamped upon his features and bearing. If he is worn with care, he does not show it; perhaps he carries it in those great sacks that hang under his eyes! He seems about fifty-four, and thoroughly well-preserved. His habits are careful. He rides on horseback, and bathes in summer in the open river, a few miles from the town. He seems to possess much of the attainments of JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, with a tact in statesmanship which never marked that powerful politician. If he had fallen from the skies he could not have come more opportunely, or with qualifications more out of the usual line of German statesmanship. Knowing all that German statesmen ever know, he has a thoroughly un-German dash and practical quality in him which marks him out from his predecessors, and leaves him wholly alone in his kind. With unsurpassed courage and competency, he possesses distinguished prudence and self-control. He does not undertake the impossible, nor invent a policy. He merely shapes and articulates a public sentiment which for a hundred years has waited for its crystallizing moment. He is not a moral genius, nor an indifferently disinterestedness and pure philanthropy his inspirers. But he is a patriot, and sees Prussia's opportunity to lead Germany to her destiny, and probably no man could possess qualities or antecedents better fitted to the work. An aristocrat, he puts himself at the head of the party of movement, and advocates all possible reforms in the interests of a larger liberty and a freer life. He swallows and digests his antecedents, and evidently despises all criticism which merely convicts him of disagreement with himself—where the disagreement is necessary and born of new circumstances and new opportunities. He is clearly a whole head and shoulders above not only his contemporaries in Prussia, but European statesmen in general; and the more I see of the slack, tape-tied, broken-spirited character of German politicians—dreamy, mechanical, wordy, theoretical, and inefficient—the more I admire the prompt, incisive, practical, and bold qualities of this redeemer of Germany."

CHILDREN'S COSTUMES.—No. 2.—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]

THE NEW YEAR'S FIRST FLOWER.

FAIR little blossom, how gladly we hail thee!
Who tellest that Winter will ere long depart;
Flow'ret preemial to Spring's verdant beauties,
Though modest and lowly, right welcome thou art!

Though torpor pervades the wide bosom of Nature;
And cold o'er the wild heath the biting winds blow;
And the Frost-King, enthroned in his icy pavilion,
Throws over our mountains a mantle of snow.

Regardless art thou both of torpor and tempest;
Thou springest and bloomest in spite of their reign;
And looking upon thee, new hopes are born in us,
That Nature, now barren, will soon smile again.

Soon Flora will come with her train of attendants;
Earth's gardens and meadows in beauty shall bloom;
The feathered tribes carol forth notes of sweet music,
And sunny beams chase away Winter's deep gloom.

Sweet little harbinger, gather we from thee
Lessons of hope, as we gaze on the tomb,
From whence the frail bodies of saints now reposing,
Shall rise in new beauty and freshness to bloom.

GROTESQUE JEWELRY.

IN the shop-windows of the Palais-Royal jewelers and vendors of those countless objects wherein utility is invariably sacrificed to ornament, and which go under the general name of "articles de Paris," there are displayed at the present moment more than the average number of examples of perverted Parisian taste. The emulative French, proud of their success with their race-horses, are now bent upon rivaling the English, so far as "le sport" is concerned, on their own particular element, namely, the sea; and are about establishing a yacht-club, with the Emperor, Empress, Prince Napoleon, etc., as patrons. In anticipation, we suppose, of the popularity which this branch of sport is likely to attain, so far as becoming a matter of general talk among the non-amphibious Parisians, the jewelers have already produced small gold and silver yachts, of one knows not how many penny-weights' burden, as also fully-rigged sailing-boats, cutters with oars, and canoes with paddles, for ladies to wear as ear-rings and brooches.

The new long satin sash for evening dress is worn, too, fastened behind with a gilt toy yacht, the ends of the sash being looped through a gold chain cable, to which an anchor is attached.

Ever since the epoch of Gladiateur's triumph the horse-shoe has been the true type of beauty in the eyes of the French ornamental artist, who has certainly applied it to every conceivable purpose. We have long been familiar with it in scarf-pins and sleeve-links; more recently it made its appearance in ear-rings, lockets, brooches, buckles, paper-weights, alarums, tobacco-boxes, watch and ink stands, and frames for carte-de-visite portraits; and on shirt-fronts, collars, scarfs, and pocket-handkerchiefs. It has now become necessary to vary the too familiar form; and we have it brought out again as an ear-ring, but accompanied by a club-headed nail and a huntsman's whip, as shown in the subjoined engraving.

ing. Grotesque as such a collection of objects necessarily appears when seen suspended from the delicate lobe of some pretty woman's ear, it is perhaps less so than the next example, which combines a glass lantern, a gilt padlock and keys, and a "sabot" filled with imitation lucifers tipped with rubies. Skates and slippers, too, which look coquettish enough on little feminine feet, seem certainly out of place, though they be of gold and miniature in size, when attached to the organs of hearing. The tambourine and castanet in gold-and-white enamel, and the classic lyre swung upside down, may be tolerated. Where is the handsome woman who would venture to suspend to her neatly-chiseled ears a couple of three-legged caldrons of the size and form of the one represented in the engraving? And what shall we say to the mask, which is, however, elegant beside the pair of golden grinning death's-heads above the customary cross-bones, which one saw worn as ear-rings at a "bains-de-mer" casino-ball last season? A horrible fancy, on a par with that with which Frenchwomen were seized in the days of the Terror, when they wore small gold and silver guillotines swinging in their ears, or fastened as brooches at their bosoms, or as combs in their hair; where a few years previously, when famine prevailed and the wretched peasants were dying of positive want, the court ladies at Versailles wore jeweled cornucopias bursting with golden ears of corn which trailed down the side of the head.

The swan, reposing like Moses among the bulrushes, is a pretty enough object in frosted silver, with the leaves and stalks of the bulrushes in green enamel, and the tips of amethyst; but it certainly looks out of its element dangling from a lady's ear, which, being, by-the-way, neither an aviary nor a poulterer's shop, is hardly the proper receptacle for flying swallows, pert young sparrows perched in rings, and flapping their wings as though about to take their first flight, birds just dropping down on their golden nest of pearl eggs, braces of dead pheasants or hares hung up by their feet—all of which, and many other similar objects equally or more fantastic, are to be seen in the form of ear-rings. Not merely has the feathered tribe been called into requisition for this purpose, but jewelers have produced for those ladies who care to adorn their ears with such trifles, both horses and stags, or their heads or hoofs merely, and even golden elephants of a moderate size, which can be swung to the ears by the top of the Oriental pagoda which these animals carry on their backs. There are, moreover, insects in great variety, of which the glittering green beetle is just now the especial Parisian favorite. One serves as a sleeve-link; a couple or more form ear-rings; four joined together dos-à-dos form a brooch; a dozen are sufficient for a bracelet, while a score will serve as pendants to a gold necklace. Hats and bonnets, moreover, are spotted with them; so, too, are ball-dresses. Besides beetles, our art-students in entomology for the purposes of "bijouterie" have produced every description of fly, from the small common house-fly to the grand dragon-fly, with his tinsel green body and golden gauze wings, together with spiders, lady-birds, grasshoppers, cock-chafers, crickets, moths, and butterflies; but somehow or other they appear to have overlooked—so far as ear-rings are concerned—the more appropriate ear-wig. We also have golden fish hanging to hooks, and golden fish in glass globes, turtles, tortoises, toads, lizards, serpents, and dancing-frogs, in enamel, malachite, or gold, and worn some as brooches and others as ear-rings, which, moreover, comprise such absurdities as small cabinet-pianos, locomotives, bellows, bunches of keys, dominoes, guitars, quivers filled with arrows, hunting-horns and powder-flasks, needle-guns and Chassepôt muskets—the latest novelty, by-the-way, introduced. Besides the foregoing there are crescent moons with grinning profiles, and long fluffy-looking feathers in the finest gold-and-silver filigree.

The black-and-gold flies in the pink-and-white shells will pass as articles of personal adornment, and so perhaps will the flies climbing up glass globes and strolling over green leaves, all of which are favorite ear-rings at the present time. Objection, too, need not be taken to the miniature gold flower-basket set with diamonds, pearls, rubies, and turquoises; but the gilt pea-pod, with its half-dozen emeralds simulating peas, is in very questionable taste. The pair of coral cherries, with their green enameled leaves, is a pretty enough conceit for an ear-ring; and no objection can be made to the brooch; but as much can not be said of the score of pins here represented, and with which "la jeunesse dorée" of the present day are proud to bedeck themselves. A few months ago the pin, surmounted with a negro's head or a skull, the wearer of which could make the former wink its eyes, and the latter wag its jaws, by means of some connecting wire in his pocket, was a nine-days' wonder; but the novelty passed off, and the "gandins" of the French jockey-club are reduced, so far as breast-pins that shall attract attention are concerned, to such expedients as the following: a young gosling breaking out of its shell, a rabbit playing on the kettledrum, a zouave, and his counterpart a monkey; a winged jockey astride of a weathercock; a jockey-cap, riding-whip, and spurs; a picture of a boat-race, a toy equestrian with whistle at the horse's tail—fancy the taste of the swell who could wear such an object in his scarf!—a lady's slipper, a hat and cane, a lolly-pop, a drummer, a painter's pallet and brushes—the various colors being in precious stones—a stew-pan, a massive-looking hook and eye, and a pair of tongs, the live coal being simulated by a glittering ruby. Other pins consist of three or four playing-cards, pewter pots and pipes, miniature barometers, cannons, bugles, rattles, monks' heads, birds' claws, squirrels with nuts, horses and jockeys in full gallop, spilt jockeys, horse-shoe nails, anvils, vices, heads of bull-dogs, etc. Tiny watches are shut up in death's-head moths and walnut shells; and sleeve-links are worn in the form of small cart-wheels and concave gold buttons ornamented with a pair of pincers.

Besides the foregoing, there are paper-weights formed of gigantic spiders and beetles, monkeys hammering corks into bottles of Champagne, and other grotesque groups; but the pink of all is a bronze cigar-holder, in the centre of which is a female, saddled and bridled, and ornamented with a fine carefully-cropped tail, and wearing a mask like a horse's head, who is leaning forward with her arms in front of her, the very picture of a high-spirited horse rearing up on its haunches. Behind is a sign-post, on which is inscribed the words: "Bois de Boulogne."

TWILIGHT NIGHT.

We met, hand to hand,
We clasped hands close and fast,
As close as oak and ivy stand;
But it is past:
Come day, come night, day comes at last.

We loosed hand from hand,
We parted face from face;
Each went his way to his own land
At his own pace,
Each went to fill his separate place.

If we should meet one day,
If both should not forget,
We shall clasp hands the accustomed way,
As when we met
So long ago, as I remember yet.

Where my heart is (wherever that may be)
Might I but follow!
If you fly thither over heath and lea,
O honey-seeking bee,
O careless swallow,
Bid some for whom I watch keep watch for me.

Alas! that we must dwell, my heart and I,
So far asunder.
Hours wax to days, and days and days creep by;
I watch with wistful eye,
I wait and wonder:
When will that day draw nigh—that hour draw nigh?

Not yesterday, and not, I think, to-day;
Perhaps to-morrow.
Day after day "to-morrow" thus I say:
I watched so yesterday
In hope and sorrow,
Again to-day I watch the accustomed way.

WATCH-NIGHT AND NEW-YEARS.

IT was the 31st of December, 8 o'clock in the evening. Before a smouldering fire in a worn-out grate, on a chair broken-backed by time, and in a room whose corners were cobwebbed, sat John Ralston. He remembered his past: his life had been one long agony. He was an agony to the mother that bore him; she well-nigh died of his life. He was an agony to his boyish self, for in himself he shut up problems on which no light shone out of any clear crevice in the heavens. He was an agony to his manhood, for his soul was made of fire and of love. Much fuel came to him, but in the flame lay his own heart withered and crackling, and the love that came to pour on sacrificial oil was late and found but cinders. John Ralston was a broken-hearted man.

He rose, and went out of his chamber into the night. The trees in the street stood like undertaker's men at a funeral, throwing the cloak of their shadow coldly, perfunctorily over him the chief mourner. He walked he knew not whither, but God knew. He passed by a brightly lighted church. A shudder at the dark which chilled, rather than a longing for the light which blinded him, sent his weary feet straying into the house where certain good men and women, with prayer and speech, were waiting to usher in the New Year.

There arose one speaker who seemed to look at John. It was a woman. She seemed to speak to John, and thus she said: "Oh! how God pities thee! pities thee! Thou hast borne all things! O weary soul, sink not utterly, for the day is breaking; thou shalt be happy to-morrow!"

John had been crouching in the corner of a pew with his head on his hands. There was something in the voice that lifted him up. He looked full in the face of the speaker that looked at him. She had been dead three years—but there stood his mother! A strange feeling of quiet stole into his breast. He said to himself, "She never told me false—I shall be happy to-morrow." After that John Ralston sat up very straight and heard all the other speeches. Through them all, whatever might have been their import to other ears, there ran to him, as through so many organ-pipes, the music of that one heavenly refrain, "Happy to-morrow." The minister said, "Watch, therefore, for ye know not the day nor the hour the Son of Man cometh."

Just then the church-clock tolled twelve. John Ralston sat straight, and seemed to listen strangely straight—earnestly straight, with fixed, attentive eyes, and the first smile on his face that had been there for years. The New Year having come, the good men and women went out to begin it—on the earth where they had been happy and valuable. The last group—the next to last man—the last of all but John Ralston and the sexton—slowly departed through the door, giving each other, with clasped hands, softened and solemn New-Year's greetings, and the sexton was left to greet John Ralston. He wondered at his sitting there so straight, and gently laid his hand upon his shoulder to rouse him from his seeming fit of abstraction. He looked in his face, and said, "Come, let us go home; it is New-Year's morning."

But another messenger had said "Come" before him. John Ralston had gone home to spend his New-Year's morning. He was dead! with that sweet, unwonted smile upon his face.

In the dark room whence he had come out lay pens that would never again be lifted to write—lay paper, whose whiteness would never be soiled by the thoughts of a heart that this world had troubled. Pale and stiff upon his knees—pale and stiff by his side, drooped the weary ink-stained fingers which never more would hold John Ralston's pens. Scarred, yet quiet, in his cold breast lay the heart out of which no more those thoughts would come to John Ralston's papers.

He had come into watch-night out of the darkness, he had departed from it into the light. The morrow was there, and John Ralston was happy.

BROKEN TUBEROSES.

IT was a rainy day at Holly Hedge farm, and a blue day and a dismal one to the houseful of boarders, who lounged in the parlors, and yawned on the sly, and wished for the thousandth time that the sun would unveil itself and make outdoor life possible.

Somebody, looking around the room, wondered where Ruth Coles was, and the wonder started every body talking about her. It was a regular game of criticisms, carried on in an irregular way, at the centre-table, where a group read; in the bay-window, where were ladies, worsted, and inevitable tating; at the piano, where two girls played a duet listlessly; up and down the room, where restless bodies promenaded; and out on the piazza, where the gentlemen smoked.

The talk had gone on for ten minutes, when Miss Ogleby, at the centre-table, closing her novel and suppressing a yawn, said: "She is an odd girl."

"In what way?" asked George Gwynn, laying down his newspaper and looking as if he considered the question debatable.

"Oh, I don't know," was the answer. "She isn't like other women."

"It would be the best thing that could be said of her that she was different from some women," was George Gwynn's comment, in a significant side tone. "But really," he added, aloud, "I have heard this charge preferred against Miss Coles before. Let us constitute ourselves into a grand jury and acquit or condemn the accused. The charge in the indictment is oddity. The plaintiff is Miss Ogleby, the defendant is Miss Coles."

Craft is revealed by conversation, and George Gwynn, you see, was a young lawyer.

"Oh no! I am sure I have made no complaint," remonstrated Miss Ogleby.

"Yes you have," said George Gwynn. "Half the ladies in the room have told me Miss Coles was odd. The charge is made to the prejudice of the young lady. Bring forward your witnesses. I am here, self-constituted foreman of the jury, ready to listen and render an impartial verdict." Silence ensued.

"I must be lawyer, too," said George Gwynn, laughing. "Is Miss Coles unwomanly?"

"No, oh no," answered several.

"Is she strong-minded?"

Half a dozen said "No." Little Miss Waring, who made tating in the bay-window, thought she was.

"Is she decided in character and expression?"

"Very."

There was no dissenting voice.

"Is she literary?"

"Unmistakably."

"Is she a writer?"

No one knew. It was the general impression that she had the ability to write. Whether she used it was uncertain.

"Is she shabby in her person and habits?"

"Not in the least."

"Is she negligent of home and its duties?"

"No; she is a girl with quick conscience, one whom duty would drive through fire and water," said Magdalene Shipley.

Some of the ladies made exception to that, and said among themselves that Mag Shipley's statements ought to be taken at a discount, for she was a chip off the same block, and couldn't give an unbiased opinion.

"Does she neglect society?"

No; she was one of its brightest ornaments—in fact, a belle. Jack Thompson said that, throwing away his cigar and joining the group at the centre-table.

"Is she pedantic?"

"No! Yes! No! Yes! Yes! No!"

George Gwynn counted the ayes and nays. It was a tie. "I have talked with her by the hour," he said. "My vote in the negative will decide the question."

"Is she industrious?"

Magdalene Shipley quoted from Watts:

"How doth the little busy bee
Improve each shining hour,
And gather honey all the day
From every opening flower!"

Watts's honey-bee isn't a circumstance to Ruth Coles," she added.

"A mutual admiration society! They are always hand and glove," said some of the ladies, in a rebellious under-tone.

"Is she a saint?"

Miss Waring's smile was full of contradiction. Several answered: "Not particularly."

George Gwynn said, looking straight at Miss Waring, as if he would give her a chance to express all that her smile implied, "Is she a notable sinner?"

Miss Waring only colored, and Jack Thompson answered: "I should vote her a little lower than the average."

"Pooh! Jack Thompson and George Gwynn always were in love with her," muttered Miss Waring, with a pout.

"Is she sensible?"

"Eminently."

There was unanimity on that point.

"Pretty?"

"No, not in the least."

"She is very fine-looking and stylish. I wish I looked like her."

The neutralization to the negation was thrown in by Charlotte Hosmer, a girl with great flashing black eyes and a complexion all pink and white. Every body looked at Charlotte and laughed. She was an acknowledged beauty, and the sincerity of her wish was doubtful.

"Is there any thing else?" George Gwynne asked.

There was a long pause.

"For goodness sake, ladies," he said, "will you tell me in what Miss Coles's oddity consists?"

"Well, you won't deny that she is different from other women," said Miss Ogleby, reasoning in a circle, and coming back where she started.

"In summing up the case," said George Gwynn, "I find that Miss Coles is not unwomanly, not pedantic, not saintly, and not a notable sinner. Her positive virtues are decision, industry, conscientiousness, dutifulness, and sociality. Withal, she is eminently sensible, and, according to Miss Hosmer, very fine-looking and stylish. If she is different from other women, it seems to me the difference is in favor of Miss Coles rather than other women."

George Gwynn went out on the piazza and joined the smokers, laughing heartily over his cigar. "I have given those stupid women something to talk about," he said. "Criticise Ruth! There is not one of them can hold a candle to her. Magdalene Shipley shows her good sense by her appreciation. As for Charlotte Hosmer, that was one of her master-strokes. It was an artful way to call attention to her fine complexion and magnificent eyes."

During all this talk about Ruth Coles Pope Allison read his paper as indifferently as if the conversation had been carried on in Chinese.

"Don't know her, do you?" asked Jack Thompson, slapping him on the shoulder.

"Who?" demanded Pope, somewhat ungracious in manner.

"Miss Coles," answered Jack. "You would like her immensely. I'll introduce you when I have an opportunity."

"Oh no! I beg you not to concern yourself. I like Miss Waring exceedingly," was the answer.

George Gwynn opened his eyes wide. "Ah, Jack! you took your Coles to Newcastle that time," he said. "It's odd! Allison is as far removed from that silly little Waring by intellect and principle as possible."

Just then there was a light, springing step on the stairs, the soft sweep of a woman's trailing dress in the hall, and Ruth Coles stood in the door, her hands full of odd little pins, and paints, and sheets of wax.

"I am weary of self-entertainment," she said to Magdalene Shipley, who sprang up to meet her, "and I brought my wax-work down here."

The girls went over to a table in the corner, and George Gwynn and Jack Thompson soon joined them.

"If Ruth Coles was not odd she would not bring her wax-work into the parlor," said Miss Waring to Pope Allison, who had thrown himself in an arm-chair by her side.

"Perhaps she thinks she has pretty hands. They show off to advantage in such work," said Miss Ogleby, in an under-tone.

"They are pretty," said Pope Allison, meditatively, twisting his watch-chain, and looking out on the driving storm.

"I thought you had not met her," said Miss Waring, wonderingly.

"It is a natural inference that all ladies' hands are pretty until you find them otherwise," said Allison, quickly.

"Just look at George Gwynn and Jack Thompson!" exclaimed Miss Waring. "They act as if they thought Ruth Coles was the world's wonder. She twists them around her finger as if they were wax. By-the-way, I think wax-work is very appropriate for her. She always tries to mould every body and every thing to her will."

"She evidently don't mould you," said Pope Allison, with an odd look in his deep gray eyes.

"Indeed she don't," and Miss Waring's black eyes flashed spitefully. "It takes a woman to understand women."

"But I understand you," he answered, quietly.

Miss Waring colored and turned from the mocking light and smile that shone on Pope Allison's face. She was a woman to shrink, not rejoice at comprehension.

Over in the corner, where Ruth Coles cut and moulded waxen leaves, Jack Thompson was saying, "That will be an exquisite tuberose, Miss Ruth. I can hardly tell it from the one you wear in your hair. You always wear them in their season, I notice."

"Yes," she answered; "In memoriam."

No one asked questions, for there was that in Ruth's tone and manner that forbade it.

"Pope Allison hates tuberoses," said Jack Thompson, with simple intent to change the subject. "He switched the tops off a dozen beautiful stalks in his sister's garden yesterday. I told him it was a shame, for tuberoses never bloom but once. I thought of you, Miss Ruth, all the time. What ails you?" he asked, for Ruth's lips were white, and her eyes were full of mute inquiry.

"Nothing," she answered. "You thought of me?"

"Yes," said Jack Thompson. "I knew you always wore them when you could get them, and this was a real case of sweetness wasted on the desert air."

Ruth made no answer, but George Gwynn noted the whiteness of her lips, and the unsteadiness of her hands. "You ought to know Pope Allison," he said. His tone was careless, but he watched Ruth as a cat watches a mouse.

"I am content with my old friends," she said, with an unnatural calm. "You—and the rest."

George Gwynn bowed. He was not satisfied, but he could say no more. Magdalene Shipley helped him unconsciously. "I have only been waiting for an opportunity to introduce Mr. Allison to Ruth," she said. "They are certain to like each other."

"Oh no!" exclaimed Ruth Coles, in hurried, frightened tones. "I have enough acquaintances. I would prefer not to know him."

"Hang it!" muttered Jack Thompson, as he strode to the end of the piazza. "I don't understand it at all. Ruth isn't a bit whimsical in general. Here is Allison, just the man to appreciate and admire her, and vice versa—and they won't be introduced. Well, I wasn't anxious. I merely proposed it as a matter of justice. I felt about it a good deal, as if I had a wonderful invention on which my fortune depended, and was going to show it to the man who would be likely to steal my patent. If they won't know each other I can say of myself, 'Brutus is an honorable man,' and there is a better chance for me or George Gwynn. Gwynn and I are fighting a fair battle, and at present my chances look as good as his. I couldn't see any man win Ruth without the keenest suffering. God knows whether I shall ever win her for myself, but if I don't the earth does not hold the woman worth the winning."

Had the birds, those mysterious messengers who are supposed to glean all secrets, prattled of Jack Thompson's resolve? Miss Waring had not smiled so graciously when that charming Jack, as she called him, joined the party in the bay-window. Miss Waring was wondrously vain. She liked to have a crowd around her. Men were like sheep, she was wont to say: where one went they all went. Ruth Coles had been a belle in spite of her plainness (for any body with half an eye could see that she was plain as a pipe-stem), just because George Gwynn and Jack Thompson, who were the leaders among the Holly Hedge sheep, had taken an unaccountable fancy to her. But a greater than either had come in the shape of Pope Allison, who showed his good taste by his admiration of her; and she guessed she would show Ruth Coles and Charlotte Hosmer she could play at belleship as well as they. She didn't mind Charlotte Hosmer. She understood her secret of charming; but Ruth's was past finding out. If there was one thing she despised more than another in a girl it was incomprehensibility, and she would play Ruth Coles a trick or two when she had the chance. That was the sum and substance of Miss Waring's meditations concerning Ruth Coles; and she thought she had the chance when Jack Thompson came and leaned over the tête-à-tête where she sat, and Pope Allison watched the movements of her shuttle as if he were stealing the art of tating making.

"Have you mastered the mysteries of wax-work?" she asked, with one of her sweetest smiles. Jack Thompson's estimate of it was, "Such a smile! It had nothing but teeth and lips in its composition. Ruth's smiles catch a glory from the eyes, and get lost in the waves of chestnut hair."

"There are three mysteries I can not fathom," replied he. "Tating, wax-work, and women."

"You should not study the mysteries in combination," said Miss Waring, with a shake of her forefinger. "Now I'll be bound you have given more attention to the woman in yonder corner than the wax-work. Learn a lesson from Mr. Allison. If I should teach him tating, his whole soul would be given to his work, and not a thought would wander to the woman who taught him."

Miss Waring liked compliments, and did not scruple to angle for them. Pope Allison uttered a protest, as he was expected to do. The teacher would be infinitely more interesting than the thing taught, he said. It was so with the wax-work, said Jack Thompson, maliciously. He could hardly see the wax for thinking of the woman. He knew Miss Waring's tricks, he thought to himself.

"Are you and Mr. Gwynn going to cast lots for Miss Coles?" asked Miss Waring, with a wicked twinkle in her little black eyes. "According to her own version, she couldn't choose between you, and she is equally certain of you both. Of course, I couldn't vouch for the truth of the assertion," she added, cautiously, seeing the fire leap up into Jack Thompson's eyes. "I tell it to you as it was told me."

"Miss Coles is well worth the winning, by lot or otherwise," said Jack Thompson, obstinately.

Miss Waring turned her forces on Pope Allison. There was evidently nothing to be made in the direction of Jack Thompson. Magdalene Shipley and George Gwynn brought over some of Ruth Coles's flowers. Pope Allison turned away. He hated the odor of tuberoses, he said. "But these are wax," laughed Magdalene Shipley. "You have paid the highest compliment to Miss Coles's flowers. I must tell her."

"Please report nothing to Miss Coles that I say," said Allison, quickly. "It would not interest her in the least."

"That artful little Waring has been setting him up," was the mental conclusion of Magdalene Shipley. "He looks like a man superior to her wiles, too."

"Miss Shipley, do you believe in the doctrine of transmigrated souls?" asked George Gwynn, drawing Miss Shipley's arm in his and leading her out on the porch. "I begin to think Pope Allison and Miss Coles have met in some other planet, or held antagonistic relations in some other state of being."

Magdalene Shipley looked grave. "You are talking nonsense," she said. "If they ever met it was on this earthly ball, possibly at Newport, perhaps at Long Branch—who knows? Depend upon it, if this resistance of forces is the result of previous acquaintance, theirs was no ordinary meeting." George Gwynn assented, and his face was full of troubled, perplexed lines.

Ruth Coles was in a strange mood as the day advanced. If the weather dampened the ardor of her friends it had no such effect on her spirits. How she talked, and laughed, and made the corner merry where she sat! Miss Waring said that such exuberant spirits was an affectation of youth. Miss Ogleby remarked that it was like her to be brilliant when every body else was stupid. It was one of her odd ways. Jack Thompson pronounced it the most charming way in the world. Most women were like barometers. Every change of the wind put them in a different mood, but Ruth's spirits, the outflow of a great, womanly heart, were above the accidents of time and place.

George Gwynn did not accept the mood with such unquestioning faith. His profession, perhaps, made him suspicious. Such spirits ought to be the result of intense happiness, he argued. If Ruth Coles was the possessor of this intensity of bliss, who or what was the cause? It was not himself. He would not dare to stake his chance just then. Neither was it Jack Thompson, he was sure of that. Had that man Allison ought to do with it?

He turned to the bay-window, where he had left him; but Miss Waring was making her tating alone, and Pope Allison was smoking a cigar on the porch, looking very weary and decidedly out of spirits. He turned to Ruth. She was moulding a tuberose-leaf in the hollow of her hand. "Make me a heart's ease," he said.

Ruth shook her head. "I make nothing but tuberose to-day," she answered. Perversity was no part of Ruth's nature. George Gwynn said to himself, "The key to the mystery concerning Ruth Coles and Pope Allison is tuberose. I will talk of them."

He did not like tuberose, he rejoined. Their perfume was heavy and oppressive. He fancied them full of stifling grief. They hinted of irrevocable doom. They never bloomed but once, were devoid of the resurrective power that made most flowers beautiful. There was no escape from them. Old women thrust them in your face in the street. Sentimental young men wore them in their button-holes. Ladies put them in their hair, and made successful imitations of them in parlors. They were ubiquitous. He had seen them until their sight was a weariness, at Long Branch and Saratoga and Newport. He had tried to escape them on the mountains, but he had inhaled their hateful odor on the very top of Mount Washington.

"Yes," assented Ruth, in a dreamy, meditative way. The glitter in her eyes had died out, and the smiles about her mouth had faded. For a moment the woman was natural. George Gwynn's eyes flashed, as in the court-room they had lighted up at some sudden revelation developed by the examination of a witness. Like the Eastern nations, who in attempting to find a western passage to India discovered America, he had hit upon an unexpected discovery.

"You have been to the White Mountains?" he said.

"Yes," answered Ruth, reluctantly, her face crimson.

George Gwynn was getting at the truth; but it was not truth to make him happier. Ruth's talk that summer had been of Newport and Saratoga and Long Branch, and never a word of the White Mountains. George Gwynn's law experience had taught him that the subject of which the witness failed to speak until elicited by cross-examination was the vital subject.

He went to bed that night a wiser man. He had been talking with Pope Allison, and in a lawyer's circuitous fashion had learned that the White Mountains had been in his summer trip for three years. This year he had not been. "One tires of the best things," he said, in explanation. George Gwynn could have sworn that continuity was one of the man's characteristics, and that tiring of the earth's best things was not among his failings.

There was a new arrival at Holly Hedge farm next day. Marie Brewster, a shrewd-faced, merry little woman, who, on entering the parlor, made a bee-line for Ruth Coles, kissing her heartily, and vowing that she never was so glad to see any woman. A moment after, she had darted off at sight of Pope Allison, and stood shaking his hand, vowing that she never was so glad to see any man. Half an hour after Magdalene Shipley informed her that Mr. Gwynn had desired an introduction, and the landlady came to ask if she would know Mr. Thompson, he was so very desirous to make her acquaintance.

Marie Brewster opened her black eyes with astonishment. "I declare I am going to be a belle!" she said.

That night, as she stood before her mirror twisting her long black hair over crimping pins, she said to Magdalene Shipley, with a pout that was only half ill-natured: "It was a regular cat's-paw game. That handsome Jack Thompson and that young lawyer Gwynn only wanted to know me because I knew Ruth Coles. The young lawyer went around Robin Hood's barn and laid traps for me; but I understood his game, and was non-committal. It was due to myself and my friends. But I'll tell you, Miss Shipley, those two men might as well hang their harps on the willows. When Ruth marries it will be to neither of them. It was a miserable affair between her and Pope Allison. It happened at the White Mountains. Ruth's mother is ambitious. Pope Allison was a poor man before his uncle left him a fortune, and Mrs. Coles frowned on his suit. Ruth is not a girl to act in opposition to law and strict notions of duty, but she is one to wait, and suffer, and be true to the highest womanly instincts; so, while she would not marry against her mother's will, she would have waited, and suffered, and been true to Pope Allison. Poverty is not always just. Sometimes I think it predisposes one to injustice. Pope Allison could see in Ruth's hesitation nothing but lack of love; and, concluding that no woman's love was worth the having, he vowed that she should be dead to him, and sent her tuberose. Pope Allison is a rich man now. Why do you suppose he comes where Ruth Coles is? I wanted to tear that hateful white flower from her hair to-day. You say she made wax tuberose in the parlor yesterday? That was her abominable pride—the pride of a woman who has been misunderstood, and who can not be gracious to the rich man who thought her unloving because he was poor."

Over the morning papers a few days later the gentlemen talked of a New York fire, and great loss of property. "It's bad for Allison," said one. "His uncle's money was mainly invested in those houses."

"His career with a fortune has been after the manner of a sky-rocket," said another.

"He will find out the value of his new friends," said a third.

That prediction was soon verified. When Pope Allison entered the room Miss Waring was absorbed in conversation with a rich old sea captain, and Miss Ogleby continued a stupid game of euchre with Ruth Coles's mother. He crossed over to Charlotte Hosmer and proposed chess. Miss Hosmer was sorry, but she did not feel like it. Pope Allison's face was a study in its bewilderment. Ruth Coles was studying it. She pulled the tuberose from her corsage and began to break them in pieces, letting them fall, petal by petal, on the floor. The act meant much, but her face meant more. Pope comprehended its meaning, and crossed over. "Will you play?" he asked.

"With pleasure," answered Ruth.

George Gwynn, looking over the morning paper, saw it all. His face fell with the falling of the tuberose petals. He went out on the porch, and stumbled over Jack Thompson, who was inquiring for Ruth Coles.

"In the bay-window," answered Gwynn. "There's no use, Jack," he added, laying a detaining hand on the other's shoulder. "She hasn't a thought for us. There was hope for us as long as she wore tuberose, but she has broken them now."

Half an hour later, Jack Thompson, with the calmest face in the world, entered the parlor. "Won't you ask Ruth to ride, or walk, or dance?" asked Mrs. Coles, in a whisper. "She is in the bay-window with young Allison. Her conduct this morning is unaccountable."

Jack walked toward the bay-window. Pope and Ruth were coming forward. "I am sorry for you," said Jack, grasping Allison's hand.

"No need, I am sure," said the latter, smiling.

"No; of course not," answered Jack, looking at Ruth. "But it's a little hard for a man to lose such a fortune."

"I don't understand," said Pope.

"It is generally understood that your fortune went to ashes in last night's fires," explained Jack Thompson.

"I sold out my interest in those houses last week," was the complacent answer.

Mrs. Coles's face brightened. As for Ruth, she began to pick up the broken petals of tuberose. Pope Allison arrested the movement. "That folly is past," he said. "If my lack of money made me ungenerous, don't let my possession of it make you guilty of the same fault."

"Your mother wanted me to ask you to dance, Miss Ruth," said Jack Thompson. "I am just in the mood for it. Miss Shipley, play your wildest, gayest galop. I am going away," he added as they whirled down the room. "You will soon forget me, and I shall marry some little fairy with blue eyes and golden hair. I always liked your eyes, but for a wife there are no women like the mild-eyed, flaxen-haired women."

Thinking of his words that night, Ruth Coles said, "Jack Thompson never cared for me in the least. I wish George Gwynn cared as little." That was years ago, and George Gwynn made Marie Brewster his wife long since, but Jack Thompson is a bachelor still.

ALBERT AND VICTORIA IN THE HIGHLANDS.*

THIS is a charming little volume, covering a period of nineteen years; for, besides the residence of the royal couple in the Highlands after 1848, there is also an account of visits made to Scotland at an earlier period. The journal begins a little more than two years after Victoria's marriage, and when the Queen is still almost a child. We are sure that this journal will recommend itself to the readers of the Bazar, not because it is written by a queen—though that fact is not wholly uninteresting—but because it contains a beautiful story of a true woman's married life in its happiest period; namely, that in which, casting royalty aside, she takes refuge in her Highland fortress, and lives a life of undisturbed "quiet and liberty" among the hills with her husband and children. Too often, indeed, has this life to be exchanged for the deserts of court-life at Windsor; and, alas for the Queen! too soon is it finally concluded by the death of the Prince Consort in 1861.

The Queen became very much attached to the Highlands, "the dear, dear Highlands," as she calls them, and after leaving them "the English coast appeared terribly flat." "There is," says the Queen, "a great peculiarity about the Highlands and the Highlanders; and they are such a chivalrous, fine, active people! Our stay among them was so delightful! Independently of the beautiful scenery there was a quiet, a retirement, a wilderness, a liberty, and a solitude, that had such a charm for us." Her description of the country is always picturesque and interesting. Even when she is escorted by the Royal Archers Body-Guard (established by James I. and composed entirely of noblemen and gentlemen, bound always to be near the sovereign's person, and so devoted that at Flodden Field King James IV.'s body is said to have been found covered and surrounded by the bodies of these faithful attendants), she is not so much absorbed in the splendor of her cortège as in the contemplation of natural scenery and in observation of the people. Her eye catches every detail. She notices the old women in close caps, the barefooted children, the poor girls from sixteen and seventeen down to two or three years old, with their "loose flowing hair, a great deal of it red;" she looks away from her guard to the fishermen, "very clean and Dutch-looking, with their white caps and brightly-colored petticoats." The young Queen traveling with her young husband looks upon every thing with the fresh eyes of a child. Thus the view of Edinburgh from Leith is described as "quite enchanting; it is, as Albert said, 'fairy-like,' and what you would only imagine as a thing to dream of, or to see in a picture." Here is a picture which brings to mind that wonderful passage of Wordsworth about the dance of the miller and three dames "on the breast of the Thames:"

"In sight of the spires
All alive with the fires
Of the sun going down to his rest,
In the broad open eye
Of the solitary sky,
They dance—there are three, as jocund as free—
While they dance on the calm river's breast."

"We then," says the Queen, "came in sight of the Scotch coast, which is very beautiful—so dark, rocky, bold, and wild—totally unlike our coast. We passed St. Abb's Head at half past six. Numbers of fishing-boats (in one of which was a piper playing) and steamers full of people came out to meet us, and on board of one large steamer they danced a reel to a band. It was a beautiful evening—calm, with a fine sunset, and the air so pure." And here is another, of an evening at Taymouth: "A small fire which is up in the woods was illuminated, and bonfires were burning on the tops of the hills. I never saw any thing so fairy-like. There were some pretty fire-works, and the whole ended by the Highlanders dancing reels, which they do to perfection, to the sound of the pipes, by torch-light, in front of the house. It had a wild and very gay effect." The following is a description of a walk in the neighborhood of Blair castle:

"The moment you step out of the house you see those splendid hills all round. We went to the left, through some neglected pasture-grounds, and then through the wood, along a steep, winding path overhanging the rapid stream. These Scotch streams, full of stones and clear as glass, are most beautiful; the peeps between the trees, the depth of the shadows, the mossy stones, mixed with slate, etc., which cover the banks, are lovely; at every turn you have a picture. We were up high, but could not get to the top; Albert is in such delight; it is a happiness to see him, he is in such spirits. . . . We walked on to a corn-field, where a number of women were cutting and reaping the oats ('shearing,' as they call it in Scotland), with a splendid view of the hills before us, so rural and romantic, so unlike our daily Windsor walk (delightful as that is); and this change does us such good: as Albert observes, it refreshes one for a long time."

The journal is full of the most delightful pictures of this rural life; and in them all there is something which is deeply touching in the ever-recurring allusions to Prince Albert, whose presence was so essential to the Queen's happiness and ease. And as we reach the close, after we have read about that expedition from Balmoral to Ca-ness, how inexpressibly sad is the Queen's comment at the end—"It was our last one!"

We might, if we had space, enter into a detailed description of this delightful record. We might show how completely the Queen is undisguised in her journal, and how she appears to us only as a woman, a wife, and a mother; how she becomes sea-sick like ordinary mortals; how her little "Vicky" (the Princess Royal) is stung when she sits down upon a wasp's nest; how delighted the Queen is that "Vicky" acts so like a grown-up person, and that she is not frightened by a crowd; and how tenderly she watches Albert's moods, and admires every thing which he does or says. We might quote passage after passage full of womanly feeling—of motherly and wifely interest; but for all this we must refer our readers to the journal itself. Not the least among its interesting features will be found the sketches which the Queen made with her own hand among the Highlands and in her voyages, and which the artist has faithfully reproduced without alteration.

It was among the Highlands that Victoria, the Princess-Royal, was betrothed to Prince Frederick William of Prussia. Here was the Queen when she first received the news of the death of the Duke of Wellington and the report of the victory of the Allies at Sebastopol. It is interesting to read the Queen's own words giving her impressions upon these occasions. The beautiful simplicity of her style adds a separate and peculiar interest to the journal, placing it among those rare works which, beyond the information which they impart, please us because of an indefinable something about them, as flowers please us because of their fragrance.

Lace Scarf.

See illustration, page 216.

This scarf is made of a strip of dotted black lace three yards and a quarter long and three eighths of a yard wide, bordered with lace edging. This is pleated lengthwise through the middle, and arranged in the different styles shown in the illustration. For bretelles, fasten the middle in front to the belt with a lace rosette, brooch, or bow, pass the ends over the shoulders in the form of bretelles, tie them behind in a bow, and fasten the same to the belt. For a sash, fasten the middle of the scarf with a ribbon bow on the right shoulder, and tie the ends under the left arm in a bow; it can also be tied as a sash round the waist. For a fichu, fasten the middle to the belt behind, pass the ends over the shoulders, cross them in front, and tie them in a knot behind.

Netted Silk Fanchon.

See illustration, page 216.

This model is very simple, and may be used either as a Fanchon or for the neck. It is of white and light brown netting silk. The centre is entirely of brown silk, and is in double netting.

Begin on the front row: lay over a bar, which measures about two-thirds of an inch around, 67 stitches, and work backward and forward on the same bar 46 rounds. At the end of every round leave 1 stitch without netting, in order to form a point at the back. Now work on the other side of the foundation row a piece like the first, also in 46 rounds, and lay both halves of the work exactly on each other, so that they shall form a triangle. Next follows the lace of brown and white silk, which forms the border; this is netted in 11 complete rounds.

1st round of the lace with white silk; in every 2 of the stitches lying together on the outer edge of the foundation 1 stitch, only at each of the front corners repeat 7 times 2 stitches in 1 stitch, and net in the same manner every 2d stitch of the middle 16 stitches on the front of the foundation.

2d round with brown silk; in every stitch of the last round 1 stitch.

3d round with white silk, and over a bar which measures an inch around; in every stitch of the last round 3 stitches (3 knots).

4th round with brown silk, over the narrower bar; every 3 stitches of the last round fastened together with 1 stitch. After this repeat twice the 3d and 4th rounds. Then follows the 9th round, with white silk over the narrower bar; in every stitch a stitch.

10th round, with brown silk over a bar that measures one and a third inches; 8 stitches (knots) in every 3d following stitch of the last row—that is, two stitches missed each time.

11th round, with white silk, over the narrowest bar; in every one of these 8 stitches of the last round 1 stitch, also one stitch in the connecting stitch between the clusters of 8. Draw at the same time the connecting stitches from above under through the 2 stitches which were missed in the last round, and thus tie the knots.

This Fanchon can be made equally well of common silk or zephyr worsted.

Passementerie Trimming.

See illustration, page 216.

This is easily made by tatting with black silk, and adding a jet bead at the bottom of each oval.

Knitted Corset.

See illustration, page 216.

MATERIALS: coarse unbleached cotton; two fine steel knitting needles.

This corset is knitted of heavy unbleached cotton, and almost entirely in common garter-stitch. It is very warm, warm without whalebones, and commendable for its pliability. The original is fastened in front by buttons and button-holes.

Begin the corset on the front row by casting on 115 stitches; knit 12 rounds as above, slipping the first stitch of every round; then purl one round, knit one round, purl one round, which 3 rounds form a plain stripe on one side (the right) of the work; then knit 20 rounds plain. In the following round (36th) purl the first 49 stitches (the slip stitch in the beginning of each round is not counted); the remaining stitches of the round, as also all the stitches of the following round, are knitted plain. The wide, smooth stripe of 3 rounds, which, by so doing, comes upon the right side in the upper part of the corset, forms a part of the border of the first gore. This last requires 37 rounds to complete, and is knitted plain backward and forward. For the first round knit the first 14 stitches, and leave the remaining stitches of the last round without knitting. Every second round of the following 15 is lengthened 4 stitches by knitting with it 4 stitches from the row which was left. For the next round (17th) of the gore knit the entire row of stitches the full length of the corset—the first 47 plain, then 2 purred, and the remainder plain. For the 18th to the 20th rounds knit also the entire length of the corset, but in the 19th, the first 42 stitches plain, then 7 purred, and the remainder plain. For the 21st round of the gore knit 38 stitches, purl 4, and leave the remainder without knitting. The 23d, 25th, 27th, 29th, 31st, and 33d rounds are knitted like the 21st, but each of these rounds must be shortened by 4 plain stitches immediately before the 4 purred, so that the 33d round counts only 14 plain stitches and 4 purred. It is understood that the preceding rounds, for which no especial directions have been given, must be knitted plain. Now knit 1 round on the whole 115 stitches, the first 49 purred, and the remainder plain, X the return round plain, which forms the stripe on the other side of the finished gore. Now knit 14 rounds, then the 2d gore, which is formed precisely as the first.

After the completion of the 2d gore, knit 3 rounds entire; then begin the hip gore, which is formed like the other gores, with the exception of being longer and broader. Without counting the plain stripe which surrounds it, and which is knit like those of the other gores, this hip gore counts 38 rounds: the first round includes 14 stitches; every second round of the next 18 is lengthened by 5 stitches; every second round of the remaining 19 shortened by 5 stitches. Having finished the hip gore, knit 18 rounds the entire length of the corset. In the beginning of the following round (19th), in the upper part of the corset, cast off 8 stitches, and in the beginning of the 21st 2 stitches, in order to form the arm-hole; knit 30 rounds on the shortened row, then form the 2d hip gore. Having completed this, knit 12 rounds, casting on 1 stitch at the end of the last (at the arm-hole); besides this, cast on 1 stitch at the end of the second round following, and 20 in the second following that. On the round thus lengthened knit 80 rounds, after which form in the middle of the back two gores, one in the upper, and one in the lower part of the corset. In forming these two gores only the 12 middle stitches are left without knitting. Knit first the upper gore, of which the 1st (longest) round reaches from the top to the 12 middle stitches. Thenceforth shorten every second following round of the gore by the 4 stitches next the 12 middle stitches; proceed in this manner till the shortest row of the corset, which must count 20 stitches, is reached; on this knit one return round, and the gore is half finished. Knit now one round the entire length of the corset, all the stitches of the upper gore and the 12 middle stitches being purred, and the remainder (which form the first round of the lower gore) plain. The next round is knitted from the lower edge to the 12 middle stitches; every second following of the next 16 rounds must be shortened by 2 stitches, and every second of those following that by 3 stitches, till the shortest row of the gore (which must count 20 stitches) is reached. Having knitted the return round, knit 1 round the entire length of the corset (the right side being on the right side of the corset); this finishes the half of the lower gore, and, at the same time, the half of the corset. The 2d half is knitted in the same manner, except that the order of the rounds is reversed. Knit first the second half of the upper gore, which must be begun with the shortest round of 20 stitches. Lengthen every following second round by the same number of stitches as were taken off in the first half. Having finished the upper gore, knit one round the entire length of the corset (the right side being on the right side of the corset); then knit the second half of the lower gore, lengthening every second round in the same proportion in which the first half was shortened. Having finished these two back gores, the corset can be completed by the directions already given. A row of button-holes must be formed in the front, 12 rounds before taking off the corresponding buttons being on the other side. Now collect the 11 stitches lying next the arm-hole on the front, and knit garter-stitch as follows, to form the shoulder-band: the first 3 rounds knit the entire row, then every second following of the next 3 rounds narrow by 2 stitches, thus forming a little gore next the arm-hole; then knit 50 rounds, and again a little gore, of which the first round counts 2 stitches with the 3d and 5th rounds following lengthened each by 2 stitches; then knit 44 rounds, after which knit the 11 stitches still on the needle with the 11 stitches on the edge of the back next the arm-hole. Having knit the second shoulder-band in the same manner, collect on needles the side stitches on the upper edge of the corset, and knit two rounds backward and forward as usual, then one eyelet row, and finally two rounds plain, after which the work is cast off. Through the eyelet row draw a band, by means of which the corset can be drawn together.

Ball and Evening Dresses.

THESE dresses are all gored, with very short waists, and are worn over a chemisette of puffed or figured lace; a puffing of lace being likewise set in the arm-hole.

Fig. 1.—Dress of green taffetas, with a narrow flounce of the same material round the bottom; this flounce is surmounted by three puffings of white lace, separated by satin rouleaux. Short over-skirt of light-green taffetas, with broad, pointed flounce, covered with white lace, over which satin rouleaux intersect each other in a sort of trellis. Two long sash ends fall in the back of the skirt. The low corsage is trimmed round the neck with a narrow frill of taffetas, surmounted by a satin rouleau. White roses complete the trimming.

Fig. 2.—Dress of pink taffetas, with short over-skirt of white muslin, both trimmed with a muslin quilling.

Fig. 3.—Dress and over-skirt of lilac silk; the latter bound with lilac ribbon and edged with broad black lace. Black lace bertha.

with brown satin across the ends and on one side; then lay the other side in pleats in the form of a fan; put the four pieces together in the manner shown in the illustration, letting the smaller pieces lie over the larger ones, and cover the seam with a loop of brown silk, corded on each side with brown satin. The ends of the bow are sixteen inches long and eight inches wide, and are made of brown silk double, with an interlining of stiff lace; they are corded on the edges with brown satin, and trimmed across the bottom with heavy brown silk fringe. The top is pleated and set under the bow. The belt is of double silk, corded on the edges with satin, and trimmed around the bottom with corded loops of silk. The belt is fastened with hooks and eyes, over which the bow is placed. Either of the other bows, of which we give illustrations, can be substituted for the fan-shaped bow. The first is made of a bias strip of doubled silk, two with white crochet silk; white silk braid can be substituted for this. The pattern for this waist is found in the Supplement to Harper's Bazar, No. 11, Figs. 1-7, taking care to cut both fronts straight. The closing of the belt is covered by a loop of blue silk.

Tray for Bottles, etc.

THE foundation is a round piece of lacquered tin. Four little pieces of wire, each about half an inch long, are used for attaching this foundation to a strong wire ring. The ring and small pieces are lacquered white. The upper side of the bottom is covered with crystal and blue beads, as shown in the illustration.

Small holes made in the bottom serve to fasten this bead-work to the outer edge. The small pieces and the wire ring are wound closely with blue beads. While winding the ring, fasten thereto at the same time a string of crystal and large glass beads, as shown in the illustration. The diamond pattern of the bottom comprises four rows of the crystal, bordered by three rows of the blue beads. This tasteful and ornamental tray will be found useful for holding bottles, glasses, etc.

Belt with Sash.

THIS belt is a tasteful adjunct to a ball or evening dress, and is made of the same material as the dress with which it is worn. The arrangement of the bow is new and tasteful. The original is of brown silk, the ends of the bow being trimmed with brown silk fringe. For the bow cut from the silk double, and stiff lace for interlining, each two pieces, a quarter of a yard long and an eighth of a yard wide, and two pieces each a quarter of a yard long and four inches wide. Lay the interlining between the silk, and cord each of these four pieces

The other is a bow with ribbon loops, two inches wide and an eighth of a yard long, laid in three pleats at the ends, and finished in the middle, where the loops are joined together, with a piece of ribbon pleated three times, in the manner shown in the illustration.

White Alpaca Waist.

A SIMPLE trimming of blue silk and white guipure insertion simulates a bodice. The collar, cuffs, belt, and buttons are of blue silk. The silk is scalloped, in the manner shown in the illustration, and cross stitched LINES BY ONE WHO WAS NOT PROUD.

THE SUBJECT BEING A NEW SON.

My wife last week presented me,
On Saturday, at noon,
A conjugal, domestic pledge,
A very small Tycoon.
A wee, wee Calmuc Tartar,
A florid Mandarin,
Just like the dolls in Tuttle's store—
The squeaking ones I mean.

I call him Calmuc Tartar in
A playful kind of way,
He's such a cunning Mongol look,
Just flavored with Cathay;
A fine young Hyson sentiment,
True blue Celestial eyes,
With Oriental gums, no doubt,
And warlike China cries.

A piece of Nature's porcelain,
Fresh from the potter's hand,
Such as they make at Kiang-shi,
Out in the Flow'ry Land.
So him I call such funny names,
As those of which I spoke,
Although the nurse and wife's mamma
Don't see or like the joke.

I'm banished from my chamber now,
A myst'ry reigns o'er all
The movements of my household troops
From cupola to hall.
With forms, and guards, and secret airs,
"Mum!" underneath the rose,
I'm ushered in to see my son
All smothered in the clothes.

The circumstance I've mentioned once
Or twice down town at lunch
To business friends; who slyly hint
"Of course," I'm proud as Punch.
If Punch be proud, he may have cause,
It may or mayn't be so,
But why vain thoughts should swell my breast
It's really hard to know.

Such things as this have been before,
And that to humble men;
The German tailor down the street
Has very nearly ten;
While Mike, who does odd chores for me,
Owns quite a little crowd.
His sturdy wife had twins to-day,
And he ain't very proud.

Winks, nods, and smiles, and cheery words
Greet me on every side,
Yet I can't feel the small Tycoon
Cause for excessive pride.
And why "think all the world of him?"
Can't see it in that light,
The acquaintance is so very short,
The intercourse so slight.

The chances yet have been so rare,
So very, very rare,
For aiding that acquaintance 'twixt
Myself and son and heir.
I doubt not as I see him more
My feelings changed may seem,
May blossom into friendship,
And ripen to esteem.

'Tis very seldom now, indeed,
I see the wee Tycoon;
The monthly female tells me, though,
He'll hold a levee soon.
Dear! dear! how odd he is and red!
His nose is mine, 'tis true.
My wife is right about his eyes,
They're very, very blue.

The nurse avers she never saw
A child of such a size.
Such legs and arms! and such a back!
(The toady!) and such eyes!
That Lunar female tells great flams,
Sad flattery, and stuff;
But I see through (though Jane can not)
Her blarney clear enough.

The infant's not a shrimp, perhaps,
As Calmuc Tartars run;
But no such wild loose talk as that
For me, thou looney one!
I'm not of those who swallow flams,
Who gulp down gilded lies,
Whose geese are swans before they've grown
To half a gosling's size.

No! I will stand me like a man,
And call a spade a spade.
If dull my child, I'll call him dull,
And ill if illy made.
I almost wish, though strange 't may seem,
He some small beauty lacked,
That I might then, which now I can't,
With justice own the fact.

But graver thoughts unbidden come:
A solemn charge is here;
One that no man can contemplate
Without some touch of fear.
This human being—is it mine,
This tiny fellow-man?
Am I a pupil, little learned,
To make or mar the plan?

With awe I think, wee helpless thing,
What power's reposed in me.
There's scarcely any earthly wrong
I might not vent on thee.
Torment thy frame, pervert thy mind,
And none to hear thy cry.
In all this wide, wide world, not one
To stand 'twixt you and I.

From the din of worldly ways
I bolt my study door,
And ask our Father for my son
Honor and worldly store—
To make my boy, when ripe in years,
Through all temptations strong—
A brave and loyal gentleman,
I hope I do no wrong.

HIGH MASS IN A PARISIAN CHURCH.

IN the mind of the priest the essential features of the mass, in whatever mode it is celebrated, are always one and the same: an expiatory sacrifice, offered by consecrated priests upon a consecrated altar. But to the uninitiated spectator the scene seems essentially to vary as it is presented in different churches. The accessories of the service are flexible, and may be adapted to the construction of the building, the resources of the sacristy or treasury, and to what we may perhaps call the ecclesiastical fancy of the authorities of the church. In some of the churches of Continental Europe it appears almost wholly in the aspect of a solemn spectacle to be witnessed. In such cases the choir, where the priests stand before the altar, is often raised several steps above the common floor of the church, and separated from the congregation by a decorated open screen, consisting of a lofty but very light iron fence; and within the choir nothing is allowed to obscure the view which the congregation, looking through this screen, have of the high altar and the movements which the numerous priesthood make before it. In other churches the ceremony seems more like an oratorio to be heard than a religious drama enacting.

It is in the latter aspect that the mass is presented in the great parish churches of musical reputation in the city of Paris; and as thus practiced it forms a striking contrast to the more imposing pageant afforded to the eye in many other places where the music is far less agreeable to the ear.

Imagine yourself seated in the centre of the gray and golden interior of a vast but symmetrical edifice. Vistas of gray stone pillars and circular arches stretch away from you in which ever direction you look; and the walls, which are half hidden by the pillars, are crowded with decorations consisting of paintings, statuary, flags, and monumental tablets. The sombre hue of the lower range of arches, through which are seen these shaded aisles, is illumined here and there by a group of little candles burning before some side-altar, and by a flood of yellow and crimson tints from above. As you look you see that the arches of the ceiling, a hundred feet above you, are adorned with vast frescos painted upon gilded ground-works, while colored sunlight from the great windows there falls in bright patches on the scene below. The congregation, consisting largely of women, and those mostly old and of the humbler orders, is seated in plain rush-bottom chairs, the yellow seats and high red frames of which add a homely and cozy expression to the otherwise stately and imposing array.

The two rows of great pillars which sustain the roof, as they draw near to each other in the perspective, seem the more clearly to wall off the nave and choir, occupied respectively by the congregation and the clergy, from the side-aisles where some spectators stand. Many persons are passing to and fro through these aisles; some are worshipers going to chapels in various parts of the building, where smaller congregations are assembled; others are curious strangers marching around with hats in hand, and turning their heads this way and that, admiring and conversing in low tones or whispers. The sound of these footsteps along the stone floor does not wholly cease throughout the service.

The building is of the cruciform shape, and as we sit in the centre we have before us that part which constitutes the head of the cross, known usually as the choir. In this church the choir is not more elevated than the rest of the floor, nor is it distinguished by the decorated screen through which in many churches the officiating priests are seen amidst the smoke of incense. No such devices to etherealize the pageant to the eye are used here. Only a low rail, broken in the centre by a broad gateway, marks the boundary between the priests and the people. At each side of the gateway stands a beadle. These are men chosen for their size and imposing personal appearance, well-matched with each other, and attired in uniforms half civil half military. They wear high cocked-hats, broad bands of scarlet hanging from the left shoulder, and supporting a sword in a horizontal position just above the heels and below the skirt of a long-tailed coat, white stockings meeting the breeches at the knee, and silver lace every where. Each holds a baton crowned by a massive pear-shaped silver head, and from time to time each takes in hand also a tall lance with a gilded head, which stands usually in a socket in the floor behind him.

As you look by these guardians of the gateway into the head of the cross occupied by the clergy the appropriateness of calling it "the choir" readily appears. Were it not for the ecclesiastical robes of the occupants it would seem more like a concert-room than a church. The most conspicuous object in it is a mammoth music-book, raised aloft and open to the view, upon a huge lecturn in the centre of the floor. This book, so large and high, is useless as a book, but forms a picturesque symbol of the group of musicians who surround it. Six great chandeliers hang from the roof over the choir. All these objects fill the eye and preoccupy the attention; and the high-altar in the back-ground, with the officiating priests there, who are thus half concealed, are half forgotten by the spectator as he watches the musicians and listens to the music.

The musical arrangements are all in plain sight. The group in the centre of the space consists of a number of priests in their black and white robes and bald-spotted wigs; for priests, unlike common mortals in every thing, wear wigs to create, not to conceal, the appearance of baldness. There are also a score or two of boys dressed in robes of thin white suffused by the scarlet color of their under-robes, and wearing scarlet girdles and skull-caps. Many of the men have music-stands, and some of them have instruments, chiefly double-basses and huge brass horns. The singers are accompanied by the chancel organ, a large instrument, which just fills the space between two of the great pillars, and you can see the organist seated at it, and moving slightly as he plays. Between the organ and the chorus stands the leader, upon a raised platform, with his desk before him, and beating time as the service proceeds, and around him sit or stand several men who seem to have special parts to bear.

Around the sides of the choir, and against the row of pillars which bounds it, is a double range of stalls or pews, occupied by priests in robes indicating their various ranks. These men, with small books, seem to join in the monotonous chants, but take no part in the other music.

Upon the floor in front of these benches, and around the central group of musicians, the officiating clergy pass and repass, and take their stand here or there as the exigencies of the ceremony require. Sometimes they are in view, but sometimes they disappear behind the musicians as they approach the high altar beyond.

After some monotonous chant, led by the great bass instruments, draws to its close, you see the maestro or leader handing down sheets of music, which are distributed to the group before him. As the chant ceases the organ glides into an attractive melody, priests who were sitting at one side, and to whom copies of the music have been passed, come forward to join the group of singers, the baton of the leader indicates the rhythm of the new movement, and a man rises and commences a song. He wears the black gown and gloves of a priest; but his mien and style, and his voice, which rings through the whole church, or seems to float upon a soft accompaniment, satisfy you that he is not an ecclesiastic, and prepare you to credit an informant who says that the best singers of the Opera Comique are employed here. When the chorus take up the theme the sweet and manly voices of young and old seem to fill the resonant edifice. You hardly know whether to close your eyes and listen undisturbed, or to watch the leader as he seems to carry the expression of his well-trained choir upon the tip of his graceful moving wand. At the close of the cadence an interlude bursts upon your ear from the great organ, which is far behind, in the loft at the other end of the church. When its reverberations die away the notes of the chancel organ rise again, leaving the ear uncertain where one ceased and the other began; and then the priests and singing-boys, the basses and horns, and the Italian tenor resume their theme.

In the midst of this succession of exquisite music alternating with droning chants the ceremonial of mass goes on.

The service is commenced by the formation of a procession in the choir. After some little delay in marshaling it in the proper order, during which the singing of a chant goes on led by the great horns, the procession moves. It is headed by a priest bearing a tall silver crucifix, and a boy on either side with lighted candles; and all the clergy and singing-boys follow, chanting as they walk. The two beadles, in their cocked-hats, lead the way, their staves ringing loudly on the marble pavement at every alternate step. Thus they pass slowly down one aisle and up the other, making the circuit of the church, and returning to the choir. After a considerable interval occupied by songs and choruses a priest passes down through the congregation, sprinkling them with holy water from a brush, which is dipped in a silver vessel carried by a boy following him. Again toward the conclusion of the service, and after much more music, and many readings and chantings from different lecturns in various parts of the choir, a group of priests appears behind us, and passes up through the congregation to the altar. The central figures in the group are two boys in white robes, bearing a litter on their shoulders, which is covered with a white cloth, and on it lie two large rings or hoops of bread, surrounded by lighted candles. The priest at the altar, to whom this is carried, sprinkles the bread with holy water, and it is then carried away to a side-room to be cut up. The fragments are afterward brought in baskets by the boys, who pass through the congregation, distributing them to all who wish to partake.

WORRIED TO DEATH.

STRAY LEAVES FROM THE DIARY OF A WOMAN OF FASHION.

Sept. 12.—I am worried to death. Some senseless people, who ought to know better, say that the rich and the fashionable have no troubles. I'm a living contradiction to that assertion; I'm always in trouble. It seems sometimes as if every thing combined to cheat me out of my natural enjoyment. To-day, for instance, I have had bad news concerning my niece Tatty. Tatty is not a musical cognomen, her real name is Catherine. Ungrateful girl that she is, she has married her father's foreman, and the son of a blacksmith. I held up my hands in horror when I heard of it. I could not go to the wedding. Some time ago I suspected the child; I told her she made too much of the man. "Why, Aunt," said she, "he runs the factory—he is the most important man in the business; papa calls him his right hand."

"Only a better sort of machinery, child," said I; "it's no reason he should presume."

"He don't presume," cried Tatty, indignantly, and then talked of heart and sentiment and natural nobility and that sort of thing till she nearly drove me into hysterics.

When I think of what I have done for that girl I despair. Years of toil, hours of anxiety, hundreds of dollars have I spent upon her. It would not have been so bad if the man she has married had been presentable; but he has an awful beard, a ferocious head, and he won't wear gloves. He is neither young, graceful, nor even, to my idea, handsome. Tatty says he is "magnificent!"—misguided child.

Very well, it is over. I tried to do my duty by my niece; I was proud of her as soon as I saw that she gave promise of beauty. She has my chin, and the Pendleton hands. Her eyes are Crosswicks—that's her mother's family; but she has inherited her nose and chin from us. She was my protégé; for months, indeed for years, she spent her winters in New York. I gave her parties, I gave her style—in fine, I flatter myself that I made her. And after all she has disappointed me. One would never believe the pains I have been at, and the worry I have had, to provide a fitting match for that girl. Such splendid offers as she has refused, all to lay her heart in the hand of a common engineer. There was Colonel Dartmore, with his millions. If she had married him she would have been a widow now (he died three months after he proposed, poor man), and held her head with the highest in the land. He was seventy, and had lost the use of his right hand by palsy; but he worshipped her. "To be the husband of so lovely a being," how often he has said to me, with a sigh, "I would give all I possess in the world." And now his millions are divided among a dozen charities, and she has stooped to share the humdrum life of a factory foreman, in the midst of old women and pauper children. I shall lose my wits if I think about it.

Then there was young Asheep—such a match, and such a fortune! It nearly broke my heart when she refused him. When I laid before her his many attractions, and told her he had every thing to recommend him, she answered pertly that she didn't know of but two things—the parting of his hair, and the inimitable way in which he begged pardon for nothing. It is true, he did have a habit of always supposing himself in somebody's way, or else imagining that he had committed some breach of good-manners, but then he had been on the Continent, and I have heard that a thief politely begs your pardon there, while he is robbing you of your watch, and a stranger begs your pardon if he thinks you are too quiet. I am really in trouble; how could Tatty so forget herself and me?

Sept. 13.—No sooner is one vexation over than another begins; my dressing-maid has given notice. I have offered to double her wages; but, no, she must go to Boston. Some ridiculous old party has been taken ill; I think she said her grandmother, who brought her up, and the creature came to me actually crying. These people ought to have no feelings. Decidedly it is my opinion that dressing-maids and such like ought to be born without hearts; they are so necessary to the comfort of the upper classes. I grow savage as I think of it. The girl will never get such a place as this again. Nothing, absolutely nothing, to do; and such wages! Then she will be out of employment, for I make it a point never to take back my servants. This old grandmother—some poor wretch of a mendicant, I suppose—will die, and as for the blessing, which seems to be about all that Jessie wants, why she would get that, whether or no. I told her the expense of travel might much better be turned into a gift toward defraying the costs of the funeral, and then she had the audacity to inform me that she had a heart, and could feel grateful. That's just the trouble—having a heart, and showing gratitude toward the wrong person. Why shouldn't she be grateful to me? I have been kind to her. I've no patience with such creatures. If she leaves me before Mrs. Potiphar's ball comes off I shall go distracted. No hair-dresser in New York can curl my hair as she does. I have coaxed, I have threatened; nothing moves her. She is not afraid that she shall lose her character by going. She tells me it will be excuse enough that she left me to go and comfort the last hours of her poor grandmother—poor fiddle-sticks! No matter if I get ill, and ill I most certainly shall be; one of my headaches is coming on; I must lie down.

Half past two.—No sleep. The moment my poor head touched the pillow a street organ struck up, accompanied by a distracted tambourine. Why are these people allowed to disturb their betters? Is there no street, not even Fifth Avenue, sacred from their vulgar presence? I rang for Wilkes, the upper house-maid, and told her to send them away.

"Please ma'am, it's a very honest set, apparently," she said, dropping a half courtesy; "a poor man with his wife and baby." Wilkes is new, or I should have dismissed her on the spot for impertinence. I told her to send them away, and never to answer me unless I asked her a question. The grinder had scarcely gone before a band came by. One might as well have tried to sleep in Pandemonium. Not a minute's peace have I had since early morning, and here comes a letter that I dare say will add to my discomfort.

Sept. 14.—My conjecture was but too correct. The letter announced the arrival of Aunt Packaway in New Jersey, from whence, after a sojourn of a few days, she will come on and spend a good long visit. Now I shall be worried to death. She always brings a maid, a boy, and three or four poodles. A sweet addition to my cares—a scolding relative who may or may not leave me a bouncing legacy, and three howling dogs. Who dares to say that I have no trouble? And the very time she has set to make this outrageous infliction I had intended for the T—s' visit—the T—s are just from India, and so stylish! If the old woman had one redeeming quality besides her wealth it would not be so dreadful, but every body hates her. If I don't give a dinner for her, I'm sure to be hinted at in connection with her will; if I do, she'll offend every soul she speaks to. Think of her telling Governor N— that he was very like her nephew, except for his squint, and the Governor the very vainest man of my acquaintance. Imagine my feelings! And she did not scruple to declare that her money had been made in soap. Fancy my anguish when I overheard her telling young Asheep, who considers it vulgar even to speak of work, how she always washed the nasty poodles herself; that when she married Packaway he hadn't fifty dollars in his pocket. And then my niece, willful in that as in every thing, protests that she is charmingly original; and I believe she really likes that queer, impertinent old woman. I can't help it if she is my mother's sister. I'd cut her if I could afford it; but when Mr. Wharton—that's my husband—hints at hard times and retrenchment there is some solace in thinking of her money-bags.

"Please, ma'am, here's a note."

More trouble, no doubt. Yes, it's from Wharton. "Unexpectedly come across—mum, mum—two cousins and a friend—mum, mum—might as well ask Busby, good fellow—mum, mum"—all of which means four to dinner and not the slightest preparation. Was ever woman so badgered? Send down to cook; she must do something. Cook returns message: "Please'm she's cut her finger to the bone with the new bread-knife, and she'll be obliged to have a doctor immedately."

Oh no, we have no troubles—we never have any troubles! It's no trouble to order a dinner from the nearest hotel, pay twenty dollars for it, and find it hardly fit to eat! It's no trouble to have servants who will persist in putting the salt at the wrong end, and twisting your best napkins into Dutch cork-screws! It's no trouble to meet your husband with smiles while you are boiling over with resentment, and a consciousness that you never looked worse in your life! No trouble to be obliged to say civil things to those red-faced men with mutton-chop whiskers, who can't have dined decently for a fortnight, and laugh at the stale jokes of that stupid, stupid Busby, who talks out of his shirt-bosom, and looks at every body severely after he has said what he thinks is a smart thing, as much as to say, "Now, don't laugh, though, of course, you will and must." If I could only photograph on the hearts of our maligners and accusers one-tenth part of the crosses and vexations I bear from day to day, they would very soon cease to envy us. As I told a miserable creature who came to me with a dismal story, like all their stories, you know—husband out of work, child sick at home, every thing at its worst. "My good woman," said I, giving her a shilling (I never allow myself to give more), "go home, and remember what I tell you. You may have poverty, illness, and all that sort of thing; but though you see me living in a great house, with servants, and in apparent ease, I can assure you that I have more serious difficulties to contend with than you possibly can." She looked as if she doubted me. I am very sure she did, so when she began whining again, and actually pretended to cry (some people cry so easily), I sent for Wilkes to put her out. I saw Wilkes hand her something, and it made me suspicious. Wilkes is new, and there's a deal of valuable things lying about the house, so I made her tell me what it was.

"Please, ma'am," said Wilkes, "it were a quarter as my own uncle give me for the fair; but it hurt me to see her look so down-hearted. Poor folks feels for poor folks, ma'am."

I was very angry with Wilkes—very angry indeed. I will not have these people haunting the house; my nerves will not allow it. I told Wilkes that if she encouraged such creatures I should see to it. She knew what I meant, and went away very red.

Sept. 15.—Wrote a letter to that dreadful aunt. Screwed my courage up to say that she was welcome, and all that sort of thing, and that I trusted she and the blessed poodles would arrive safe; that James would meet her at the station, though I'm afraid he will try to upset her. James is a superior coachman, but he hates dogs.

And I shall have to welcome her, and breathe my face in smiles, though she will come, in all human probability, on the very day I had appointed to meet my new dress-maker, who is generally engaged every day for a year ahead; and I must fly and find places for those wretched poodles, though the moment I set eyes on the frightful things I shall feel like strangling them; I am sure they will worry me to death.

Another letter from niece Tatty, to tell me how happy she is—pshaw! I suppose she expects I shall ask her machinist down here—no such thing. An awkward, shabby, long-legged, and perhaps threadbare—but stop:

"DEAREST AUNT,—You will be delighted to know that my Edward has just received news of an inheritance from his uncle, Chief-Justice B—, which makes him independent for life; so that you can no longer reproach me with marrying a nobody," etc.

That is the worst cut yet, to think it should all turn out so differently from what I predicted. What a lucky girl she is! No doubt the engineer will crow now. Dear me, how things do change round to be sure! I heard to-day that the Asheeps had failed; young Asheep is ruined, of course. If my dear Tatty had married him, I should never have forgiven myself. I must write immediately to my darling girl, who, thanks to my care, will grace her good fortune. We must have them down to dinner, that will half atone for my aunt's disagreeable peculiarities.

Sept. 17.—Tatty can't come, but Aunt Packaway is here. The meeting was got over, how, I can hardly tell. I can only say that I am worried to death. The first thing her most active poodle did was to knock down my best fire-screen, a costly affair, and break it. Then there was a yelping, and my aunt scolded me for allowing such a "gimcrack," that was the word she used, to stand in the way. Her blessed Fanchon's blessed leg was broken, she believed. I wished it had been his neck—but no! Fanchon is putting his four legs into every thing as usual, and snarling over my velvet cushions, driving all the other precious curs off, and yelping if any body but my aunt lay so much as a finger on him.

Sept. 20.—No troubles! I shall go distracted if that woman remains here a week longer. To-day she cut the best bit of meat on the table and sent it to her dogs, and then launched out at me for extravagance. Not one moment's comfort does that trying female give me in my own house. To improve matters, Madame Trimmer has sent in her bill, which is just four times the amount I anticipated. Wharton looks ugly at me if I speak to him about money. That's the way with us. Only let people think we are rich and every body considers us legitimate prey. There's a distant cousin of mine, who has written me several times, dying of consumption, she says, and then comes a long list of troubles. I'd die before I would go to my rich relations. Think of her having the impertinence to tell me that the cost of one of my silk dresses would keep her comfortable for months. Are there not charitable institutions in this great city? I gave a dollar toward one only last week. Am I to relinquish my position, my comforts, my toilettes, because there are poor people in the world? I am very sure that were I to be beggared to-morrow—well, after all, one does not quite know what one would do saying one was brought to poverty. I'll send her a V, and save it in table-expenses if I can.

Sept. 22.—I am worried to death—I am doomed to have no peace; if it's not one thing it's sure to be another. That horrible Fanchon destroyed my fan yesterday—a fifty-dollar fan. And for comfort my abominable aunt told me that I was very careless—that Fanchon, poor pretty pet, was not to blame for her playful propensities. I only await a favorable moment to tread on poor Fanchon's toe, or to strangle her if I can get the opportunity.

Sept. 23.—The opportunity has come at last. Three times to-day I have shaken the blessed poodle till it was nearly choked. My aunt is ill at last, and can not even bear the presence of her poodles. A nice time they are having of it, the petted dears. They are paying rapidly for former transgressions. They room at present in the back attic—their meals are served to them occasionally. Fanchon, the darling, has become so well-mannered that she does not even squeak an assertion of her rights. They all seem low in spirits, and wag their tails in a melancholy manner. Probably they are aware of my Aunt Packaway's illness. That blessed woman must have every thing put aside for her. The sublime old party is mistress; she orders every body and keeps two bells and three servants, besides her own, going all the time. Draughts and pills and powders occupy the spare room on every table, étagère, and shelf. If I go in she is angry that I disturb her; if I don't go in she sobs that I neglect her. I am worried to death, and the only consolation I have is, that I can do as I please with the poodles. If she irritates me beyond endurance I shake Fanchon. I am doubtless creating trouble for myself as soon as my aunt gets round again; but I could not forego the sweet satisfaction of training those delightful animals.

Sept. 25.—My pugnacious aunt insists upon sending for Tatty—or Catherine, as she calls her. She does me the honor to say that she is the only sensible female in the family. I hope Tatty will come, it will take the care off of my hands. What with running up stairs and down, first to my aunt and then to the poodles—what with smiling when I am expected to cry, and crying when I ought to smile—what with coming at wrong times and not coming at right ones, I am in a fair way of being worried to death.

Sept. 27.—It is all over. Nobody dreamed that the woman was so near her end. I shall sell the poodles—I shall bring in a bill for her board and theirs—the care, the nursing. Aunt Packaway has left my niece Catherine all her money.

THE CEREMONY OF PRESENTATION TO THE QUEEN.

TO be presented to the Queen is the boast of English women and men. The presentation rooms are on the second story, and occupy the entire quadrangle of St. James, opening one into the other through the whole suite.

About six Levees are held a year. It takes a hundred men three weeks to prepare the rooms. Every thing is measured by the inexorable law of etiquette. The dress is prescribed; the material, the length of the trains, the mode of dressing the hair, and the style of the garments. The doors would be shut in the face of the highest lady in the land if she departed in the slightest degree from the well-known law. The dress of the ladies must be velvet, satin, silk, lace, or tulle. Brides are allowed to wear white tulle, and widows black tulle; but each must be trimmed with roses or variegated ribbons. Peers, ambassadors, and military officers wear their full uniform. Judges wear wigs, and lawyers appear in gowns of scarlet and black, according to their rank. Bishops and the clergy who have the run of the Court come out in full clerical costume. The Court dress of "gentlemen" is a black dress coat and pants, white vest, which must be open, and white cravat. The Master of Ceremonies prescribes the order for dressing the hair. Court hair-dressers are few. They are engaged not only hours but days before the Presentation. Some ladies, who can do no better, have their hair fixed from twenty-four to thirty-six hours before the Presentation, and do their sleeping in a sitting posture.

The Throne Room is a right royal room. There is not a seat in it except the Throne and the gilded chair at the foot. On a platform reached by three steps and on a crimson carpet, spattered with gold, stands a gilt Gothic chair surmounted by a crown. This is the Throne. It is covered with a canopy of crimson velvet, trimmed with heavy gold lace. On the top of the canopy is a golden cushion, on which rests a larger gold crown. The Throne Room is very long, nearly two hundred feet. Running the whole length is a heavy iron fence, full five feet high, capped with crimson velvet. Between it and the wall is a narrow passage leading from the entrance to the Throne, through which but one person can pass at a time. The great throng below, at a given signal, come up the stairway, which is covered with cocoa matting and worn crimson carpeting. They enter the great Audience Room that opens into the Throne Room.

The Audience Room is very gorgeous with satin hangings, radiant with vermillion and gold, but it is all cut up into little cattle-pens, made of iron railings very high and strong. They open one into another the whole length of the great chamber, making a zigzag passage from the entrance to the Throne Room. These pens are separated by heavy iron gates, guarded by officials, through which each person has to pass. Precedence is every thing. When the signal is given below the rush commences. The fine ladies become a disorderly mob. They crowd on each other, rend laces, trample velvets and satins under foot; and with all these guards to keep them orderly, they often appear in the "Presence," as it is called, all tattered and torn, and in a state of general dilapidation.

Back of the Throne is the Queen's Closet. It is a little dilapidated-looking room, low studded, scantily furnished, but old, which is the great attraction. Her Majesty is painfully prompt. At the exact moment she comes out of her Royal Closet and takes her stand on the lower step of the Throne. On the signal being given Her Majesty's Ministers, with the Foreign Ambassadors, enter from the private door, file singly before the Queen, bow, and take their station in the centre of the room, where they remain. The crowd is admitted one by one, passing through all the pens till they approach the Throne. To manage the train is no easy matter. Lessons are given in this art as on horseback riding, each lady has to take care of her train herself. She throws it over her arm, and in the carriage the huge pile towers above her head. She carries it up the stairway to the Audience Room. Here a "Page of the Prince," as he is called, takes the train, holds it till she enters the Throne Room, where he drops it.

The party passes up the narrow pathway to the place where the Queen stands, makes a low bow, and then backs down the whole length of the room. The lady can not turn her back on the Queen, nor take up her train. It is etiquette for the Ministers and Ambassadors, who occupy the centre of the room, to lift the train and pass it from one to another while the lady backs down to the door. The moment she gets outside of the Throne Room she must take care of herself and reach her carriage as best she can. She can not remain. A strong iron bar prevents her from repeating the luxury of presentation. She draws her finery through the crowd and disappears, and finds her coach where she can, which may be half a mile off, for the coaches of the nobility take precedence. The Presentation lasts about one minute. It costs months of labor and anxiety, and great expense. The finery will be worn on no other occasion. But the party has been "presented at Court," and will tell it to her children's children. When the Queen holds Court it lasts just one hour exactly. During the whole time she stands like a statue, as cold, as insensible. She neither bows nor speaks. The mass file before her as if she were hewn out of stone.

MRS. TYPESET'S DIARY.

Saturday Eve.—I feel as though I had been living in the midst of the terrific scenes of the French Revolution. Historians have recorded the fearful facts; novelists have allowed fancy to make fact more graphic; painters have portrayed in vivid colors those scenes of horror; but nothing could bring the Reign of Terror with such thrilling distinctness before the mind as the representation of "Marie Antoinette" by Madame Ristori. In general matinees do not attract me, because of the crowd and rush which "no reserved seats" bring. Escaped the crowd to-day by going at instead of before the time appointed, and had the good luck to obtain an excellent seat, where I could see and hear every thing. It is a special charm in listening to Madame Ristori that no effort to hear is needful—her voice is clear and sonorous. As to her impersonation of the most unfortunate Queen of France, words can give no adequate idea of the power and truthfulness with which the character is represented. For three hours and a half I sat enthralled, as a living, moving, acting picture of the Revolution of 1789, with the attendant and subsequent scenes of distress and anguish, passed before me. It is in Marie Antoinette as a mother that I like Madame Ristori best. She is grand when, seizing the little Dauphin in her arms, and presenting him with herself on the terrace, she turns the curses of the infuriated mob into cheers—grand when the rude, blood-thirsty populace invade the Palace, threatening her and offering violence to her children, and she subdues them even to tears; but when, after the execution of Louis XVI., the wretch Simon enters the apartment of Marie Antoinette with jeers and taunts to tear from her arms her child, the Dauphin, she rises, sublime in her passionate, maternal love, and with scathing words, and looks and gestures of unutterable significance, awes even that inhuman monster into temporary silence.

Adelaide Ristori was born in 1826 at Cividale, Venice, and in 1847 married the Marchese del Grillo. She has four children, and appears in New York society as the Marchesa Del Grillo, accompanied by her husband, and often with two of her children—a daughter, who is very beautiful, and a son. Those who know Ristori in her private life speak of her as being an exemplary wife and a most devoted mother. Her personal appearance is commanding; complexion fair and pale, eyes light-colored, but eyebrows and hair darker than one would expect to see with a fair skin and very light eyes.

Monday.—To-day I chanced to read a letter from a lady living in Savannah, Georgia. We at the North can scarcely realize how completely the war interfered with all literary enterprises at the South, nor how utterly was the circulation of books and periodicals broken up. This lady writes:

"Business is again flourishing in our city, and our people are again becoming able to indulge in the luxury of periodical literature. I was just thinking of renewing my subscription to the Magazine and Weekly when a friend sent me in the Bazar, No. 5—the first copy I have had the pleasure of seeing of this new candidate for public favor. I was so interested that I went entirely through it before I rose from my table, and have seldom had a richer feast. I can not help wondering how we have so long done without just such a paper, and why nobody has ever given us one before. It is just what we ladies need in the way of modes and paterus—a weekly visitant telling us what to wear, and how to fashion the most convenient and becoming garments. Telling us, too, where to procure the various materials, and at what cost; thus enabling ladies in the country to order to the best advantage, and to dress as well and fashionably as their city friends. I sincerely hope that many copies of the Bazar will find their way to the firesides of every town and village in our country; for I hold it a duty that every lady owes to herself and her friends to look just as pretty as she can, and to dress as tastefully and becomingly as circumstances permit, and both these ends will be promoted by the regular perusal of the Bazar.

"But it is not alone as a fashion-paper that the Bazar merits the patronage of the ladies. Its literary contents will meet the approval of all. Altogether I regard this number of the Bazar 'a perfect success,' and all that the most fastidious taste can desire in the way of a Ladies' Gazette of Literature and Fashion."

Tuesday.—The papers record many singular matrimonial affairs nowadays. Saw an account not long since of a woman—in Chicago, I think—who sold her husband for $120. To-day read a stranger story in a Milwaukee paper of a man who sold his wife for $300. The wife, after having been married some ten years, was upset in mind by meeting a former lover, to whom, long before, she had been attached. He proposed that she should desert her lawful husband and go with him. This she refused to do, but went to her husband and told him the condition of affairs, and asked on what terms he would part with her. The husband named $500 as the price for which he would surrender her. The lover was called in and a consultation held. Both he and the wife thought the price too high. At last a compromise was made, and $300 paid for the woman. A "bill of sale" was made out and duly signed by all parties, by which the husband agreed to take good care of his children, and the lover agreed to be a kind husband to the woman on penalty that the contract will be annulled.

How many so-called "Enoch Arden cases" have been noised abroad since Tennyson first wrote:

"But when he rose and paced
Back toward his solitary home again;
All down the long and narrow street he went Beating it in upon his weary brain,
As though it were the burden of a song,
'Not to tell her, never to let her know!'"

The sequel of these cases do not, in general, bear much likeness to that of the original Enoch Arden, though some of them are quite romantic. One has recently occurred in the northern part of this State. A young married man, at the commencement of the war, entered the army, having exacted a promise from a friend, that if he were killed that friend would marry his wife and take good care of her. Time passed and word came that the soldier was slain in battle. At all events, he did not return, even at the end of the war; and in due season the supposed widow became the wife of her husband's friend. But a short time since the long-absent soldier reappeared and claimed his wife. The second husband declined to give her up; and finally the question was submitted to a legal tribunal, and on the last day of 1867 the court decided that the first marriage was binding, and the wife must pass to the former husband.

Wednesday Eve.—The fashion of making costly wedding presents to the bride has become almost universal. Then comes the wooden wedding, and the tin wedding, and the crystal, and the silver, and the golden, with ever so many others slipped in every year or two—and finally, if any body lives long enough, a diamond wedding. And, from the first genuine wedding to the last, the invited guests are expected to come armed with gifts. The custom is becoming burdensome—every body can not afford to offer costly gifts—and consequently "regrets" for non-attendance are increasing. Saw it suggested in some paper the other day that this state of things might be remedied by putting at the bottom of invitations: "No presents will be received except from relatives." To a woman of genuine delicacy, any arrangement which would, as it were, compel her friends and acquaintances to give her presents, must be annoying and offensive. A gift, to really be such, must be offered freely, as a token of good-will or affection.

Cleveland is ahead of New York in one thing, certainly. The street-cars there are warmed by convenient little stoves.

Every week brings accounts of the increasing grandeur of the eruption of Mount Vesuvius. Streams of lava, all aglow and fiery, issue from the summit, lighting up the whole of the mountain. The air in the immediate vicinity is hot and sulphurous, and condensed vapor, thickly charged with ashes and cinders, falls like a shower around. One writer states that "within the central depression of the main cone the present eruption has built up a sort of conical chimney, through which at intervals of from nine to ten seconds, with a roar like that of a rushing storm, there is belched forth a prodigious column of what from appearance would be described as mixed flame and smoke. Far above this a myriad of red-hot stones shoot simultaneously upward in slightly diverging lines, and, as they reach their maximum height, remain poised a moment, then turn gracefully outward as they fall, forming a pyrotechnic fountain in comparison with which the finest imitations of art are contemptible." It would be a sight well worth a visit to Naples—this volcano, grand and terrific in its convulsions.

The new volcano, about twenty-four miles east of Leon, in Nicaragua, has lately been in violently grand eruption, throwing out fire and cinders from two craters, and sending out heavy showers of fine black sand which had reached Leon, covering the streets of that place to the depth of half an inch.

"WANTED" (so advertises some distressed individual)—"A strong adhesive plaster, to make busy-bodies stick to their own business."

A novelty is announced. By certain chemical processes paper can be rendered as hard as hickory wood, and may be manufactured into a variety of articles hitherto made of wood, tin, copper, and iron. The substance produced is a non-conductor of heat, impervious to the action of acids, and not liable to be injured by heat or cold. It is said that the White House and the Departments in Washington have been already supplied with sets of paper water-pails, ice-coolers, and spittoons!

Quite an original plan is that of the Postmaster in Montreal, who has had the heads of his clerks examined phrenologically, and dismissed those whose bumps were not properly developed.

SNOW-BIRDS.

SOFT from the sunless sky
Falls the pure snow,
Clothing in spotless white
All things below;

Cold blows the bitter blast;
On the poor birds' repast,
While fall the light flakes fast,
One thought bestow!

Come in, little birds,
From the cold and the snow,
And feel the sweet warmth
Of our fireside glow.

Come join us at breakfast,
Confiding and free;
Then sing as you sang
On the snow-laden tree.

"Be happy and cheerful,"
Your notes seem to say,

Will soon melt away.

Whatever betide,
And fear not the morrow,
For 'God will provide.'"

AN OLD STORY TOLD AGAIN.

DEAR me! what a fluttering and chirping and pecking out in the court-yard! The little Prince really could not eat his breakfast till he went to see what was the matter. So he opened one of the palace windows, and put his head out, and there, flying in the air, hopping on the ground, and clinging to the window-sill, was a whole host of little blackbirds, singing for something to eat. But the only note they could sing was

"Rye! rye! rye!"

"Won't your little majesty shut the window and come straight back to your breakfast?" said the maid, crossly.

"No, indeed," said his little majesty, "not till I feed these hungry blackbirds!"

So he took some of his own warm biscuit and crumbled it down under the window; but the birds never touched it. They only flew the more about his head and shoulders, and sang

"Rye! rye! rye!"

"They want some rye," said the little Prince. "Barby, will you give me some rye for my blackbirds?"

"That I won't," exclaimed Barby; "and your majesty had better come and eat your breakfast before I inform his Majesty the King!"

But the little Prince only laughed, and spying a pan of meal on the kitchen shelf, he ran with it to the window.

"Here, pretty blackbirds," he cried, joyously, "here's some nice yellow meal for you!"

But they would not touch a grain of it; they only flew all the more around his head and shoulders and sang, pitifully,

"Rye! rye! rye!"

"They must have some rye!" said the Prince.

"Barby, is there any rye in the palace?"

"Not a grain!" quoth Barby, though she well knew there was a chest full in the granary.

"Very well, then I shall go and buy some," said the Prince, stamping his foot in impatience, and away he ran through the marble hall and down the great marble steps till he caught up with the King, who was taking a morning walk.

"If you please, papa, I want a sixpence!" said the little Prince, eagerly.

"Upon my soul!" replied the King, "how you startled me. A sixpence, hey? and why do you want a sixpence?" And he slowly drew a silver sixpence from his purse, and held it up in the air.

"Oh, be quick, papa! I'm going to the miller's to buy food for my blackbirds!"

The sixpence dropped to the ground, and the fat old King leaned against a tree and laughed to think what a smart young rogue his son was to invent such a story for a sixpence to buy sugar-plums with.

But the little Prince snatched the silver piece from the ground and hardly stopped to say "Thank you," he was in such a hurry to get to the miller's to buy some rye.

"A sixpence will buy about a pocketful, I hope," he said to himself, as he ran along the lane. Away in the distance he could already hear the mill-wheel turning and the merry dash of the sparkling water. The grass was green under his feet, and the trees waved their leafy boughs above him. The sun shone bright and warm upon him and his heart danced, he felt so happy. Poor little Prince! he did not know, as he kept his hand so carefully doubled up, that his sixpence had already slipped out between his fingers, and was now lying hid down in the deep grass by the road-side. No, he did not know that; and so as he came up to the old brown mill, and went in at the little creaking gate, he said quite boldly to the miller:

"I want a pocketful of rye, and I'll give you sixpence for it!"

"Where's the sixpence?" asked the old miller, cautiously.

The Prince opened his hand, and there was no sixpence there! How the red color rushed into his cheeks as he tried to explain, but the miller would not believe a word.

"Go find your sixpence, and bring it here," he said, "or you shall have no rye. Or, stop! here's my wife's flower-bed full of weeds. Pull all the weeds up without hurting the flowers, and then I will give you the rye for your wages."

But the little Prince looked down at his lily-white hands, which had never done any dirty work, and then he turned sorrowfully away to look along the road in search of his sixpence. Right and left he looked, behind the trees and under the little stones, but there was no silver sixpence to be seen.

"Meanwhile the blackbirds are growing hungry," he thought to himself with a sigh, "and I—I am hungry too!"

Then he looked at his hands again, and felt ashamed of his pride. It seemed to him as if he was very selfish in shunning a bit of work that would get him all he wanted. So away to the miller he went again, and told him he was ready to weed his wife's garden.

"Very well," said the miller, shortly; "then go to work. But if you break a single flower I shall cut your ears off. Here, Lottchen, show this boy the flower-bed!"

As the miller said "Lottchen" there came to the door a little blue-eyed girl, with soft, golden curls. She put a dimpled finger in her rosy mouth, because she felt shy, and so led the way between great clumps of rosemary to the weed-grown bed. Then, as the little Prince stooped to pull up a great root of witch-grass, she began to swing on a low-hanging vine-branch, watching him with her wondering blue eyes. He pulled up all the grass, and then began to be puzzled, for he could not tell the rest of the weeds from flowers, and he was just about uprooting some leafy stems that seemed to be in the way, when the little girl called out, quickly:

me. Come here, my dear Queen, and help me count."

But the Queen did not hear him; she had left the parlor as he entered, and walked statelyly up and down the marble halls, letting her beautiful purple satin robes trail two yards behind her on the mosaic floor, for that was the fashion at court. Suddenly, as she turned, there approached her from the outer door a messenger, foot-sore and covered with dust. He knelt before her, holding in his hands a blue jar carefully closed.

"Your Majesty," he said, "my master is a king, and he sends you this jar of honey made by the bees of Hymettus. He sends, imploring your grace to make diligent inquiry through your kingdom for his lost child, who was stolen eight years ago. He has made search through every kingdom, in vain, but yours, and now he sends over weary deserts and lofty mountains as a last hope to you. Will your Majesty command a search to be made for our lost princess? If she be found, he bids me say a hundred jars of honey shall be sent to your Majesty forthwith."

The Queen took the jar and smelt of it; it was more fragrant than the attar of roses. Besides, the Queen was very fond of sweetmeats.

"This is indeed delicious!" she exclaimed; "I will help your King with all my heart. Now tell me the whole story about the little Princess, and be quick, for I want to taste the honey."

So the messenger began with what speed he might; but while he is talking we must hasten beforehand into the kitchen in order to account for the very appetizing odor that greeted the Queen's royal nose the moment she opened the messenger, and came down into the kitchen bearing the precious jar of honey in her own two royal hands, she exclaimed at once:

"Dear me! That smells good. What are you cooking there, Barby?"

"Bird-pie, your Majesty," replied the maid, with a courtesy.

"Very well, we will have it for dinner," said the Queen; and then, calling for a golden spoon and saucer, she sat down in her own kitchen to try her honey. She ate it upon bread—perhaps other people beside eat it in that manner; but whatever a queen does is worth mentioning.

"Ah, how delicious this is!" said the Queen, after the sixth saucerful. Meanwhile Barby took the pie from the oven smoking hot, and so savory an odor issued from it that the Queen ordered it to be served at once. So carrying a saucer of honey she went in her purple trailing robe to join the King in the parlor, where he still sat at the ivory table counting out his money. The maid followed with the pie on a waiter and knives and forks.

"There, Barby," said the Queen, as she set it down, "that will do, my good girl; and now you had better go right out in the garden and hang out the linen while the sun is hot!"

"It shall be done, your Majesty," said the maid, with two courtesies, one for the King and one for the Queen. Then she went out of the room backward.

But now behold what happened! The King began to carve the pie, and the moment he opened the crust, forth came the sweetest singing a man ever heard, better than all the pianos and music-boxes in the kingdom. And one by one out through the opening flew the blackbirds, singing as they flew, just as alive as ever: for they were enchanted birds, you know, and nothing could hurt them, not even baking in an oven. The King dropped his knife and fork on the Queen's satin dress, but he did not know it; he sat back in his chair perfectly helpless, with his eyes and mouth as wide open as they could be. As for the Queen, she clapped her hands and laughed with delight.

"It is prettier than all the showmen's boxes!" she exclaimed.

Some of the birds perched on the King's crown and some on the golden saucer; and all the while they sang till the palace fairly rang with melody. But one of the blackbirds happened to look out in the garden and immediately bethought himself of something. There was the maid hanging out the clothes without the least notion of what was going to happen, and away through the window flew this remorseless blackbird—flew right into the maid's face and eyes, and before she could wink he bit off her nose and flew away with it! You can imagine how that must have felt! It certainly is not safe to make pies of blackbirds!

But just at this very moment who should come running up the garden path but the little Prince and blue-eyed Lottchen after him. He had invited her to come and see the blackbirds eat, and he had his pockets so full of rye that some of it spilled over every step he took. Up the great marble steps the children ran, and into the parlor. There sat the King with his mouth open, and the Queen clapping her hands; and there were the four-and-twenty blackbirds singing with all their might—all but one, and that one could not sing because he held the maid's nose in his bill! Bah! I wouldn't like to have been that blackbird!

"Oh, you dear birds!" cried the little Prince, "here's your rye!"

And he sprinkled it all around, on the table and on the floor, and down flew all the four-and-twenty blackbirds, and began to peck at it. No sooner had each one got a mouthful than every bird of them vanished, and in their place stood four-and-twenty beautiful fairies! For you must know that a malicious witch had laid an evil spell upon them, and as blackbirds they were condemned to fly about the world till some one should willingly give them a pocketful of rye to feed upon. And that was why they chirped so plaintively,

"Rye! rye! rye!"

But now they were fairies again, with all their fairy power, and you may well believe they made the little Prince the most wonderful promises of good-luck all his life to come. And as for blue-eyed Lottchen, who was standing bashfully behind the Queen's chair, as soon as the fairies saw her they said to one another,

"Only see—here is the lost Princess!"

They were her guardian fairies, and if they had not first been turned into blackbirds she could never have been stolen. But the old miller did not know she was a Princess, no indeed! He found her on his door-step one morning, and thought she was a poor little foundling. So, because he took kind care of her, the fairies will never let his stream run dry, and his mill will bring him more and more gold every year.

Then the fairies forthwith summoned a magnificent chariot to take them home to their own country, and the little blue-eyed Lottchen with them. So the travel-worn messenger jumped up behind for a footman. But Lottchen looked longingly back, and from her blue eyes rolled two pearly tears. That the little Prince could not bear, and he ran and kissed her.

"Oh, do not go, Lottchen!" he cried; "stay here always, for I love you so much!"

"And I love you," said Lottchen, innocently. The fairies smiled, and the good-natured old King laughed outright.

"Well, well, children!" he said, kindly, "if you both say the same a few years hence we'll see about it, and maybe pretty Lottchen will come back to stay here always."

"Ah yes!" said the Queen, complacently, "it would be pleasant to form an alliance with a kingdom where honey is made by the bees of Hymettus!"

SNOW-BIRDS.—"COME IN, LITTLE BIRDS."

"Oh, take care! those are our tulips!"

He fixed his bright, dark eyes upon her, and then looking down at his soiled hands and rumpled clothes, he said, with a laugh:

"I don't know much: will you help me?"

"Yes," said the miller's daughter, "if you will tell me about the birds."

So then the two children worked together, and whenever the little Prince would have pulled up a flower Lottchen slapped his fingers; and they grew very friendly. In fact, the young Prince began to wish that his task would last longer, that he need not so soon part with the lovely little blue-eyed Lottchen. But then he remembered the hungry blackbirds, and that made him diligent. So before the forenoon was fairly spent the dusty old miller looked out and said to himself:

"I may as well be measuring out that pocketful of rye!"

But meanwhile what had been going on all these long hours in the palace? Things had not stood still, I assure you, waiting for the Prince's return. The old King, when he had got through laughing, began to bethink himself that he had sixpence less in his purse than before, and he walked back to the palace as quick as he could, panting a good deal because he was so fat. He went into his magnificent parlor, and seating himself before an ivory table, emptied all the money in his purse out upon it. Oh, how the gold and silver pieces shone in the sunshine! They made the old King's heart glad, for he loved money.

"Now, I'll count it all over," he said, softly, "and see how much that young rogue has left door to call for a golden spoon with which to taste the honey.

No sooner had the little Prince got fairly out of sight than Barby went to shut the window, when, as if to vex her still more, all the blackbirds began to fly around her head and shoulders, chirping with all their might,

"Rye! rye! rye!"

Barby shut the window down angrily, but instead of shutting the birds out she found she had shut them all in, and they perched on her arms beseechingly with the one note,

"Rye! rye! rye!"

Now what did this cruel maid do? Instead of feeding the pretty, fluttering creatures from the great chest of rye, the key of which hung on her apron-string, she tossed her head scornfully and turned up her nose—a very pretty nose, by-the-way, and the only feature of which Barby could be vain.

"I'll teach you to be quiet!" she said, sharply; and one by one she caught the blackbirds, wringing their necks with a cruel twist, and throwing them down on the table. There they lay, poor limp, lifeless things; she had indeed taught them to be quiet.

"One, two, three," said Barby, counting them; "twenty-four as sure as there's a nose on my face! Now I'll make a pie, and let the saucy little Prince dine on blackbirds!"

So to work she went, and so quick was she that before long the four-and-twenty blackbirds were put between two flaky crusts, in a great pan, and set into the oven. Then the maid heaped the pine-knots on the fire to make it burn hot. So when the Queen had dismissed the tired

CORD AND CREESE; OR, THE BRANDON MYSTERY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE DODGE CLUB."

CHAPTER XXIII.

THE OCEAN DEPTHS.

THE next morning dawned and Brandon hurried to the rock and looked around. During the night a slight wind had sprung up, and was still gently breathing. Far over the wide sea there was not a sail to be seen. The brig had passed away. They were finally left to themselves.

Now at last the time of trial had come. They were eager to make the attempt, and soon the yacht was unmoored, and moved slowly out to sea in the direction of Needle Island. A light breeze still blew fitfully, but promised at any moment to stop; yet while it lasted they passed onward under its gentle impulse, and so gradually reached Needle Island, and went on into the sea beyond.

Before they had come to the spot which they wished to attain the breeze had died out, and they were compelled to take to the oars. Although early in the morning the sun was burning hot, the work was laborious, and the progress was slow. Yet not a murmur was heard, nor did a single thought of fatigue enter the minds of any of them. One idea only was present—one so overwhelming that all lesser thoughts and all ordinary feelings were completely obliterated. After two hours of steady labor they at last reached a place which seemed to them to be exactly one league due north of Needle Islet. Looking back they saw that the rocks on the island seemed from this distance closer together, and thinner and sharper, so that they actually bore a greater resemblance to needles from this point than to any thing else.

Here they sounded. The water was fifteen fathoms deep—not so great a depth as they had feared. Then they put down the anchor, for although there was no wind, yet the yacht might be caught in some current, and drift gradually away from the right position.

The small boat had all this time been floating astern with the pumping apparatus in it, so that the adventurous diver might readily be accompanied in his search and his wanderings at the bottom of the sea.

But there was the prospect that this search would be long and arduous, and Brandon was not willing to exhaust himself too soon. He had already resolved that the first exploration should be made by Asgeelo. The Hindu had followed Brandon in all his wanderings with that silent submission and perfect devotion which is more common among Hindus than any other people. He had the air of one who was satisfied with obeying his master, and did not ask the end of any commands which might be given. He was aware that they were about to explore the ocean depths, but showed no curiosity about the object of their search. It was Brandon's purpose to send him down first at different points, so that he might see if there was any thing there which looked like what they sought.

Asgeelo—or Cato, as Brandon commonly called him—had made those simple preparations which are common among his class—the apparatus which the pearl-divers have used ever since pearl-diving first commenced. Twelve or fifteen stones were in the boat, a flask of oil, and a sponge which was fastened around his neck. These were all that he required. Each stone weighed about thirty pounds. One of these he tied around one foot; he saturated the sponge with oil, so as to use it to inhale air beneath the water; and then, standing on the edge of the boat and flinging his arms straight up over his head, he leaped into the water and went down feet foremost.

Over the smooth water the ripples flowed from the spot where Asgeelo had disappeared, extending in successive concentric circles, and radiating in long undulations far and wide. Louis and Frank waited in deep suspense. Asgeelo remained long beneath the water, but to them the time seemed frightful in its duration. Profound anxiety began to mingle with the suspense, for fear lest the faithful servant in his devotion had overrated his powers—lest the disuse of his early practice had weakened his skill—lest the weight bound to his foot had dragged him down and kept him there forever.

At last, when the suspense had become intolerable and the two had already begun to exchange glances almost of despair, a splash was heard, and Asgeelo emerged far to the right. He struck out strongly toward the boat, which was at once rowed toward him. In a few minutes he was taken in. He did not appear to be much exhausted.

He had seen nothing.

They then rowed about a hundred yards further, and Asgeelo prepared to descend once more. He squeezed the oil out of the sponge and renewed it again. But this time he took a knife in his hand.

"What is that for?" asked Frank and Louis.

"Sharks!" answered Cato, in a terrible tone.

At this Louis and Frank exchanged glances. Could they let this devoted servant thus tempt so terrible a death?

"Did you see any sharks?" asked Louis.

"No, Sahib."

"Why do you fear them, then?"

"I don't fear them, Sahib."

"Why do you take this knife?"

"One may come, Sahib."

After some hesitation Asgeelo was allowed to go. As before he plunged into the water, and remained underneath quite as long; but now they had become familiarized with his powers and the suspense was not so dreadful. At the expiration of the usual time he reappeared, and on being taken into the boat he again announced that he had seen nothing.

They now rowed a hundred yards farther on in the same direction, toward the east, and Asgeelo made another descent. He came back with the same result.

It began to grow discouraging, but Asgeelo was not yet fatigued, and they therefore determined to let him work as long as he was able. He went down seven times more. They still kept the boat on toward the east till the line of

"A DARK, SINEWY ARM EMERGED FROM BENEATH, ARMED WITH A LONG, KEEN KNIFE."

"needles" on the sand island had become thrown farther apart and stood at long distances. Asgeelo came up each time unsuccessful.

He at last went down for the eleventh time. They were talking as usual, not expecting that he would reappear for some minutes, when suddenly a shout was heard, and Asgeelo's head emerged from the water not more than twenty yards from the boat. He was swimming with one hand, and in the other he held an uplifted knife, which he occasionally brandished in the air and splashed in the water.

Immediately the cause of this became manifest. Just behind him a sharp black fin appeared cutting the surface of the water.

It was a shark! But the monster, a coward like all his tribe, deterred by the plashing of the water made by Asgeelo, circled round him and hesitated to seize his prey.

The moment was frightful. Yet Asgeelo appeared not in the least alarmed. He swam slowly, occasionally turning his head and watching the monster, seeming by his easy dexterity to be almost as much in his native element as his pursuer, keeping his eyes fixed on him and holding his knife in a firm clasp. The knife was a long, keen blade, which Asgeelo had carried with him for years.

Louis and Frank could do nothing. A pistol ball could not reach this monster, who kept himself under the water, where a ball would be spent before striking him, if indeed any aim could direct a bullet toward that swift darting figure. They had nothing to do but to look on in an agony of horror.

Asgeelo, compelled to watch, to guard, to splash the water, and to turn frequently, made but a slow passage over those twenty yards which separated him from the boat. At last it seemed as if he chose to stay there. It seemed to those who watched him with such awful horror that he might have escaped had he chosen, but that he had some idea of voluntarily encountering the monster. This became evident at last, as the shark passed before him when they saw Asgeelo's face turned toward it; a face full of fierce hate and vengeance; a face such as one turns toward some mortal enemy.

He made a quick, fierce stroke with his long knife. The shark gave a leap upward. The water was tinged with blood. The next moment Asgeelo went down.

"What now?" was the thought of the brothers. Had he been dragged down? Impossible! And yet it seemed equally impossible that he could have gone down of his own accord.

In a moment their suspense was ended. A white flash appeared near the surface. The next instant a dark, sinewy arm emerged from beneath, armed with a long, keen knife, which seemed to tear down with one tremendous stroke that white, shining surface.

It was Asgeelo's head that emerged in a sea of blood and foam. Triumph was in his dark face, as with one hand he waved his knife exultantly.

A few moments afterward the form of a gigantic shark floated upward to the surface, dying the sea with the blood which had issued from the stroke dealt by Asgeelo. Not yet, however, was the vindictive fury of the Hindu satiated. He swam up to it. He dashed his knife over and over the white belly till it became a hideous mass of gaping entrails. Then he came into the boat.

He sat down, a hideous figure. Blood covered his tawny face, and the fury of his rage had not left the features.

The strength which this man had shown was tremendous, yet his quickness and agility even in the water had been commensurate with his strength. Brandon had once seen proofs of his courage in the dead bodies of the Malay pirates which lay around him in the cabin of that ill-fated Chinese ship; but all that he had done then was not to be compared to this.

They could not help asking him why he had not at once made his escape to the boat, instead of staying to fight the monster.

Asgeelo's look was as gloomy as death as he replied,

"They tore in pieces my son, Sahib—my only son—when he first went down, and I have to avenge him. I killed a hundred on the Malabar coast before I left it forever. That shark did not attack me; I attacked him."

"If you saw one now would you attack him?"

"Yes, Sahib."

Brandon expressed some apprehension, and wished him not to risk his life.

But Asgeelo explained that a shark could be successfully encountered by a skillful swimmer. The shark is long, and has to move about in a circle which is comparatively large; he is also a coward, and a good swimmer can strike him if he only chooses. He again repeated triumphantly that he had killed more than a hundred to avenge his son.

In his last venture Asgeelo had been no more successful than before. Needle Island was now to the southwest, and Brandon thought that their only chance was to try farther over toward the west, where they had not yet explored.

They rowed at once back to the point from which they had set out, and then went on about a hundred and fifty yards to the west. From this place, as they looked toward the islet, the three rocks seemed so close together that they appeared blended, and the three sharp, needle-like points appeared to issue from one common base. This circumstance had an encouraging effect, for it seemed to the brothers as though their ancestor might have looked upon those rocks from this point of view rather than from any other which had as yet come upon the field of their observation.

This time Brandon himself resolved to go down; partly because he thought that Asgeelo had worked long enough and ought not to be exhausted on that first day, and partly on account of an intolerable impatience, and an eagerness to see for himself rather than intrust it to others.

There was the horror of the shark, which might have deterred any other man. It was a danger which he had never taken into account. But the resolve of his soul was stronger than any fear, and he determined to face even this danger. If he lost his life, he was indifferent. Let it go! Life was not so precious to him as to some others. Fearless by nature, he was ordinarily ready to run risks; but now the thing that drew him onward was so vast in its importance that he was willing to encounter peril of any kind.

Frank was aware of the full extent of this new danger, but he said nothing, nor did he attempt in any way to dissuade his brother. He himself, had he been able, would have gone down in his place; but as he was not able, he did not suppose that his brother would hesitate.

The apparatus was in the boat. The pumping-machine was in the stern; and this, with the various signal-ropes, was managed by Frank. Asgeelo rowed. These arrangements had long since been made, and they had practiced in this way on the Hudson River.

Silently Brandon put on his diving armor. The ropes and tubes were all carefully arranged. The usual weight was attached to his belt, and he was slowly lowered down to the bottom of the sea.

The bottom of the ocean was composed of a smooth, even surface of fine sand and gravel, along which Brandon moved without difficulty. The cumbrous armor of the diver, which on land is so heavy, beneath the water loses its excessive weight, and by steadying the wearer assists him to walk. The water was marvelously transparent, as is usually the case in the southern seas, and through the glass plate in his helmet Brandon could look forward to a greater distance than was possible in the Hudson.

Overhead he could see the bottom of the boat, as it floated and moved on in the direction which he wished; signals, which were communicated by a rope which he held in his hand, told them whether to go forward or backward, to the right or to the left, or to stop altogether. Practice had enabled him to command, and them to obey, with ease.

Down in the depths to which he had descended the water was always still, and the storms that affected the surface never penetrated there. Brandon learned this from the delicate shells and the still more delicate forms of marine plants which lay at his feet, so fragile in their structure, and so delicately poised in their position, that they must have formed themselves in deep, dead stillness and absolute motionlessness of waters. The very movement which was caused by his passage displaced them in all directions, and cast them down every where in ruins. Here, in such depths as these, if the sounding lead is cast it brings up these fragile shells, and shows to the observer what profound calm must exist here, far away beneath the ordinary vision of man.

Practice had enabled Brandon to move with much ease. His breathing was without difficulty. The first troubles arising from breathing this confined air had long since been surmounted. One tube ran down from the boat, through which the fresh air was pushed, and another tube ran up a little distance, through which the air passed and left it in myriad bubbles that ascended to the surface.

He walked on, and soon came to a place where things changed their appearance. Hard sand was here, and on every side there arose curiously-shaped coral structures, which resembled more than any thing else a leafless forest. These coral tree-like forms twisted their branches in strange involutions, and in some places formed a perfect barrier of interlaced arms, so that he was forced to make a detour in order to avoid them. The chief fear here was that his tube might get entangled among some of the loftier straggling branches, and impede or retard his progress. To avoid this caused much delay.

Now, among the coral rocks, the vegetation of the lower sea began to appear of more vivid colors and of far greater variety than any which he had ever seen. Here were long plants which clung to the coral like ivy, seeming to be a species of marine parasite, and as it grew it threw more luxuriantly. Here were some which threw out long arms, terminating in vast, broad, palm-like leaves, the arms intertwined among the coral branches and the leaves hanging downward. Here were long streamers of fine, silk-like strings, that were suspended from many a projecting branch, and hillocks of spongy substance that looked like moss. Here, too, were plants which threw forth long, ribbon-like leaves of variegated color.

It was a forest under the sea, and it grew denser at every step.

At last his progress in this direction was terminated by a rock which came from a southerly direction, like a spur from the islands. It arose to a height of about thirty feet overhead, and descended gradually as it ran north. Brandon turned aside, and walked by its base along its entire extent.

At its termination there arose a long vista, where the ground ascended and an opening appeared through this marine "forest." On each side the involuted corals flung their twisted arms in more curious and intricate folds. The vegetation was denser, more luxuriant, and more varied. Beneath him was a growth of tender substance, hairy in texture, and of a delicate green color, which looked more like lawn grass of the upper world than any thing else in nature.

Brandon walked on, and even in the intense desire of his soul to find what he sought he felt himself overcome by the sublime influence of this submarine world. He seemed to have intruded into some other sphere, planting his rash footsteps where no foot of man had trodden before, and using the resources of science to violate the hallowed secrecy of awful nature in her most hidden retreats. Here, above all things, his soul was oppressed by the universal silence around. Through that thick helmet, indeed, no sound under a clap of thunder could be heard, and the ringing of his ears would of itself have prevented consciousness of any other noise, yet none the less was he aware of the awful stillness; it was silence that could be felt. In the sublimity of that lonely pathway he felt what Hercules is imagined to have felt when passing to the underworld after Cerberus,

Stupent ubi undæ segne torpescit fretum, and half expected to hear some voice from the dweller in this place:

"Quo pergis audax? Siste proserentem gradum."

There came to him only such dwellers as belonged to the place. He saw them as he moved along. He saw them darting out from the hidden penetralia around, moving swiftly across and sometimes darting in shoals before him. They began to appear in such vast numbers that Brandon thought of that monster which lay a mangled heap upon the surface above, and fancied that perhaps his kindred were here waiting to avenge his death. As this fear came full and well defined before him he drew from his belt the knife which Asgeelo had given him, and Frank had urged him to take, feeling himself less helpless if he held this in his hand.

The fishes moved about him, coming on in new and more startled crowds, some dashing past, others darting upward, and others moving swiftly ahead. One large one was there with a train of followers, which moved up and floated for a moment directly in front of him, its large, staring eyes seeming to view him in wonder, and solemnly working its gills. But as Brandon came close it gave a sudden turn and darted off with all its attendants.

At last, amidst all these wonders, he saw far ahead something which drove all other thoughts away, whether of fear, or of danger, or of horror, and filled all his soul with an overmastering passion of desire and hope.

It was a dark object, too remote as yet to be distinctly visible, yet as it rose there his fancy seemed to trace the outline of a ship, or what might once have been a ship. The presentation of his hope before him thus in what seemed like a reality was too much. He stood still, and his heart beat with fierce throbs.

The hope was so precious that for a time he hesitated to advance, for fear lest the hope might be dispelled forever. And then to fail at this place, after so long a search, when he seemed to have reached the end, would be an intolerable grief.

There, too, was that strange pathway which seemed made on purpose. How came it there? He thought that perhaps the object lying before him might have caused some current which set in there and prevented the growth of plants in that place. These and many other thoughts came to him as he stood, unwilling to move.

But at last he conquered his feelings, and advanced. Hope grew strong within him. He thought of the time on Coffin Island when, in like manner, he had hesitated before a like object. Might not this, like that, turn out to be a ship? And now, by a strange revulsion, all his feelings urged him on; hope was strong, suspense unendurable. Whatever that object was, he must know.

It might indeed be a rock. He had passed one shortly before, which had gradually declined into the bottom of the sea; this might be a continuation of the same, which after an interval had arisen again from the bottom. It was long and high at one end, and rounded forward at the other. Such a shape was perfectly natural for a rock. He tried to crush down hope, so as to be prepared for disappointment. He tried to convince himself that it must be a rock, and could by no possibility be any thing else. Yet his efforts were totally fruitless. Still the conviction remained that it was a ship, and if so, it could be no other than the one he sought.

As he went on all the marine vegetation ceased. The coral rocks continued no further. Now all around the bottom of the sea was flat, and covered with fine gravel, like that which he had touched when he first came down. The fishes had departed. The sense of solemnity left him; only one thing was perceptible, and that was the object toward which he walked.

And now he felt within him such an uncontrollable impulse that even if he had wished he could neither have paused nor gone back. To go forward was only possible. It seemed to him as though some external influence had penetrated his body, and forced him to move. Again, as once before, he recalled the last words of his father, so well remembered:

"If in that other world to which I am going the disembodied spirit can assist man, then be sure, oh my son, I will assist you, and in the crisis of your fate I will be near, if it is only to communicate to your spirit what you ought to do—"

It was Ralph Brandon who had said this. Here in this object which lay before him, if it were indeed the ship, he imagined the spirit of another Ralph Brandon present, awaiting him.

Suddenly a dark shadow passed over his head, which forced him involuntarily to look up. In spite of his excitement a shudder passed through him. Far overhead, at the surface of the sea, the boat was floating. But half-way up were three dark objects moving slowly and lazily along. They were sharks.

To him, in his loneliness and weakness, nothing ever seemed so menacing as these three demons of the deep as he stared up at them. Had they seen him? That was now his thought. He clutched his knife in a firmer hold, feeling all the while how utterly helpless he was, and shrinking away into himself from the terror above. The monsters moved leisurely about, at one time grazing the tube, and sending down a vibration which thrilled like an electric shock through him. For a moment he thought that they were malignantly tormenting him, and had done this on purpose in order to send down to him a message of his fate.

He waited.

The time seemed endless. Yet at last the end came. The sharks could not have seen him, for they gradually moved away until they were out of sight.

Brandon did not dare to advance for some time. Yet now, since the spell of this presence was removed, his horror left him, and his former hope animated all his soul.

There lay that object before him. Could he advance again after that warning. Dared he? This new realm into which he had ventured had indeed those who were ready and able to inflict a sudden and frightful vengeance upon the rash intruder. He had passed safely among the horrors of the coral forest; but here, on this plateau, could he hope to be so safe? Might not the slightest movement on his part create a disturbance of water sufficient to awaken the attention of those departed enemies and bring them back?

This was his fear. But hope, and a resolute will, and a determination to risk all on this last hazard, alike impelled him on. Danger now lay every where, above as well as below. An advance was not more perilous than an ascent to the boat. Taking comfort from this last thought he moved onward with a steady, determined step.

Hope grew stronger as he drew nearer. The dark mass gradually formed itself into a more distinct outline. The uncertain lines defined into more certain shape, and the resemblance to a ship became greater and greater. He could no longer resist the conviction that this must be a ship.

Still he tried feebly to prepare for disappointment, and made faint fancies as to the reason why a rock should be formed here in this shape. All the time he scouted those fancies and felt assured that it was not a rock.

Nearer and nearer. Doubt no longer remained. He stood close beside it. It was indeed a ship! Its sides rose high over head. Its lofty stern stood up like a tower, after the fashion of a ship of the days of Queen Elizabeth. The masts had fallen and lay, encumbered with the rigging, over the side.

Brandon walked all around it, his heart beating fast, seeing at every step some new proof that this must be no other, by any conceivable possibility, than the one which he sought. On reaching the bows he saw the outline of a bird carved for the figure-head, and knew that this must be the Phoenix.

He walked around. The bottom was sandy and the ship had settled down to some depth. Her sides were covered with fine dark shells, like an incrustation, to a depth of an inch, mingled with a short growth of a green, slimy sea-weed.

At last he could delay no longer. One of the masts lay over the side, and this afforded an easy way by which he could clamber upward upon the deck.

In a few moments Brandon stood upon the deck of the Phoenix.

The ship which had thus lain here through centuries, saturated with water that had penetrated to its inmost fibre, still held together sturdily. Beneath the sea the water itself had acted as a preservative, and retarded or prevented decay. Brandon looked around as he stood there, and the light that came from above, where the surface of the sea was now much nearer than before, showed him all the extent of the ship.

The beams which supported the deck had lost their stiffness and sunk downward; the masts, as before stated, had toppled over for the same reason, yielding to their own weight, which, as the vessel was slightly on one side, had gradually borne them down; the bowsprit also had fallen. The hatchways had yielded, and, giving way, had sunk down within the hold. The doors which led into the cabin in the lofty poop were lying prostrate on the deck. The large sky-light which once had stood there had also followed the same fate.

Before going down Brandon had arranged a signal to send to Frank in case he found the ship. In his excitement he had not yet given it. Before venturing further he thought of this. But he decided not to make the signal. The idea came, and was rejected amidst a world of varying hopes and fears. He thought that if he was successful he himself would be the best messenger of success; and, if not, he would be the best messenger of evil.

He advanced toward the cabin. Turning away from the door he clambered upon the poop, and, looking down, tried to see what depth there might be beneath. He saw something which looked as though it had once been a table. Slowly and cautiously he let himself down through the opening, and his feet touched bottom. He moved downward, and let his feet slide till they touched the floor.

He was within the cabin.

The light here was almost equal to that without, for the sky-light was very wide. The floor was sunken in like the deck of the ship. He looked around to see where he might first search for the treasure. Suddenly his eye caught sight of something which drove away every other thought.

At one end was a seat, and there, propped up against the wall, was a skeleton in a sitting posture. Around it was a belt with a sword attached. The figure had partly twisted itself round, but its head and shoulders were so propped up against the wall that it could not fall.

Brandon advanced, filled with a thousand emotions. One hand was lying down in front. He lifted it. There was a gold ring on the bony finger. He took it off. In the dim light he saw, cut in bold relief on this seal-ring, the crest of his family—a Phoenix.

It was his ancestor himself who was before him. Here he had calmly taken his seat when the ship was settling slowly down into the embrace of the waters. Here he had taken his seat, calmly and sternly, awaiting his death—perhaps with a feeling of grim triumph that he could thus elude his foes. This was the man, and this the hand, which had written the message that had drawn the descendant here.

Such were the thoughts that passed through Brandon's mind. He put the ring on his own finger and turned away. His ancestor had summoned him hither, and here he was. Where was the treasure that was promised?

Brandon's impatience now rose to a fever. Only one thought filled his mind. All around the cabin were little rooms, into each of which he looked. The doors had all fallen away. Yet he saw nothing in any of them.

He stood for a moment in deep doubt. Where could he look? Could he venture down into the dark hold and explore? How could he hope to find any thing there, amidst the ruins of that interior where guns and chains lay, perhaps all mingled together where they had fallen? It would need a longer time to find it than he had at first supposed. Yet would he falter? No! Rather than give up he would pass years here, till he had dismembered the whole ship and strewn every particle of her piecemeal over the bottom of the sea. Yet he had hoped to solve the whole mystery at the first visit; and now, since he saw no sign of any thing like treasure, he was for a while at a loss what to do.

His ancestor had summoned him, and he had come. Where was the treasure? Where? Why could not that figure arise and show him?

Such were his thoughts. Yet these thoughts, the result of excitement that was now a frenzy, soon gave rise to others that were calmer.

He reflected that perhaps some other feeling than what he had at first imagined might have inspired that grim old Englishman when he took his seat there and chose to drown on that seat rather than move away. Some other feeling, and what feeling? Some feeling which must have been the strongest in his heart. What was that? The one which had inspired the message, the desire to secure still more that treasure for which he had toiled and fought. His last act was to send the message, why should he not have still borne that thought in his mind and carried it till he died?

The skeleton was at one end, supported by the wall. Two posts projected on each side. A heavy oaken chair stood there, which had once perhaps been fastened to the floor. Brandon thought that he would first examine that wall. Perhaps there might be some opening there.

He took the skeleton in his arms reverently, and proceeded to lift it from the chair. He could not. He looked more narrowly, and saw a chain which had been fastened around it and bound it to the chair.

What was the meaning of this? Had the crew mutinied, bound the captain, and run? Had the Spaniards seized the ship after all? Had they recovered the spoil, and punished in this way the plunderer of three galleons, by binding him here to the chair, scuttling the ship, and sending him down to the bottom of the sea?

The idea of the possibility of this made Brandon sick with anxiety. He pulled the chair away, put it on one side, and began to examine the wooden wall by running his hand along it. There was nothing whatever perceptible. The wall was on the side farthest from the stern, and almost amidships. He pounded it, and, by the feeling, knew that it was hollow behind. He walked to the door which was on one side, and passed in behind this very wall. There was nothing there. It had once perhaps been used as part of the cabin. He came back disconsolately, and stood on the very place where the chair had been.

"Let me be calm," he said to himself. "This enterprise is hopeless. Yes, the Spaniards captured the ship, recovered the treasure, and drowned my ancestor. Let me not be deceived. Let me cast away hope, and search here without any idle expectation."

Suddenly as he thought he felt the floor gradually giving way beneath him. He started, but before he could move or even think in what direction to go the floor sank in, and he at once sank with it downward.

Had it not been that the tube was of ample extent, and had been carefully managed so as to guard against any abrupt descent among rocks at the bottom of the sea, this sudden fall might have ended Brandon's career forever. As it was he only sank quickly, but without accident, until his breast was on a level with the cabin floor.

In a moment the truth flashed upon him. He had been standing on a trap-door which opened from the cabin floor into the hold of the ship. Over this trap-door old Ralph Brandon had seated and bound himself. Was it to guard the treasure? Was it that he might await his descendant, and thus silently indicate to him the place where he must look?

And now the fever of Brandon's conflicting hope and fear grew more intense than it had ever yet been through all this day of days. He stooped down to feel what it was that lay under his feet. His hands grasped something, the very touch of which sent a thrill sharp and sudden through every fibre of his being.

They were metallic bars!

He rose up again overcome. He hardly dared to take one up so as to see what it might be. For the actual sight would realize hope or destroy it forever.

Once more he stooped down. In a sort of fury he grasped a bar in each hand and raised it up to the light.

Down under the sea the action of water had not destroyed the color of those bars which he held up in the dim light that came through the waters. The dull yellow of those rough ingots seemed to gleam with dazzling brightness before his bewildered eyes, and filled his whole soul with a torrent of rapture and of triumph.

His emotions overcame him. The bars of gold fell down from his trembling hands. He sank back and leaned against the wall.

But what was it that lay under his feet? What were all these bars? Were they all gold? Was this indeed all here—the plunder of the Spanish treasure-ships—the wealth which might purchase a kingdom—the treasure equal to an empire's revenue—the gold and jewels in countless store?

A few moments of respite were needed in order to overcome the tremendous conflict of feeling which raged within his breast. Then once more he stooped down. His outstretched hand felt over all this space which thus was piled up with treasure.

It was about four feet square. The ingots lay in the centre. Around the sides were boxes. One of these he took out. It was made of thick oaken plank, and was about ten inches long and eight wide. The rusty nails gave but little resistance, and the iron bands which once bound them peeled off at a touch. He opened the box.

Inside was a casket.

He tore open the casket.

It was filled with jewels!

His work was ended. No more search, no more fear. He bound the casket tightly to the end of the signal-line, added to it a bar of gold, and clambered to the deck.

He cast off the weight that was at his waist, which he also fastened to the line, and let it go.

Freed from the weight he rose buoyantly to the top of the water.

The boat pulled rapidly toward him and took him in. As he removed his helmet he saw Frank's eyes fixed on his in mute inquiry. His face was ashen, his lips bloodless.

Louis smiled.

"Heavens!" cried Frank, "can it be?"

"Pull up the signal-line and see for yourself," was the answer.

And, as Frank pulled, Louis uttered a cry which made him look up.

Louis pointed to the sun. "Good God! what a time I must have been down!"

"Time!" said Frank. "Don't say time—it was eternity!"

FIFTH EDITION.

WILLIAM MASON AND E. S. HOADLY'S

METHOD FOR THE PIANO-FORTE.
240 Pages Large Quarto. Illustrated.
PRICE $4.00.

Eminently a practical work; the result of many years' successful experience in the actual business of teaching; adapted to the use of beginners as well as to those at advanced stages of progress.

It is carefully progressive; philosophical in arrangement; very clear, full, and perspicuous in its explanations and directions; and illustrated by cuts and diagrams.

It is new, to a considerable extent, both in method and in matter, embodying the best results of modern experience in teaching, and embracing exercises and expedients for facilitating rapid and thorough progress which have not before been included in any book.
It is the first book to present the technicals of modern piano-forte playing.

IT HAS A FULL ELUCIDATION OF THE ACCENTUAL TREATMENT OF EXERCISES,
as systematized by Mr. Mason, by which the attention of the pupil is almost compelled, and careless practice is rendered nearly impossible, while not only the hands, but also the mind, taste, and artistic perceptions, are cultivated and trained. The advantages of the proper use of accented exercises are highly appreciated by the best teachers. They will find them reduced to a system in this book.

ITS SELECTION OF
EXERCISES, RECREATIONS, AND PIECES is one of its most valuable characteristics. These are mostly from composers of recognized eminence, and are believed to be all intrinsically good, in the highest degree attractive, and adapted to the purposes of training. The same music in sheet form would cost several times the price of this book.

An indication of the favor with which this work is received is afforded by the fact that, though first published in September last, a fifth edition is already called for.

It is published with American Fingering, and also with European Fingering. Purchasers should be careful to indicate which is required.

D. APPLETON & CO.,

Nos. 443 AND 445 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,

Publish this Day:

NAPOLEON AND BLUCHER.
An Historical Romance.

BY LOUISA MUHLBACH.

TRANSLATED BY FRANÇOIS JORDAN.

One Volume, 8vo, illustrated. Paper Covers, $1 50;
Cloth, $2 00.

"In this novel the author unrolls before us the great rising of the Germans against Napoleon, and depicts with masterly skill the most stirring events and episodes of the great year 1813. Old General Blucher, that impetuous youth of seventy, around whom the noblest spirits of the Fatherland rallied with so much enthusiasm and devotion, and on whom princes and soldiers, with one accord, conferred the immortal title of 'Marshal Forward,' is the leading hero of the work. The author communicates to us about this remarkable man many facts not to be found in the histories of the times, and well calculated to excite our interest in and admiration for this wild and dashing, yet exceedingly kind, amiable, and noble-hearted captain. Scharnhorst, the original organizer of the Prussian Landwehr; Lutzow, the daring raider; Theodore Korner, the inspired Tyrtanus of the war; Hardenberg; Frederick William III.; York, who struck the first blow against Napoleon; Eleonora Prohaska, the heroic girl who fought under Lutzow, and many other prominent characters of the times, are grouped around Blucher with that dramatic power for which Louisa Muhlbach is noted.

"In the last chapters of the work the author takes us to France, and depicts in the most thrilling manner the momentous events that led to Napoleon's first abdication. The Emperor, Josephine, Maria Louisa, the King of Rome—of whom the author presents a portrait of surpassing beauty; the leading marshals and statesmen of the First Empire; the princes and generals of the Allied Armies, flushed with victory—all pass under our eyes in a number of episodes drawn with so much skill that, on laying down the volume, we must admit that we have not only read history, but have as it were seen and heard the leading actors of one of the most important and interesting periods."

To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea Trade (previous to the establishment of the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY), we will start with the American Houses, leaving out of the account entirely the profits of the Chinese factors.

First. The American House in China or Japan makes large profits on their sales or shipments—and some of the richest retired merchants in this country have made their immense fortunes through their houses in China.

Second. The Banker makes large profits upon the foreign exchange used in the purchase of Teas.

Third. The Importer makes a profit of 30 to 50 per cent. in many cases.

Fourth. On its arrival here it is sold by the cargo, and the Purchaser sells it to the Speculator in invoices of 1000 to 2000 packages, at an average profit of about 10 per cent.

Fifth. The Speculator sells it to the Wholesale Tea
Dealer in lines at a profit of 10 to 15 per cent.

Sixth. The Wholesale Tea Dealer sells it to the Wholesale Grocer in lots to suit his trade at a profit of about 10 per cent.

Seventh. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail Dealer at a profit of 15 to 25 per cent.

Eighth. The Retailer sells it to the Consumer for ALL THE PROFIT HE CAN GET.

When you have added to these EIGHT profits as many brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, and add the original cost of the Tea, it will be perceived what the consumer has to pay. And now we propose to show why we can sell so very much lower than small dealers.

We propose to do away with all these various profits and brokerages, cartages, storages, cooper-ages, and waste, with the exception of a small commission paid for purchasing to our correspondents in China and Japan, one cartage, and a small profit to ourselves—which, on our large sales, will amply pay us.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city. Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a Club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a Club say how much Tea or Coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the list is complete, send it to us by mail. We will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost—so that there need be no confusion in their distribution: each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the Club can divide equally among themselves.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford.

We send no complimentary package for clubs of less than thirty dollars.

COUNTRY CLUBS, Hand and Wagon Peddlers, and small stores (of which class we are supplying many thousands, all of which are doing well), can have their orders promptly and faithfully filled, and, in case of Clubs, can have each party's name marked on their package and directed, by sending their orders to Nos.
31 and 33 Vesey street.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than thirty dollars had better send post-office drafts, or money, with their orders, to save the expense of collecting by express; but larger orders we will send by express, to collect on delivery.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third by sending directly to

30 Vesey St., New York,

Are now supplying families throughout the country with TEAS warranted, in all cases, perfectly pure as imported, at cargo prices—thus saving to them five or six profits of middle-men, which average from 50 cents to $1 per pound. Clubs can be formed in any city or town, by any person, male or female; and to such as will take the trouble we will furnish Teas and Coffees, for their own use, free of charge, to the amount of five per cent. on each order they send us. On application, we send by mail circulars containing price list of all our Teas and Coffees, also club lists and terms to agents in detail.

We forward all goods (collect on delivery) by the Express Company, and members of the club can divide the express charges equally among themselves.

THE RISE AND FALL OF CRINOLINE.

V.

ANNO 1775, BERLIN.—With the exception of Bellevue Castle, almost every thing which would recall the old days of the pig-tails has disappeared from the Zoological Gardens of Berlin. Only here and there one meets an old yew hedge, or a pillar, or a florid ornament which once adorned a summer-house or a Chinese pavilion. Every thing else has been cleared away to give place to the handsome villas of the purse-proud Berlin tradesmen, whose gayly-blazoned chariots now mingle with those of the aristocracy in a manner which would have outraged their ancestors' ideas of propriety. The philosophical simplicity of Frederick the Great prevented such extravagance in his time. The nobility then furnished his officers, while the plebeian classes gave the common soldiers, or else with the sweat of their brows made up for the ravages of war. It was only in the last years of that monarch, when he was getting daily more simple and retired in his way of life, and when he would ride only once a week from Sans Souci to the capital, that the worthy Berliners became more aspiring, and that the promenades were filled with luxury and fashion. Even then the hoop-skirt never attained that immensity which marked it in other countries; and only strong-minded or "gallant" women ventured on an exception, such as may be observed on the lady with the three-cornered hat in our illustration. Indeed, the train was positively prohibited by law to those not of noble rank; and it was hardly to be seen except at court or in the salons. A woman who should have ventured in the street in such a costume would have been ill thought of, nay, positively arrested. The three-cornered military hat, on the other hand, was a specially Prussian fashion; and, though not worn generally, was highly favored in court circles. The promenade hats were monstrously large, and composed of cane, horse hair, or Leghorn straw. They were drawn down almost over the eyebrows, and in the centre contained a perfumed bouquet, a fruit-basket, or an Indian bird's-nest. Such a hat was the honor and pride of a family, and often cost ten or twelve Frédéric d'or. The skirts, on the other hand, were simple, being constructed only of whalebone and cane. In shape they resembled a bee-hive, and were almost shot-proof.

RISE AND FALL OF CRINOLINE.

FACETIÆ.

A NEGRO, undergoing his examination as a witness, when asked if his master was a Christian, replied, "No, Sir, he is a member of Congress."

NOT EXACTLY A RIDDLE.—What is the sensation that an educated person derives from a sensation novel?—A sensation of nausea.

DESIGNING MEN—Architects.

A "RUFF" SKETCH—A portrait of Queen Elizabeth.

THE SOFTEST KIND OF BRICKS—Cambrics.

To make a (n) ice cream—stick a pin in the baby. To prevent the creaking of the door—nail it up. To make a window blind—fill it up with bricks and mortar.

What religious sect should make the best gardeners?—The Bhuddists of the Flowery Land.

What sort of a cravat would a hog be most likely to choose?—A pig's-tye, of course.

Which is the quickest way of driving a bargain?—Stealing a horse and cart and driving off.

Why was the whale that swallowed Jonah like a retired milkman?—Because he got a profit (prophet) out of the water.

Madame Rachel says that the only way to avoid growing old is to dye young.

An Irish sailor once visited a city where he said, "they copper-bottomed the tops of their houses with sheet-lead."

A child once asked a minister, "Do you think my father will go to heaven?" "Yes," was the reply. "Well," returned the child, "if he don't have his own way there he won't stay long."

A FORT THAT IS TOO MUCH STORMED NOWADAYS—The piano-forte.

The most laconic will on record is that of a man who died in 1760. It runs thus: "I have nothing; I owe a great deal; the rest I give to the poor."

YELLOW FEVER—The passion for gold.

A SCHISM TO BE APPROVED OF—A witticism.

Was it excusable for the Irishman to go to buy lumber at the Post office?

How long did Cain hate his brother?—As long as he was able.

ALPHABETICAL LIKING.—"Jane, what letter in the alphabet do you like best?" "Well, I don't like to say, Mr. Snobbs." "Pooh, nonsense! say right out. Which do you like the best?" "Well," dropping her eyes, "I like U best."

THE TWINS.

Twin roses on one stem,
Twin cherries on one bough,
Twin rubies in one diadem—
A perfect pair, I vow

I know not which is sweeter,
I know not which is rarer,
And if I had to grapple
The question of the apple,
And pulchriori detur,
I'd not know which is fairer.

Sweet music, and its echo sweet,
A swan and its reflection—
Such is the pair of twins complete,
A duplicate perfection!

Was ever poor mortal
So troubled as I am?
To Felicity's portal
I feel that I nigh am,
And not very shy am!
But what can I do
When I can not discover
Of which of the two
I am truly the lover?

Then pity me, who
Am condemned for my sins
To be deeply in love with the beautiful twins.

There's Ethel, the fair,
With the rose in her hair,
I think she's the lov'lier—almost—of the pair—
Especially, too, when her sister's not there!

But when Maud's in the way,
Well! I really can't say!
For Maud has such eyes
For color and size,
And they've both necks and shoulders
That dazzle beholders,
And voices as sweet as the throbbles in May.

Oh, blest is the fortunate fellow who wins
Either one of the beautiful, beautiful twins!

To what can the poet distracted compare
These beauties so rare?—
At a loss for a figure I am, I declare!

They're the new double-barrel Dan Cupid is armed with (His old bow and arrows no longer he's charmed with),
The prize double-bloom out of Beauty's own green'us,
A charming two-volume edition of Venus!
All nature admires them! The beasts and the birds
Find joy in their glances—delight in their words;
And no fish so cold-blooded but twiddles his fins
As he drinks to the health of the beautiful twins.

Oh, what shall I do
To decide 'twixt the two?
For each is so neat,
So sweet and complete!

Oh, my course of true love has arrived at a hitch,
For I mustn't wed both, and I can't decide which!

I've tried to decide
Which to take for my bride,
But my puzzling all ends in the way it begins!
At a loss what to do,
For a choice of the two,
I exclaim to myself,
Poor unfortunate elf,
"Since I can't marry both—oh, why wasn't I twins?"

Opera and Ball Dresses.

Fig. 1.—Evening dress of pink satin, over which a black lace bedouin is worn as a fourreau. As is shown in the illustration, the bedouin is arranged without any fullness round the waist, and is fastened behind, where the ends are looped together. The bedouin can also be worn as a fourreau in the style of Fig. 3, with the ends sewed together. Low-necked corsage, around which is a deep frill of black lace and a quilling of pink satin ribbon. Short sleeves of puffed satin. Pearl bracelets; white kid gloves. Belt of pink satin to match the dress.

Fig. 2.—Opera dress. Pompadour gored dress of blue silk. Close Watteau sleeves, reaching only to the elbow, and finished with an under-sleeve of puffed lace. Spanish mantilla of black figured lace, trimmed with a lace frill, and pointed at the bottom, and finished with silk tassels. — The mantilla also serves as a head-dress, being confined on the head by a diadem of flowers. It is fastened in front by a flower of the same kind as those used for the diadem. — White kid gloves and white fan.

Fig. 3.—Ball dress of white tarlatan, trimmed round the bottom with four puffs of tarlatan. Fourreau of white lace, trimmed with 3 narrow rouleaux of pink satin. Bertha of puffed lace, and rouleaux of pink satin. Broad sash of pink satin ribbon, tied in a bow behind, and looping up the fourreau as shown in the illustration. Low corsage of white tarlatan, with short, puffed sleeves, trimmed round the bottom with a frill of narrow edging. Pearl necklace, ear-rings, and bracelets. Chignon of curls, wreath of pink roses in the hair.

BUSINESS WOMEN.

THERE is a great deal of talk about woman's rights, and much question as to whether she has all she is entitled to. There are, however, undoubtedly some privileges which no one refuses to her, but which she herself fails to claim.

That woman has the right to make herself useful in certain spheres where she has hitherto not cared to exercise it is undoubted. This, moreover, has been owing rather to her own indifference than from any steady opposition on the part of the male sex. For example, in this country how rarely is a woman seen conducting what is ordinarily called business. In Europe there is hardly a branch of commerce, trade, or manufacture of which a woman is not seldom the chief manager. The widow Clicquot, whose over-luscious and potent wine accords so well with the Russian strength of head and sweetness of tooth, was bereft of her husband at the age of twenty-seven. She succeeded to a wine manufactory, with a great many debts and a plentiful supply of empty bottles. She went down at once into the cellars and set to work, with apron on and sleeves turned up to the shoulders, and persisted until almost the last day of her life in personally managing a business which became one of the largest and most profitable in the world. She died a short time since at the age of eighty-nine years, leaving a fortune of over four millions of dollars. In the mean time she had married a daughter and a grand-daughter to a count and a marquis of the cream of the cream of French aristocracy. This, however, was not among the most wonderful of the skillful and busy widow's operations; for in France any degree of rank can be purchased, with a man of some kind or other thrown into the bargain, by those who have the means and inclination to buy it.

An American woman, placed in the same position as Madame Clicquot, would have left the almost bankrupt estate to the lawyers to settle; and they would have settled it effectually by sinking it in ruin. Many much more promising successions in the United States have been wasted from the disinclination or want of capacity of women for business, who have thus descended to a life of poverty and dependence when they might, with a little more knowledge or effort, have secured for themselves and their children a substantial support and even wealth.

A popular French writer thus describes the daughter of a wealthy wholesale trader of France: "Fancy a little pale body, with large blue eyes, and false sleeves of green cloth, to prevent her frock from being inked. She keeps the ledger, makes out the bills, and passes her life in the midst of piles of letters, wafers, and ink-scrappers." Fancy the daughter of a rich New York merchant thus installed and occupied! The French picture is given only as an illustration of the difference between the practical education of women in France and in America, and is not offered as an example to be strictly followed. It may not be desirable that the daughters of our merchants should pass their lives in their fathers' counting-houses, but a little practical knowledge of ledgers and correspondence might be of effectual service in case of need, and would do no harm should the occasion never arise for its exercise.

The education of our women is too sentimental and ornate to admit of their becoming practical and useful. They are, moreover, so imbued with the idea that the chief object of marriage is to dress, visit, and otherwise play the lady, that it would be difficult to persuade them to learn some little of business at the risk of soiling their delicate fingers with ink. Husbands, too, are kept in such respectful awe of their superfine wives that they do not venture to disclose to them the vulgar mysteries of their affairs, and they are thus prevented from acquiring that knowledge which might be of essential service.

WORKING TOGETHER.

IN literature, as in life, it is not good for man to be alone. The instincts of the intellect, like those of the heart, demand the help of fellowship, and we can no more set aside the law in the one case than in the other. Woman represents a specific form of mind as well as a distinctive kind of character, nor is she woman more thoroughly in constancy and depth of devotion, in beauty of household tenderness, in self-forgetfulness of consecration to the welfare of others, than in those modes of thought, sentiment, and expression which peculiarly belong to her in the offices of literary effort. In respect to literature, she stands to man precisely in the same relation that she occupies in the home and in the church. She is a "helpmeet," a co-worker, a partner, in the grand work of originating and inspiring those ideas which the world needs for the guidance of its moral aims and the perfection of its moral strength. To deny this is simply to deny the worth of womanhood.

Happily for the age no argument on this subject is needed. If it were now an open question we should have the same sort of puerile discussion that we had thirty years ago on the propriety of the higher education of woman. But women have done so much and so well in different departments of literature that they have fairly won a position from which they can not be dislodged. They are now felt to be a necessity in literature. All men are ready enough to acknowledge rights when vindicated; and as the pen is only a peaceful kind of sword that in the hand of woman has fought its way to successful empire, we should be quite untrue to our pride in victorious might if we failed to render the homage due to her conquering valor. And, moreover, it is certain that the position so justly attained will not be sacrificed by any default of womanly culture and sagacity. Toward themselves and their prerogatives women are valiant conservatives. Men put their victories into institutions, into stock companies, into all manner of absurd legislation, into a windy logic that blows hither and thither as the weather directs; while women lock up the past in their own strong hearts, and hold what they acquire secure from change. Yea, it is altogether probable that certain branches of literature will pass very largely into their possession. In fiction, poetry, and the like, they are gaining ground on the other sex; and as they have begun to feel their power and have a quiet assurance of fuller achievement, the other side of the world meanwhile accepting the situation as the fate of the age, we see no reason to doubt that women will, ere long, be as vital an agency in literature as they are in society and religion.

The new era which has been so boldly defined by the Mitfords, the Stickneys, the Brontës, the Evanses, the Mulochs of the day, is broadly different from any other era in literature. It is thoroughly democratic in its strange truthfulness to certain experiences of the human heart, doing in the literature of fiction and history what Cowper, Burns, and Crabbe did in poetry, by resting its claims to acceptance on the feelings common to all people. Then, too, it is genuinely international. What Lord Hobart said of Richard Cobden is true of the aims of these writers, "to break down the barriers of a narrow nationalism, and blend into one great community the nations of the world." Women are quick to understand the vernacular of the world, and quick to write therein without that fear which impoverishes genius by self-abatement. Unlike men, they get their purposes from within far more than from without. They originate books in their own hearts; fashion and conformity are for the time forgotten, and they are the more individualized here because so little individualized elsewhere. And then, the maternal instinct— inseparable from a woman's nature—the tender forethought, the vigilant providence, the eager wish that these children of the brain shall be well-reared and well-mannered; all this appears significantly enough in their books, and assurance that the critical police will not have to arrest and imprison any of their characters for social outrages. In this purer tone of literature we are vast gainers by the addition of womanly mind to the printed thought of the age. Gainers, too, are we by that return to simple intuitions and fresh instincts which its creations have evinced. Certain it is, these writers have supplied an element long wanted by bringing in a new order of inspirations. They have given the womanly interpretation of inward and outward life, and given it in such form and manner as to augment the stores of thought and sentiment. Society must have this womanly infusion of intellect. Without it all our education is one-sided. As a balancing power, it is essential to our growth and stability; and just as civilization advances in its intellectual and material aspects, its presence will be more and more salutary and invigorating. Although a late product it is none the worse for that. If it has required nineteen centuries of Christian civilization in its slow progress toward maturity to call forth this potent agency, we may be sure that this is the best presumptive evidence of its invaluable worth. The fruit of old trees is often the most delicious. Time does a work for the human mind just as it does for trees. You can not anticipate it by artificial processes. Nature consults her own leisure, and most wisely has she consulted it in this instance by endowing the womanly mind of the century with precisely that sort of insight and that impassioned love of expression which are needed to preserve us on the one hand from a skeptical logic, and on the other from an intellectual sensualism.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

A Letter to Lucilla.

MY DEAR LUCILLA,—Our late conversation upon the value of little things in the great journey in which we are all engaged was forcibly brought to my mind, as I walked meditatively homeward from your pleasant house, by a trifling incident. Neighbor Brown joined me, and as he walked or rather limped along, he seemed curiously impatient of every thing that was said, and of every thing that happened. If I remarked, with the most Christian desire of good-fellowship—for you will allow that Brown is not an inspiring companion—that a storm seemed to me brewing, Brown in the most captious manner replied that he could see no sign whatever of any change in the weather, and apparently doubted that I did. Then, if a trotting wagon darted by, he peevishly wished to know whether every Tom Noddy who had sense enough to hold reins was to be permitted to drive over quiet passengers. If a heavy team rumbled along, he declared that he was going to live in the country, where he could hear himself and his friends without hallooing loud enough to startle the man in the moon. Nothing was satisfactory. Even —'s very latest poem he laughed at bitterly. I began to fear that he would quarrel with the sun for shining and the north star for being sectional.

Observing that he limped, I said to him that I was not aware that he had hurt his foot, and sincerely hoped that his lameness was very temporary.

"No lameness at all," said he, limping and wincing; "it's nothing but a — peg in my shoe."

"Good Heaven!" I answered, "why don't you boil your peas?"

"What's the use of saying such — nonsensical things to a suffering man?" asked Brown, petulantly. "What peas do you mean, for pity's sake?"

I replied that I was very sorry to irritate him, and that I was only alluding to the foolish old story of the two pilgrims to Jerusalem, one of whom mortified the flesh by walking thither with hard, dried peas in his shoes, while the other secured an easy passage by cooking his peas before he started.

"And a very wise man he was," I stoutly persisted. "It makes all the difference to your enjoyment of the journey whether you boil your peas or not before starting."

He thought for a moment, and then answered: "You are quite right, and I should have boiled my peas if I could have found a pot. But a man can't take off his shoes in the middle of the street," testily concluded Brown, as the peg gave him another wound.

"Well, my dear friend," said I, "turn round a corner. Stop in a doorway. But don't limp all the way home, and make the whole world disagreeable to you."

So he did what he should have done the moment he felt the inconvenience. He took off his shoe, pulled out his knife, and whittled down the peg, replaced the shoe upon his foot, and instantly the world was a new world to him. The wagons did not roll too swiftly, nor the slow wheels thunder too loudly, and all the new poems and fine articles in the magazines were criticised in a manner which the authors would have felt to be simply just; and my neighbor Brown was so happy and agreeable that he declared it to be his serious intention to set up a carriage for Mrs. B., with a neatly-painted device upon the panel representing a boiled pea.

Now, my dear Lucilla, the moral which I drew from this as applicable to our conversation was this: That although manners are small things—mere words and smiles, and turns of expression, and appearances of interest and sympathy; although they may be sneered at as trivial and unworthy serious thought, and actually no more than peas and pegs, yet the difference between good and bad manners is the difference between hard peas and boiled peas in your shoe—between a smooth sole to tread upon and a sole with an angry peg piercing you at every step. I am quite sure you would find that good-manners are what the proverb says of honesty—the best policy. You must not understand me as insinuating that you would find it so as if your manners were of the dried-pea school. The very thought makes me smile. No, my dear Lucilla, you will not care for my compliments, but I heard young William say that you were a thornless rose, and I agreed with him. His remark may not have been original, but it was true.

And can you tell me why there is a feeling of insincerity associated with good-manners? In my wanderings through many drawing-rooms and houses of fashion and beauty (and I must say that there are pleasanter resorts in the world) how often have I heard the atrocious comments of the innumerable Wasp family upon the most lovely and attractive persons!

"I see," said Miss Wasp to me one evening, at a pleasant little party, "I see that you have been talking to Mrs. Bland, and that you are as much captivated as every body else. Now, Mr. Bachelor, there never was such a transparent woman as Mrs. Bland in the world. Her whole secret is making every man think he is especially preferred. That is what I call insincere; and if a woman can not succeed but by insincerity—Heaven help her!"

So my virtuous Pharisee shrugged her not very beautiful shoulders and thanked Heaven she was not as Mrs. Bland.

She certainly was not like her. Mrs. Bland is a woman who cultivates good-manners, as it is called; and instead of being a proof of insincerity they conspicuously show her good feeling. She has ready sympathies; she has the quickest intelligence; she makes herself familiar with all the little ways that relieve the awkwardness of others; above all, she takes upon herself the duty of interesting and entertaining those with whom she converses. Is that insincerity?

If a man who is embarrassed, diffident, wholly unused to the ways of society is presented to Mrs. Bland, she makes him forget himself as far as possible by her kind interest and pleasant discourse. She has no particular interest in brother Awkward; she never saw him before this moment; she may never see him again. But her duty for this moment is with him, and it is to make him happier; and there is no more insincerity in the sweet manner with which she does it than there is in giving alms to the poor. What particular interest has Miss Wasp in the poor persons to whom she gives money or work? Is it, then, insincere in her to do what indicates interest? She may call it a moral duty. Very well, what is the limit of moral duty? Is it right and lovely for me to help a man's bodily necessities, and quite otherwise to minister to his mental needs, even if it be only putting him at his ease? Mrs. Bland feels exactly as much interest as she shows; and when Miss Wasp says that she treats every body alike she is very much mistaken; for Mrs. Bland could not do it. She can not possibly talk with the shy young student, who has just come from the country to enter college, as she does with me, for instance. Yet she puts college boy and tough old Mr. Bachelor equally at their ease.

Does Miss Wasp, my dear Lucilla, actually mean that if you are presented to a person whom you have never seen there must be austere silence until you feel a personal interest which is to inspire conversation? She means this or nothing. But if you are to enter into any kind of social intercourse beyond idly gazing at each other, what is to be first done? Clearly, in the most common phrase, you are to make yourselves mutually agreeable. The essence of good-manners is not hard to perceive. But there must be certain natural gifts and graces to complete them. A person of the finest manners is like a poet, born and not made. They are the result of a happy natural faculty and adaptation. But those of us who happen not to be born to that purple may still reach some of the lesser grades. Because I do not feel myself, dear Lucilla—if such were the fact—to be of the blood-royal, shall I be content to be a boor?

No, no; so vital is this charm of manner that if I were a married man, and a father, and I saw that my daughter was growing up morbidly shy and awkward, and a nuisance to herself and others from her intolerable bashfulness, I should think it my first duty to correct it for her own sake, and at cost of the utmost pains. If I did not, I should doom her to an incalculable disadvantage all her life. Let us conform in things indifferent. Let us boil our peas and whittle away the pegs in our shoes. I have always found, if a man were very particular to let the hair of his head grow very long and hang upon his shoulders when it was the custom to wear it short, that there was more hair upon the outside of his head than there were brains within. If a woman insists, in a time of universal hoops, that they are a stupid folly, and she will none of them, she becomes instantly so conspicuous that she must summon as much heroism to persist in her limp and lank skirts as if it were a matter of importance. I know a man of my time who was a buck of the year 1830. He clings as far as possible to the fashions of that date. He is comical in his ancient hats and other paraphernalia. He says that there is no reason in the modern fashions. But if you come closer to him you find that, far from being a remarkably reasonable man, he is still and merely a buck of the year 1830. He insists upon dry peas and stiff pegs in his shoes, and thinks himself wiser than the rest.

Despite my good friend Buck, I say boil your peas, dear Lucilla. Let us make the journey of life gracious and pleasant by sweet and kindly manners. Let us change our dress gently with the changing fashions as we do with the changing seasons. Let us regard the great journey as one upon which all the passengers are to make each other as cheerful as possible; and remember that to the great multitude of those of them whom we meet we can render no other service than that of good-manners.

You do not need the sermon, dear Lucilla, but you can drop it softly into the next pew.

Your friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

LINGERIE.

THE word lingerie is used by our furnishing houses to comprise all those white garments of lace, linen, and muslin necessary for a lady's complete outfit, including muslin dresses for morning and evening, fichus, canezons, camisoles, peignoirs, and sets of under-linen. In attempting to speak of the elegant models shown us within the past week we begin with the body linen.

The declension in prices of cotton cloth has produced a corresponding change in ready-made garments. Waunstrutta muslin is sold now for twenty cents a yard, New York Mills at twenty-three cents, Lonsdale cloth at sixteen cents, and Hill's brand at fifteen cents. French long-cloth, or percale, may be bought for forty cents. Nansook muslin ranges from thirty cents to $1.25, according to quality, and dimity from twenty-five to sixty cents. In linen there is but little if any change in price, yet made-up garments have been reduced ten per cent. Ladies who do not wear linen use percale for handsome under-clothing.

Chemise bands are worn very wide. Two rows of cambric insertion an inch wide, with a puff of the same width between, and a lace edge, form a pretty band. Double, or box-pleats, made narrow, fit neatly, and are easily ironed if stitched lengthways of the linen. A new feature is to cut yoke and sleeves in one piece. Trimmings are arranged diagonally and in medallions. Tucks, puffs, and insertions slant in points toward the front. Lace, appliqué embroidery, and bunches of tucks are cut into oval medallions, squares, diamonds, or hexagons, and strapped around with narrow bands of linen in order to strengthen them. Plain chemises of Waumsutta vary in price from two dollars to eight. The lowest in price have linen bands and sleeves tucked or with cords stitched in waves; others, at two dollars and a half, are tucked below the band to form a point; those at three dollars are ruffled; embroidered for four dollars; and deep yokes, formed of diagonal insertion and puffs, are sold at eight dollars. Linen chemises range from five to twelve dollars; neat, substantial garments, trimmed with needle-work and ruffles. Drawers, very wide at the ankle, are trimmed to match each chemise.

Gowns with yokes are more frequently called for than sacques and circular shapes. Handsome peignoirs are loose Gabrielles. Yokes, pointed or straight according to fancy, are formed entirely of trimming, and made without seams on the shoulders. A band of trimming down the front of the garment is very ornamental. Standing collars are preferred, as they do not rumple easily. Full sleeves are clumsy. A better style is a loose coat-sleeve with pointed cuff large enough for the hand to pass through. Valenciennes is the favorite lace for these garments. Cluny is also desirable, as it is very strong and washes well.

Neatly-made gowns of New York Mills muslin, with yokes formed of medallions of diagonal tucks surrounded by narrow fluted ruffles, are sold for six dollars. A tucked and ruffled band extends down the front of the skirt. Pointed collar and cuffs. A long cambric gown, with yoke of puffs and insertion reaching to the waist, is bordered at the neck and wrists with Valenciennes. Imported gowns of French cambric, with guipure lace medallions for trimming, are sold for twenty dollars, or with Valenciennes insertion arranged in vandykes on the yoke for twenty-five dollars. Another at fifteen dollars has the whole yoke formed of narrow box-pleats, with linen bands stitched on in a waving pattern. Lace ruffle at neck and wrists. Fleurs-de-lis are prettily needle-worked around the button-holes of others made of linen.

Short camisoles of French nansook, with yokes of tiny tucks and insertion, are exhibited by a tasteful modiste at prices ranging from six to fifty dollars.

Muslin petticoats are gored. Those intended to be worn under short dresses have but four gored breadths without gathers at the belt. Long trained skirts have six widths, and are frequently cut by the same pattern as the outside dress. Nine yards of four-quarter muslin is required for a trained skirt, sixty-two inches long in the back. Ruffles are again fashionably worn around the skirt, and tucked bands are inserted, as it is difficult to tuck the sloping widths smoothly. Diagonal tucks, or those perpendicularly arranged, are prettiest.

Short skirts of Waumsutta muslin are sold for four dollars. Wide inserted border of tucks above the hem. Another, with flounce half a yard wide, with insertion and ruffled edge, at five dollars. A skirt at eighteen dollars, handsome enough for outside wear, has medallions of Valenciennes and embroidery above the hem. A nansook skirt, to be worn with a breakfast chemise, has a flounce around it, with the fullness taken up in tucks. Lace edge. Trained skirts of cambric are sixty inches long in the back width. With narrow tucks and fluted ruffle they are sold at eleven dollars. Another, at twenty-eight dollars, has diamonds of tucks surrounded by bands of Valenciennes insertion.

Corset-covers are cut to extend over the hips. For slender figures it is best to make them very full, and gather into a belt, with basques attached. Very plain ones of linen are sold at four dollars. When made more elaborately, with puffs of linen cambric, transferred embroidery, and lace, they may cost thirty dollars.

A novelty in stays is Thomson's glove-fitting corset, which the English fashion journals eulogize highly, and which, for comfort, elegance, and perfection of fit, is a decided improvement on the ordinary gored corset. It is cut on a novel principle, being made of three longitudinal pieces, the middle one forming a bodice, and the upper and under ones swelling to fit the form, thus obviating the necessity of the stiff and ungraceful gores, which have a tendency to destroy the roundness of the figure. The lacing at the back is ingeniously contrived, and the spring fastening of the front is novel and simple. These corsets possess the additional advantage of being cheaper than the French corsets, ranging in price from three and four and a half to six and a half dollars, according to the material and trimming used.

ELABORATE UNDER-LINEN.

A beautiful set, made for a bride, consists of gown, chemise, and drawers. It is marked one hundred and fifty dollars. The nansook gown has a straight yoke, without shoulder-seams, formed of square medallions of Valenciennes—on which butterflies are wrought—barred with two rows of narrow appliqué insertion, surrounded by a double row of edging. Puffs of linen cambric between the figures. Coat-sleeves trimmed in the same way up the outside seams. Lace on the collar and wrists. Blue satin is laid beneath the lace. Long-cloth drawers with puffs and butterfly medallions around them, and fluted lace border. Chemise of linen, with band three inches wide, of medallions and puffs. Deep-pointed fall reaching to the waist, used as a corset-cover.

Another set for three hundred dollars has five pieces—gown, chemise, drawers, trained skirt, and corset cover. Nansook gown. Yoke of medallions. In the centre of each is a rose embroidered in linen cambric, set in two narrow bands of Valenciennes. Nansook strip stitched around these and edged with lace. Row of medallions down the front with puffs of linen cambric on each side. Vandyked lace collar and cuffs. Blue satin under the lace. Linen chemise and drawers with wide bands of puffs and embroidery. Similar trimming around the skirt.

At another house are handsome sets for seventy-five dollars, and others for fifty dollars trimmed with Cluny.

A skirt of gauze flannel has a richly embroidered border, six inches wide, in a scroll pattern. Part of the work is tamboured with silk floss. Seeded needle-work fills out the design. Small, scalloped edge. Price twenty-eight dollars. Woolen embroidery is recommended for flannel as it keeps the same color as the flannel after washing. A pretty pattern is of roses and leaves in wool-work, the veins filled in with silk. Leaf scallop. Three tucks with feathered stitching above. Price twenty-two dollars.

MUSLIN DRESSES.

An India muslin dress, worn over a pink gored silk slip, has two corsages. The high-necked waist is formed entirely of puffs of muslin and Valenciennes insertion extending from the belt to the neck. Coat-sleeves arranged similarly from wrist to shoulder. Low, full corsage, with wide lace Berlin and lace ruffles for sleeves. The upper part of the skirt is ingeniously contrived to have the effect of gores, with but two or three seams. The lower half consists of four puffs separated by insertion, with a wide border of box-pleats edged with lace. Sash of pink silk, with wide double lappets trimmed with a quilled ruche. An imported dress, of Swiss muslin ornamented with embroidery, has a deep Spanish flounce trimmed with square medallions of exquisite French needle-work and lace. High waist and coat-sleeves tastefully embroidered. Price two hundred and seventy-five dollars.

A low-necked Gabrielle, body and skirt in one, is of white organdy over cerise marseline silk. Down the back and front seams are puffs, wide at the edge of the skirt, graduating narrower as they shape the waist, and wider again in passing over the shoulder. Valenciennes insertion and lace on either side of the puff. With the silk under-dress furnished the price is one hundred dollars.

A handsome French evening-dress of Swiss has a basque attached, making a reception-suit. The skirt has a box-pleated flounce twelve inches wide, scalloped and edged with Valenciennes. A lappel, or revers, graduating smaller toward the waist, is sewn in with the seams of each width. Swiss insertion and a fine feather-edged lace around the lappets. The basque has coat-sleeves and pointed collar. Revers in back of basque-skirt. Price two hundred and fifty dollars.

A simple dress for a young girl is of dotted Swiss, worn over blue silk. Full, low corsage, gathered into a belt, and short puffed sleeves. Long-sleeved basque, trimmed with a ruffle needle-worked in small scallops at both edges, and sewn on in box-pleats. A similar ruffle on the short skirt. Price one hundred and twenty dollars.

A high-necked under-dress of pink silk, gored flat, and long train, is trimmed with three bias ruffles two inches wide, and notched at either edge. Over this is worn a white organdy, with low, square corsage formed of puffs graduated to form a tapering waist, without being gathered into a belt. The white skirt reaches to the silk flounces. A ruffle at the bottom is made almost entirely of Valenciennes lace. Puffs reaching to the knee are joined by bands of insertion, with narrow edge on each side. A tablier, or apron, is formed on the front width by three deep points of lace and puffs. The skirt is festooned at one side with pink rosettes.

VARIETIES.

A breakfast Fanchon of Valenciennes lace has long lappets crossing beneath the chignon. Colored glacé silk lining. Price eighteen dollars. A simple breakfast-cap of the Martha Washington shape is bordered with a scalloped ruffle forming a coronet in front, with pink bow over the forehead. Price ten dollars. A coquettish Fanchon of solid guipure, with coronet of loops of blue ribbon, and tiny bows down the centre of the lappets. Price fourteen dollars.

A pretty addition to a solid-colored silk dress is a sleeveless jacket of Brussels lace with satin pipings arranged in scallops. Beaded lace edge with jet pendants. Long sash of lace.

There is a great variety of styles and material of fichus. A graceful one of blonde is laid in folds, bordered with real lace edge. The lappets are three-eighths of a yard wide at the ends, and deeply pointed. Price twenty dollars. Another of organdy muslin has three narrow puffs separated by insertion. Valenciennes lace border. Price forty dollars. A square fichu of black guipure is trimmed with purple moiré ribbon arranged in trellised border. Price thirty dollars.

A low-necked fichu of black net with beaded lace trimming is also pretty.

A black cloth burnous is elaborately embroidered in a jardinière pattern, around the whole garment and down the back. Price one hundred and fifty dollars.

Among the evening dresses is a Metternich green silk, with long train skirt, gracefully sloped. Tulle of the same shade covers the whole skirt, ending in a wide quilling at the edge. Artificial marguerites loop up the tulle at intervals. A white tulle over-skirt is embroidered with silver stars. Embossed marguerites in floss above the hem. When made up the price is two hundred dollars.

A low-necked corsage of pink silk is to be worn over a white tarlatan dress. It is a combination of the peasant waist and peplum. Trimming formed of narrow satin folds studded with large pearls. Pearl fringe.

PERSONAL.

BISHOP HOPKINS, of Vermont, who died a few days since at the age of 76, had never been confined to his bed for a single day with sickness. Sitting in his chair the day before his death—he could not lie down—he said that he had been praying, "Thy will be done," all his life; and it was time now that he should begin to suffer if it were His will. His thankfulness for the past blessings of his whole life was ever on his lips, and the hopes of the life to come; but as to his sufferings, there was only sweet contentment, perfect resignation, and peace. On Thursday morning he expressed his conviction that his life's work was done. Sitting, and in his library, he awaited the end. In the afternoon the oppressed breathing grew shorter and feebler. The hand fell helpless down at his side. He opened his eyes and gazed for a moment intently upon vacancy, as if seeing there what none around him could see—perchance the approaching angels; and then, while all were kneeling around him, and his son THOMORSE was offering up the Commendatory prayer, the eyes fell, and the head drooped gently, and the breathing hushed so softly that at first they thought it a sweet sleep, and knew not that it was the sleep of Death. Of the 152 bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church throughout the world, there were, at the time of his death, but two who were his seniors by consecration. He was remarkable for his versatility of mind. He was one of the most elegantly accomplished men of his day and ministry. He was a deeply-read theologian and historian; a general and accurate linguist; a persevering and successful worker in the cause of education; one of the earliest of lecturers; a technical and capable architect (and few things are more beautiful than reminiscences of the Bishop and his children designing, building, and decorating the Burlington church with their own hands); an artist of noticeable proficiency in oil and water-colors; a well-read musician; a belles-lettres scholar; indeed, it was hard to find a highway or by-way of ingenious investigation where the Bishop has not left his footprint.

—Another star has arisen in the vocal firmament of Europe—Miss BLANCHE BARETTI—who is spoken of, in her representation of Lucia, as rivaling, in the furor she created, the most successful of Jenny Lind's impersonations.

—MR. EUGENE HAYWOOD is now put down on the tax-lists of Illinois as the largest land-owner in that State. He holds 50,000 acres, purchased by his father 50 years ago. Recently he purchased 12,000 acres in Nebraska, at a cost of about 79 cents an acre. He is only 22 years of age, and in every respect a most desirable "object" for any agreeable young lady desirous of becoming Mrs. H.

—Dramatic authorship is beginning to pay. Mr. JOHN BROUGHAM is looking about for a fine house which acting and authoring enable him to buy, and Mr. JOSEPH JEFFERSON has just paid BODICHAULT $5000 for the copyright of "Rip Van Winkle," having previously paid him $13,000 as his percentage of what the play had earned.

—At the time that M'CLELLAN ordered the arrest of GRANT; at the time HALLECK scolded him; at the time SMITH had him superseded, and when several military heroes were snubbing him, it was not supposed that he would ever be of sufficient account to have his life written by ADAM BADEAU. Here is a pleasant little anecdote of the General: In his days of insignificance and poverty he used to furnish wood to the family of Congressman H. T. BLOW, of St. Louis, hauling it himself. On a recent occasion Mrs. BLOW attended one of the General's receptions, and he greeted her as follows: "Mrs. BLOW, I remember you well. What great changes have taken place since we met!" "Yes, General," remarked Mrs. B., "the war is over." "I did not mean that," he replied; "I mean with myself. Do you not recollect when I used to supply your husband with wood, and pile it myself, and measure it, too, and go to his office for my pay?" "Oh yes, General, your face was familiar in those days." "Mrs. BLOW, those were happy days; for I was doing the best I could to support my family."

—LOUISA MEHLBACH is in high feather with the Prussian monarch, who has conferred upon her the large golden medal for art and literature, and written to her "that the skill with which she had depicted the events and leading actors of one of the most momentous periods in Prussian history, in her 'Louisa of Prussia' and 'Napoleon and Blücher,' richly entitled her to an honor not hitherto conferred on any other German authoress."

—LISZT, who has taken to the priesthood in lieu of the piano, appears in public in a long, black coat, cut after the usual fashion for a Roman Abbot, and a broad-brimmed silk hat which looks old enough to have been through a dozen campaigns. The only bit of color visible about his dress was a little rose-bud in a button-hole of his coat. In person he is tall and commanding, while his large eyes, peering out from under great overarching eyebrows, and his long, light-colored hair, combine to give him that lion-like air which has so often been remarked.

It is the CLARKS and the PEABODYS who are, in good time, to make the eleemosynary institutions of the United States the most largely endowed of any in the world. We notice, also, that the late WILLIAM POWELL MASON, of Boston, left $10,000 to the Massachusetts General Hospital as a permanent fund, the interest to be expended in the maintenance of free beds, and $20,000 to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, the interest to go for the support of a professorship.

—One of the notabilities of Paris is a person known as the "Diamond Duke," a personal friend of the Emperor, to whom many years ago he lent much money. His diamonds lie in the Bank of France. He lives in large style, affects diamond coat-buttons, which is droll for a fellow of seventy, and has thirty wigs. In No. 1 he appears as if just returned from the hair-cutter, in elegant trim; No. 2 and the rest up to No. 30 grow long by degrees, and beautifully longer, until at No. 30 he remarks, in an off-hand manner, "Don't you think 'tis time I had my hair cut?" Of course his friends agree, and the next day he appears in No. 1. Good sort of fellow, in his way, but it wouldn't do for a husband.

—BISMARCK manages to be constantly saying or doing something that gets into the papers. Recently, meeting at Baden his barber, and speaking affably to him, the latter took airs, and complained of the mixed society at Baden-Baden. The Count replied: "Well, C., we can not all be barbers, you know."

—The Century Club, of this city, numbers among its members most of our clever literary and artistic people. At the annual meeting, held on the 11th inst., WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT was elected President, in place of Mr. BANCROFT, Minister to Prussia; and HUNTINGTON, the artist, Vice-President. Among the other officers for the year are SAMUEL B. RUGGLES, WILLIAM T. BLODGETT, PROFESSOR DRISLER, I. F. KENNETT, S. R. GIFFORD, THOMAS HOOKS, M'ENTEE, GEORGE HALL, YOUNG, VACH, etc., etc. The Wednesday and Saturday evening talks and toddies, at the Century, are among the pleasantest reunions of the town.

—The Countess of HARRINGTON, recently deceased in London, was long known as MARIA FOOTE, the actress, and grand-daughter of SAMUEL FOOTE, the dramatist. After twenty-seven years upon the boards she married, in 1831, the Earl of Harrington, who died in 1851. Of their two children Viscount PETERSHAM died in 1836, in his fifth year. The other is the wife of the Earl of Mount Charles.

—The last Parisian sensation in the way of public amusements is a female gymnast, or gymnastess, named Mlle. AZELLA, who is young, pretty, graceful, and has an expression of resolution seldom to be observed in the gentler sex. Yet this courageous girl is scarcely twenty years of age! Born at Milan, at a very early age she devoted herself to the choreographic art, and subsequently fulfilled several engagements as première danseuse throughout the Continent and in America; but while appearing as a dancer she, for nearly ten years, continued to practice the feats performed by LEOTARD, until at length complete success crowned her efforts. In Paris she created quite a furor, the Hippodrome being nightly crowded by people anxious to witness Mlle. AZELLA.

—The Emperor NAPOLEON is as accessible as Mr. JOHNSON. Every month British subjects, who would never think of calling upon Queen VICTORIA, ask for and obtain an interview with LOUIS NAPOLEON. The other day a number of dissenting ministers, with the Earl of Shaftesbury at their head, held quite a long chat at the Tuileries with the pious potentate. Lord Shaftesbury gave him a Bible, and one of the number was anxious to leave behind him a tract, but was persuaded by his colleagues to send it instead. The reverend gentleman, fully recognizing the despotic form of the Government of France, waited upon the Emperor to thank him for permitting them to distribute Bibles at the Paris Exhibition!

—FANNY KEMBLE, who is announced for a course of dramatic readings in this city in March, was born in London in 1811, and is therefore about 57 years of age.

LINGERIE.

We give a number of tasteful designs for lingerie, which are easily made, and which we commend to the attention of our readers.

Bavette Collar.

This collar is set on a small band of needle-work insertion, which is trimmed on the lower edge with narrow Valenciennes lace set on full. Two ends or bavettes, made of Valenciennes insertion and points of needle-work, edged with Valenciennes lace, Fig. 30, are set on the front of the collar, Fig. 29. The accompanying illustrations show the collar complete and a section of the cuff to be worn with the collar, made like the bavettes, of the full size.

Collar, Sleeves, and Cuffs, with Lappets.

This collar, with sleeves and cuffs to match, is made of lappets or leaves of Swiss muslin, embroidered and edged with Valenciennes lace, which overlap each other and form the articles. The accompanying illustrations show the collar, the sleeve, and a section of the cuff, of the full size. The leaves forming the collar are somewhat larger in front than behind, and are set into a double band, care being taken to make the three front leaves slant a little to either side, as is seen in the illustration.

ing, and is set into a double band. The chemisette is cut from Fig. 25, and is made, as shown in the illustration, of fine linen, double, insertion, and needle-work squares, bordered with Valenciennes edging. Two bows of ribbon finish the front. The cuffs match the collar.

Collar with Tabs and Sleeves.

This collar is made of a strip of Swiss muslin, twenty-one inches long, on which needle-work rosettes are sewn; the muslin is then cut out in scallops on the under edge along the rosettes, and edged with a frill of Valenciennes lace. The ends are scalloped and edged with lace on both sides, as seen in the illustration. The accompanying engravings show the collar on the chemisette, the sleeve, and a section of the end of the collar of the full size. The collar is set into a double band. The sleeve is trimmed round the bottom with needle-work rosettes applied on muslin to match the collar. Pink ribbon is laid under both sleeves and collar.

Cravat Collar with Sleeves.

This collar is made of needle-work insertion, edged with Valenciennes lace. Cravat ends of pleated Swiss muslin, bordered with needle-work insertion and Valenciennes lace, with two small figures in the corners, are set on the front of the collar. The collar is sewed in a band. The cuff is made of a strip of Swiss muslin, a quarter of a yard long and an inch and a half wide, sewed together at the ends, and laid in small pleats, on which are sewed points of Swiss muslin, bordered with narrow needle-work insertion and Valenciennes edging, and ornamented with application figures of needle-work, Fig. 28.

Cravat Collar with Lappets.

This collar is made of muslin lappets or leaves, embroidered in satin stitch and edged with Valenciennes lace, which are set in a narrow band in such a manner as to overlap each other a little. The pattern is the same as that of the collar with needle-work leaves which we have already described. The band is covered with blue ribbon, over which Valenciennes lace is pleated. Long ends of blue ribbon fall from the back of the collar.

Bavette Collar with Chemisette and Cuffs.

This collar is made of narrow Valenciennes insertion, two-fifths of an inch wide, and fine needle-work squares, the pattern of half of which is given in Fig. 24, edged with Valenciennes lace half an inch wide. The design for the squares, which is worked in satin stitch on Swiss muslin, is given in Fig. 25. Having set the collar on a small band, join it to the chemisette, which is made from Fig. 25, of fine linen, double, Valenciennes insertion, and needle-work squares, and is bordered with narrow needle-work insertion and a frill of Valenciennes edging. Two bows of blue ribbon finish the chemisette in front, as shown in the engraving. The illustration (page 233) shows the chemisette arranged on the figure.

Collar and Chemisette.

This collar and chemisette is made of narrow Valenciennes insertion and small needle-work squares. Fig. 26 gives the pattern of half the collar, as well as the design for the squares, which is worked in satin stitch on nansook. The collar is bordered with narrow Valenciennes edging.

SECTION OF COLLAR WITH TABS.

CRAVAT COLLAR WITH LOOPS.

PALETOT AND HOOD FOR GIRL FROM 2 TO 4 YEARS OLD.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XVI., Figs. 41-44, and No. XVII., Figs. 45 and 46.

SECTION OF CUFF WITH LAPPETS.

SECTION OF CUFF FOR BAVETTE COLLAR.

Cravat Collar and Cuffs, with Ribbon Loops.
See illustration, page 228.
THIS collar consists of a strip of muslin, on which needle-work rosettes are sewed. The muslin is cut in scallops along the lower edge, and a frill of Valenciennes lace is set thereon. Pink ribbon is laid underneath, and loops and ends of pink ribbon complete the collar, as shown in the illustration. The design is the same as that of the collar with tabs which we have already described. An accompanying illustration shows cuffs to match the collar.

High Waist with Simulated Fichu.
THIS waist is cut from the pattern given in No. XV., Figs. 36-40. The original is of brown velours, trimmed with a bias fold of brown silk simulating a fichu. This fold is edged on each side with black lace. The sleeves are likewise trimmed on the top and bottom with a bias fold of silk edged with lace. A brown silk belt with sash ends completes the dress.

Foot-Stool.
MATERIALS: strong brown worsted cord, 1 oz. twelvefold zephyr, brown morocco, and pasteboard.
This foot-stool is easily made out of cheap materials, as any old woolen or cotton stuff will answer for the foundation. Cut strips of any material whatever, eight inches wide, sew the ends together and roll them in the manner shown in the accompanying illustration, with strips of pasteboard between, to give them the necessary stiffness. Having made the roll of the size desired for the foot-stool—the original is nine inches in diameter—sew the end down fast, and cover the top with cotton batting or wool. The foot-stool is now ready for the covering, which consists of coarse brown worsted cord, wound round and round, beginning at the middle of the top, and sewed fast as the winding proceeds. This of course is made to fit the foot-stool, and is turned out when finished so that the stitches may not appear on the right side. The cover is then worked in cross stitch with brown twelvefold zephyr, in the manner shown in the illustration, and is afterward drawn on the foot-stool. The bottom is covered with a circular piece of brown morocco of the necessary size, and the foot-stool is finished by the addition of two handles, made of four strands of worsted cord, braided together.

Fringe for Napkins, etc.
THIS fringe is easily made on napkins, etc., by raveling out the stuff to the desired depth, and then forming a heading by winding the threads together with one of the ravelings threaded on a needle. The original, of Java canvas, has six threads wound together in this manner; they are then separated and wound in threes, and again united in one thick strand. A beautiful netted fringe can readily be obtained in this manner. The illustration clearly shows the process.

Crochet Fringe for Bed-Spreads, etc.
THIS fringe is pretty and very durable. It may also be used as trimming for curtain-supporters. It is composed of single strands connected by a crochet edge. Each of these is formed by 3 crochet bell-shaped figures, finished below by a tuft of threads. The original is made of coarse knitting-cotton. The bell-shaped figures are worked separately, each in rounds formed by 8 rows single crochet. For the foundation-cord make 8 chain stitches, then, missing the last, work in this 7 single crochet. At the end of the short cord thus formed make a foundation of 4 chain stitches, and form a circle by making in the 1st round: 1 slip stitch in the 1st of these 4 chain, then 2 single crochet in this stitch, and 2 single crochet in each of the 3 following stitches.

2d round—In every stitch of the last round 1 single crochet.

3d round—Like the 2d, except that it must be twice widened; that is, 2 opposite stitches must contain each 2 single crochet, so that the round shall count 10 stitches.

4th round—In each stitch 2 single crochet.

5th round—In each stitch 1 single crochet.

6th round—In every 4th stitch 2, in each of the other stitches 1, single crochet.

7th and 8th rounds—In each stitch of the last round 1 single crochet; then fasten the thread.

Having turned these figures fasten three together by means of the foundation-cord, as shown in the pattern. Cut 30 threads, each 5 inches long, and lay them together at half the length; then fasten in the under one of these 3 figures. The single fringe strands are joined by a round of * 7 chain, then 1 slip-stitch in the foundation-cord of the upper figure of the strand *. Repeat from * till all are joined. On the stitches of this round work 5 rounds, always putting the needle through both the upper threads of each stitch in the last round.

Collar with Cravat Bow, and Sleeves.

See illustrations, page 228.

This collar is of fine linen, double, worked in French embroidery stitch. The edge is cut out into small blocks, in the manner shown in the illustration, and button-hole stitched. A frill of Valenciennes edging is set under the blocks. A cravat bow, of which Fig. 64 gives one end, is fastened on the front with a button and button-hole. The sleeve is furnished with a cuff to match the collar.

JULIA'S ELOPEMENT.

SOON after leaving college it happened that circumstances, unnecessary here to explain, involved my living at Valparaíso, the principal sea-port of Chili. My social surroundings and local belongings were such as to open to me the doors of many very pleasant houses, where I was in the habit of meeting the best people in the city; but for a long time my progress in society was slow, owing to my ignorance of the language, and it was only by a close application to Ollendorf and other masters that I at last blundered into conversational ability. When I had arrived at this point, however, my education was taken up by the daughter of one of the families at whose house I used to visit. Under her tuition I rapidly improved, and in a short time my one lesson a week became two, then four, and at last six, till eventually I arrived at such a pitch of perfection in the Spanish language that I was able to tell her in words as impassioned as they were true that I loved her truly and unchangeably. What she said, or whether she said anything, on this occasion, I don't know, or can not remember; but the language of the heart, requiring no study, is easily learned, and I was satisfied with what I read in her face.

After this avowal on my part the lessons in Spanish became more and more neglected, till they were altogether abandoned, and their time occupied by music and other pursuits more in keeping with the state of our minds.

Julia Montajos were the two words blessed in their dear familiarity with her who owned my heart, and these words she was wont to scribble, with the tiniest of gold pencils, all over the back of my hand and the cuffs of my shirt as we sat in the drawing-room window to have the last light of the departing days. The former of these words I loved; the latter I was determined to change, and after getting Julia's consent to my intention I broached the matter to her mother. By her I was handed over to Señor Montajos, and by him I was very quickly disposed of. His daughter was too young; I was a Protestant; and though my means, according to the evidence I had given him, were ample for a young man, they were insufficient to maintain his daughter in that position to which she had been accustomed. I don't think there was any thing original in my answer to these objections. I pleaded that which thousands had urged before me, and said something about the possibility of Julia's growing older and my growing richer, if we were allowed time; and as regarded the difference of religion, I didn't see why that should trouble us more when married than it had done previous to that blessed ceremony. Probably my arguments were not very conclusive, for they utterly failed to change the opinion of Señor Montajos; but before our interview was ended he had given me permission to continue my visits at his house, and my intimacy with his family, in consideration of my promising that I would not endeavor to persuade Julia to act against her parents' wishes. This little difficulty in our path only served as fuel to the fire of our love, and we mutually resolved to leave no stone unturned in striving to obtain the consent of the forbidding parent.

A few months after my interview with Papa Montajos a sad break occurred in our happiness, in the form of a temporary separation. The Montajos family were going to Santiago, whither, at that time, it was impossible for me to follow, and during their absence Julia and I were forbidden to correspond. Señor Montajos, who was a perfect idiot in these matters, said that it was very likely when we were not constantly seeing one another we might find there were other people in the world as worthy of our respective consideration. He said he had seen the protestations of so many youthful lovers come to nothing that he did not altogether fear any serious result from ours, but felt quite sure that if I continued to mix in society, and enjoy myself as I had hitherto done, I should find many ladies whom I could admire as much as I did Julia. As to his daughter, who was for the moment carried away by what he was pleased to call my captivated manner, she would no doubt laugh at the whole thing before three months had passed.

We almost laughed at the absurdity of this idea; but reflecting that parents always were ignorant on these subjects, we said nothing to old Montajos, but made vows of eternal fidelity to one another, and mutually agreed that neither would dance a waltz or other round dance during this terrible separation. These oaths were sworn beneath the veranda of the Montajos's suburban villa, where they were staying previous to their departure; and here Julia laughingly remarked that it was such a convenient place to elope from that she believed any further trouble would drive her to that expedient. There was a spice of romance in an elopement, she added, that had a great fascination for her, and really—but here the conversation was cut short by the arrival of Señora Montajos, who announced the facts that the carriage had arrived and papa was waiting; and gathering her daughter to herself she bore her away, leaving me miserable and dejected.

During the absence of my friends I devoted my time to business and the acquisition of dollars; eschewing balls, tertulias, and other similar diversions; happy in my self-ordered seclusion till, after the lapse of a few months, some friendly gossip informed me that the fair Julia was by no means so self-denying, for not only was she the belle of Santiago, and enslaving the hearts of all—of course I knew that the poor wretches couldn't help falling in love with her—but that it was currently reported, and every where believed, she had given her promise to a certain Chilean gentleman whom she had met for the first time at Santiago. My first feeling on hearing this was to take my informant by the throat, for I couldn't believe what he had told me; but this desire was quickly followed by a burst of passion against the perjured Julia, for I couldn't disbelieve what every one else had credited. I debated in my own mind what course to pursue, for this new turn of events had, I conceived, released me from my promise to abstain from communicating with Julia, and I had almost decided on going to Santiago, when the same authority informed me that the Montajos family had returned.

Finding their house in the Almandral still closed, I concluded that they must be at the villa, and mounted my horse to ride there, with feelings that were not to be envied and are not easily described. As I cantered along the dusty road and sandy plain that lay between the town and my destination I wondered whether it could be true that she had so soon forgotten me. Perhaps, thought I, if I had not been so true to her she might have valued my love a little more, and, at least, my dismissal would have had a less mortifying appearance. But then, again, I may be giving myself uneasiness for nothing; it is natural that she should enjoy herself, and if I chose to give up parties there was no reason why she should. I remembered, too, that once or twice before I had evinced symptoms of groundless jealousy, for which she had laughingly reproved me. At any rate, I would hear the truth from her own lips, and if my fears were realized would leave the country forever.

In this humor I arrived at the villa, and hitching my horse to the garden gate crossed the lawn and entered the house by the veranda in which I had last spoken to Julia. How well I knew the room I thus entered, and how many pleasant hours I had spent within its Watteau-painted walls! It was vacant now; but on the table lay a work-frame, the needle sticking half-way through the canvas, and all the paraphernalia of worsted-work scattered about the floor. Some new freak of Julia's, I thought, as I picked up skein after skein on the end of my whip; as changeable in her work as in her affections. I wish to goodness somebody would come. I waited patiently for a little time, then hummed the air of "La Donna e mobile"—so appropriate at that moment—still no one came, and, determined to make some one hear, I turned to the piano and rattled away at a piece of music that was lying open on the instrument. It was the last waltz we had danced together at Valparaíso, and its melody recalled a thousand words and looks that were now like so many daggers in my breast. Before I had long played a footstep was audible in the passage, and the door gently opened. I made no move, but continued playing, for I hoped to make her speak first.

"Hist, José!" said some one, whose head was hardly inside the door; "you are too soon; it is hardly dusk, and it is not yet safe. Be quiet and do not play;" and the head was withdrawn.

"Señora!" I said, modulating my voice, without quite knowing why. "Julia! it is I. I think you must—"

"No! no!" said the lady, in a low voice, but with a quick, impatient tone. "Lopez must not see you. I can not come in. I was dressing when I saw your horse at the hedge, and came round to warn you. Remain quiet." And away went the head as the door was quietly closed.

"My name's not José," I said aloud; "and who the deuce is Lopez? That was surely Julia's voice. Confusion take José and Lopez, too, whoever they may be! but I will have one word before I go. Here, Julia! Julia!" opening the door as I spoke; "come down here; I want to speak to you. Julia! can you hear me?" No reply. It's evident the piano is the only means of bringing her down, I thought; so here goes at it again; and I sat down and pounded at the waltz as hard as if I had been playing at a Christmas gathering. This occupation was shortly interrupted by my seeing the shadow of a figure crossing the lawn, and hearing a slight tap at the window immediately afterward. I ceased playing as a man's voice said—the speaker being hidden from me by the folds of the curtain:

"Hist! Julia. It's me—José. Lopez is by the plantation. Look round the hedge. I will be back presently, and will keep quiet in the room here." And the shadow again crossed the windows, and disappeared in the direction whence it came.

It is Julia, I thought, the graceless little flirt; and as for José, I'll have an understanding with him or know the reason why; but I'll expose his treachery in the way it deserves. He would return shortly, and remain quietly in the room, José said. So will I, and then appear to tax Julia with her cold-hearted conduct.

I hadn't long to ruminate on the matter, for I heard a step coming along the passage, and therefore, if I wished to remain unobserved, must hide. There was a large antique cabinet in the room, which, being placed across the corner, formed a capital screen; and behind this I ensconced myself, just as she whose steps I had heard was entering the room. She sat down for a moment, and gave a deep sigh; then took up a dog—I supposed it to be, for I did not dare look out—and commenced talking to it, still in an undertone, as if afraid of being heard.

"Pauvrequita! Did it love its Julia? It is, it is a dear, dear love," and I heard her kissing it, "and Julia is fond of her little Pero she is—she is, Pauvrequita." This sort of thing continued for two or three minutes, when, putting the dog down, she went to the piano and commenced playing the identical waltz I had been performing.

"Now's the time," thought I, "for a look round. I shall see her back at any rate;" and I stooped to look around the side of the cabinet. The dog, however, when released from the arms of his owner had traversed the room in search of mischief, and had by this time arrived at my corner. Seeing my head round the corner, he greeted it with a growl and a bark, which he followed up by rushing at me. By way of getting rid of him, and under cover of the music, I kicked him gently in the ribs, and this made him yelp and run off. His cries stopped the piano for a moment, while Julia ran to him, seized him in her arms, and addressed many plaintive inquiries as to the cause of his grief; but as he could only lick his chops by way of reply, he was presently put down with an injunction not to hurt himself again, while Julia, uttering an exclamation of annoyance at José's being so long, resumed her seat at the piano, and began the waltz again. Once more I essayed a peep, and again the dog came at me, but the probable results of his ill-timed interference were warded by the arrival of José, who tapped at the window, and asked if he should enter.

"Si, si," was the reply, hardly waited for by the man, who, pushing the window aside, stepped into the room, and to my horror took Julia in his arms and pressed her to his heart. My first impulse was to rush out and knock him down, but a conviction had come upon me that I was not acting altogether a very dignified part, and I disliked the idea of letting her know that I had been playing the spy. The man, no less than the woman, who hesitates is lost, and the opportunity, or at least the right moment for acting, passed away.

"I have been long, dearest," said the Chilano. "I heard you playing the music we had agreed on together, but could only spare a moment when I came to the window."

"You did not come," said Julia, "since I have been playing. I did not hear you, and the time seemed long. I was afraid that—that—I don't know what I feared."

"Not that I had left without you, my own?" said the man; "but I came before, and you ceased playing as I tapped at the window."

"No; surely no!" "Yes, yes!" he replied, kissing her; "but it matters nothing. Yonder are our horses by the hedge. Vamos! we have no time to lose!"

"But that horse?" said Julia, alluding, I suppose, to the fact of there being a third.

"Oh, never mind that," said he, laughing. "I will tell you when we ride. Come!"

"Vamos!" said Julia, giving a long sigh and seizing Pero to give him a last kiss and assurances of unalterable affection—the wretched little coquette! "I am ready, dearest. Our Lady forgive me if I am doing wrong."

"Pooh!" said José. "It is not wrong, I swear to you, dearest—" and the rest was lost as they passed together through the open window.

As I emerged from my hiding-place I gave vent to my feelings of rage and despair, and cursed myself for not having prevented their going. I then thought of rousing the house, but discarded the idea as being a waste of time, and determined instead to start myself and ascertain at the cross-roads whether they took the Santiago road or sought the nearer shelter of Valparaíso. I mentioned the fact of my having tied my horse to the hedge that divided the garden from an outside paddock, and here I ran with all dispatch. My horse was gone; my bridle and saddle were there, but on the back of an animal widely different from mine, and one that, however useful in common with a plow, was exceedingly unlikely to overtake my own fast chestnut. There was no time to lament over the matter; so, with a mental reference to my spurs, I unhitched him from the stake and started off in chase of the fugitive Julia. In a series of elephantine gambols, the nearest approach to a gallop my steed could attain, I hurried on; and as I came to the cross-roads I became aware of another horseman following in my rear, shouting loudly as he came. On I went after the fugitives—who had taken the Valparaíso road—as fast as my cart-horse could carry me, determined to rescue Julia from the hands of him I felt sure was a villain, and glad that some one else in the house had missed her and was following in pursuit.

For a mile or two the chase continued, those ahead rapidly increasing their distance from me, but the horseman in the rear gradually lessening the space between us. Still shouting as he rode and gesticulating with frantic vehemence, this horseman came nearer and nearer till I could hear his cries: "Stop him! lasso him!" and then a full-bodied Spanish curse. I turned round on my horse as he galloped along and waved my hand to him, meaning thereby to assure him that it was all right—though it wasn't, for they had disappeared some little time before—but he who followed cared little for my assurances, for he shouted the louder and swore the harder as I attempted to comfort him, and urging his horse by voice and spur was at my side as we emerged from some broken ground on the confines of the town. I turned to my fellow-pursuer, and was about to proclaim the certainty of our yet finding the foolish girl and her audacious companion when, with a spring, the Chilano seized me by the collar, and, before I could recover from the suddenness of the attack, had dragged me from my saddle.

Raising the cry "Vigilantes,"* while a mob collected round my captured horse, the Chilean held me tightly against his saddle until several of the local policemen came galloping to the spot. It is not necessary, in Chili, to have committed any breach of the law to be taken prisoner by the Vigilantes. These light dragoons are easily satisfied, and if a row occurs in the street they care little whom they arrest, provided they arrest somebody. They know nothing of guilt or innocence; that is their officer's affair. If he chooses to reverse the decisions they have arrived at, well; it is his business, not theirs. In the present instance there was evidently some disturbance in which a Chilano and a foreigner were on opposite sides, so that their course was as clear as noon-day, and the foreigner was arrested without the slightest hesitation.

To the guard-house I was taken, and there I was told I must remain in custody until the morning. This was not such a trial as it at first sight appears, inasmuch as the officers of these guards usually keep open-house in their rooms, and kill the time of their guard with the society of such of their prisoners as their dignity will allow them to consort with. Oddly enough, however, I received no invitation to come over to the officers' guard-room, as I had heard from friends was sure to follow on a gentleman being arrested, and I determined to know why I was thus overlooked. After some difficulty the sergeant of the guard was sent to me and explained that he could not report me as a gentleman, my offense would not allow of it.

"Why not?" I asked. "Even suppose I was the individual you take me for, though she ran away from me, not with me, your officer's standard of morality must be very different from that of his comrades, if he would hesitate at a similar exploit."

"Señor!" the sergeant said, bristling up and pulling out his mustache as he spoke. "My officer is a gentleman. He would not pass such an insult had he heard it."

"I don't see the insult," I replied. "It is done every day, in Chili as well as elsewhere."

"If you had intended to return her, and had left word to that effect," the sergeant said, "it would have been different."

"Return her, you old scoundrel! What do you mean?"

He was no scoundrel, he said. He had thought me a gentleman, but I was evidently a brute.

"Well, how long am I to be kept here?"

I should learn that to-morrow, he replied.

"But in the mean time I want to see the officer."

"It can't be done," was the answer; and the sergeant turned to leave me, but hearing the chink of silver in my pocket, he hesitated; seeing the dollars in my hand, he halted; and finally, on conveying them to his own person, he relented, and went off to make known the fact of my arrest. In a short time he returned and desired me to follow him to the officer's room, where I found a party of three people: the officer himself, a friend of his who had dropped in to see him, and an officer of one of the English men-of-war, who had been arrested for disfiguring the countenance of one of the Vigilantes. The sergeant acted as master of the ceremonies, and introduced me to the party, and then departed to execute an order I had given him touching certain bottles of wine.

Presently the captives and their jailer sat down to cards. Whist was succeeded by poker, poker by monte; bottle after bottle was brought and consumed, till the first streaks of dawn breaking through the barred windows of the room led me to ask the cause of my captivity. The officer confessed his ignorance on the subject, but sent for the sergeant, who explained that Señor Lopez Montajos had given me in charge for stealing a mare out of his stables. All drew back in horror from the neighborhood of such a low thief, while I burst out laughing at the meaning of the sergeant's expression about returning her was thus explained. On recounting my version of the story, and giving my name and address, the officer of the guard politely informed me that I was at liberty until eleven o'clock, when the matter would be investigated and dismissed by the proper authority.

There was no difficulty in clearing myself before the magistrate, and my next thought was to learn more of my lost love. I could hear nothing during the few following days; but passing their house in the Almandral one evening I saw the shutters open and the windows light and bright as ever. The face of Elise, Donna Julia's German maid, beamed all over on seeing me, and almost cleared away my doubts and fears, for I knew well that she was the sympathizing repository of all Julia's secrets, and that she was, moreover, a staunch supporter of my interests. She was so glad to see me, she said. The Señora was in, and would be so pleased to see me again, and Donna Julia.

* Mounted police on duty about the town.

"What of her?" I asked.

"Oh, she'd been in such a way," Elise said, "because I hadn't called, that she had made the house unbearable; of course the Donna couldn't write to tell me she had returned, but—" and Elise implied the whole duty of a lover in this one word "but."

As Elise had said, Julia's mother was very pleased to see me, and told me that my honorable conduct during their absence had considerably abated the objections of Señor Montajos to my marrying his daughter. They had heard a great deal of me while they were away—(Mercy! I thought. Wait till they hear of the villa business!)—and hoped that they would see me as often as I could spare time from my business. Then, like a considerate and good-natured mother, she departed, to send Julia down in her stead.

Of the first half hour or so of my tête-à-tête with that young lady I shall say nothing whatever; we conversed on subjects concerning ourselves only; but later in the evening I took courage and told the story of my visit to the villa, demanding in return an explanation from her as to the whole matter.

It was very simple, she said. They had lent their villa to her uncle and aunt, the father and mother of her cousin Julia. José was an exceedingly nice fellow, to whom she would introduce me as soon as possible, and had been for some time deeply attached to her cousin. Her uncle was as stupid as her own papa had been—and might once more be, if I again doubted her truth, she added; and therefore she considered it her duty to offer José a little piece of advice, to the effect that if her cousin Julia was worth having she was worth taking. Her cousin Lopez, Julia said, was a disagreeable pig, who had once proposed to her, and had done all he could to prevent his sister's marriage with José Perea. It was the elopement of her cousin that I had so disgracefully watched, and she wished to know, she added, how I should have liked any one to have acted as I did, supposing we two had been making our escape?

I could only get out of this difficulty by saying that if I had succeeded in obtaining her I should not have cared had all Chili looked on. This little speech had a softening effect, but it did not prevent the question I knew must come. How came I to be so very silly as to mistake her cousin Julia, in whom I was totally uninterested, for her, who was every—that is, in whom I professed to have such a—in fact, who was an old friend?

"You might have continued your first expression, Julia darling; but the fact is, my love, you must remember it was in your house, in your own room. The evening was quite dusk, and then your cousin spoke low, and she is about your height and figure—"

"Oh!" said Julia, "if I exactly resemble every other girl in Chili—"

"What nonsense!" I said, as I put my arm a little farther round her waist. "There is no one in the world the least like you; but you must confess, Julia, that after the story I heard from that confounded chatterbox, Simpson, my mistake was very natural."

"Not at all natural," she thought. "But ah! that Simpson always was a pig." He was always her horror, and in her dislike of Simpson the little chagrin at my want of observation passed away; and in the subdued light of the quiet back drawing-room we sat and talked of the many things that people in like circumstances can ever find to talk about. Still I whispered, and still she listened, as I sat clasping her to my side, while the rattle of the cabs in the street was heard at greater intervals, and the quiet of night was tingling all things with its stillness. The bell of the great cathedral had tolled for midnight, and I had repeated one little question about a date in several forms, but Julia was silent, and hung her head, though she seemed to write the harder on my hand with her leadless pencil. Following a glance of her bright eyes I saw that the hieroglyphics she was tracing assumed a form and meaning, and in the motions of the pencil I read the answer she would not give me with her lips.

A short time after I was introduced to José Perea and his wife, to whom Julia had told the story of my hiding-place, and I was readily forgiven all, except the kick I had administered to Perea, whose cold, damp nose I was compelled to kiss as penance for my offense. Lopez and I have been introduced, and we bow and try to smile when we meet; but I can't help detesting him, and I believe the feeling is reciprocal.

PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

BETWEEN CHRISTMAS AND NEW-YEAR'S.

IN Paris there are two generations of children. Childhood, which merges in youth toward the age of twelve, begins again at about thirty, and continues for an indefinite period.

If you go through the garden of the Palais Royal in good season, one of these cold forenoons, you will see a score of street boys playing leap-frog under the bare trees, and at least two score of men, some appearing to be people of business and others people of elegant leisure, surrounding the group of frolicking truants. These gentlemen will stand by the half hour watching the game. It is evident that they belong to the class of children of thirty years; and if, by some magic, I could suddenly reduce these forty adult bodies to juvenile proportions again, they would, I verily believe, jump into the line and take their turn at the run and leap, without the slightest change in the expression of their countenances.

If an American lady draws out her watch at Leroy's or Charpentier's, and asks to be shown some ladies' watches of "about that size," showing her chronometer, the clerk says, politely, "Ah! that is not a lady's watch. No, Madame, it is the smallest size for gentlemen. The American ladies will wear that size because they will have exact time-keepers; but the French ladies will have a pretty bijou."

The season of Christmas, which brings many pleasant scenes to all who love children, is peculiarly full of attractions to these young eyes in old heads. Each shop, whatever its line of business, makes room in its windows for gifts appropriate to the season. Some of the great dry-goods stores devote a room or two to a display of fancy goods, where their customers can buy almost any thing, from a porcelain vase to a pocket-almanac, at wonderfully low prices.

The houses for the sale of "religious articles" signalize the week of Christmas by the display of "Crèches," or Christmas-mangers. These shops do not flourish on the Boulevards. They are to be found in the by-streets, and especially on the left bank of the Seine, in the centre of the district where so many abbeys and convents have stood. Imagine yourself approaching a shop in some narrow street, under the shadow of a neighboring church-tower. A crowd of men and women, with animated countenances, stand watching something within the window. There are some little children within the circle of the crowd, and others on the outside are vainly endeavoring to find a loophole between the skirts of the adult spectators.

If you are tall enough to look over the shoulders of others, or have patience enough to await your turn in the circle, you may see, in the centre of a large show-window, elevated upon a table, a lifelike wax figure of a child, whose rosy body lies, in the attitude of sleep, in a nest-like bed of the choicest wheat straw, so arranged that the beards of the grain radiating symmetrically in every direction form a sort of halo around the sleeping infant. Around him stand appropriate figures. At the foot a large statue of Mary; at the head one of Joseph; on either hand figures of various hues, representing the Magi, and in front some admirably executed statuettes of oxen.

The face and figure of the Infant are so well done that they seem rather to belong to the arts of Sculpture and Painting than to the mechanical processes of moulding wax and dressing dolls. The imitation of a sleeping babe is so perfect that it seems as if it might awake and open its eyes. In a moment, while you look, the eyes, moved by interior mechanism, do open, and the little one raises its hands and stretches forth the arms, in the attitude of greeting the mother who stands over it. After a moment the arms sink gently back again, the eyes close, and it seems to have fallen asleep. Smaller and ruder figures are made in great quantities and at all prices, even as low as ten or fifteen cents, so that every household may have its infant Christ.

At this season, for many years, it has been the custom to allow the poor people from the older quarters of Paris to set up little booths on the Boulevards for the sale of toys and gifts during the holidays. These little, temporary shops, called "barracks," are placed at short distances along the outer edge of the sidewalk, with their backs to the carriage-way. This year the city authorities have provided a uniform set of ornamental boxes for this purpose, upon the fashionable Boulevards, instead of the unsightly structures, extemporized with rough boards, boughs of trees, and old canvas that formerly appeared, and which are still seen, in the less frequented Boulevards.

Each of the new barracks is a double shop, about as large as a city horse-car. The sloping roof is decorated front and back with a scroll-sawed cornice. The color is very light green striped with dark green, in imitation of battenning. The officers having charge of letting them are instructed to give the preference to the industrious poor, who may thus eke out their earnings in this hard season by a little share in the profits of holiday traffic.

During the fortnight allotted the Boulevards present an animated scene, which would have a fresh interest even to those who enjoyed them during the most brilliant days of the Exposition. A dense crowd slowly and politely elbow their way along the broad walk between the shops and the barracks. Every body looks at every thing; and indulgent parents, who are blessed with very acquisitive children, become painfully burdened with distended pockets and fragile toys sticking out from their careful embrace.

Each tenant of the barracks has his own line of business. One offers porte-monnaies, where a boy having thirty sous can buy for twenty-nine an admirable wallet to keep the one remaining in. Another sells photographs, another colored prints, another dolls, dressed and undressed. Table and kitchen-ware for doll's use; wash-stands, bookcases, and secretaries for the same; ivory carvings, worsted work, cheap jewelry, stationery and diaries, and fifty other little trades, each have numerous repositories. The vacant spaces between the barracks are occupied by itinerant dealers, who stand shouting to the passers-by, and holding up their wares to view, crying dolls or mechanical engines, or cheap laces, an imitation diamond which will cut glass, price three sous, a cap for candles to prevent them from dripping, and other novelties such as every family is supposed to need.

In accordance with custom, the military bands of Paris met on the last day of the year, an hour after noon, to serenade the imperial family, in the court-yard of the Tuileries. Upon the central pavilion, known as the Clock Tower, the front of the balcony appertaining to the broad middle window on what we should call the second story, was hung with drapery of crimson velvet ornamented with gold; and when the clock struck one the great window-sashes were swung open inward, and there appeared upon the balcony the Emperor in his scarlet band and cocked hat, the Empress in a white hat with fluttering ribbons, and between them the little Prince Imperial. Various members of the imperial household stood behind them, or at other windows of the palace, watching the scene.

The bands, which were assembled before the Emperor, approached one at a time, and played beneath the window the piece selected, and then were successively dismissed. The music was of course very fine, and was enjoyed by a crowd of spectators on the sidewalk and under the Triumphal Arch without the iron railing of the court-yard. The cheering of the musicians when the Emperor took off his hat, or clapped his white gloves in token of special approval, was quite audible to the spectators (among whom were many officers and soldiers), who did not, however, volunteer participation in the homage paid.

The following law case was recently tried in a court of justice here. It illustrates one phase of Parisian life, and also the season of the great Exposition:

A young woman brought suit to recover from the keeper of her lodging-house a sum which she had lent him. He admitted the debt, but claimed to set off his charge against her for the hire of her room. The advocate of the fair plaintiff in turn admitted to the judge that she had lodged in a room in the house of the defendant; "but," said he, "he does not tell you the circumstances. Your Honor must know that this unhappy chamber is let to two different persons at the same time; and that at five o'clock every morning, whatever may be the weather, made-moiselle was obliged to rise and go forth, so as to surrender possession to the second tenant, who is a baker's boy, and sleeps in it during the day."

The keeper of the lodging-house frankly admitted this.

"Then," said the judge, "it would seem that your beds never grow cold. Yours is certainly a model lodging-house!"

"Ah, but your Honor, you understand. During the Exposition, you know."

"The Exposition is over!"

"Yes; but there is still a great crowd in Paris."

"Perhaps so. But this young lady can not owe you for a whole bed, because she did not use but the half. Allow the defendant for half a bed."

MRS. TYPESET'S DIARY.

Monday.—A very pleasant little variation in the ordinary mode of celebrating a "silver wedding" was that recently adopted by a gentleman who perceived that wedding celebrations had grown into a grand begging system. He was not in needy circumstances, and did not care to place himself under obligations to all his acquaintances. So, when the twenty-fifth anniversary came, he sent to each of his particular friends a silver dollar of the coinage of 1867, on which was engraved the initials of himself and wife, and the date of their marriage. The idea was novel—and as to the gift, silver dollars, with any kind of an inscription on them, are curiosities in these days.

A great deal is said about the extravagance and frivolity of woman. Undoubtedly true it is in many, yes, in numerous cases. But there is another side to the question. In those social circles where women extravagantly indulge in costly silks, and laces, and jewels, do not their reproachful lords equally indulge in expensive cigars, and wines, and club arrangements generally? It seems to me there's blame on both sides of the house, usually. And, at least, it may be truly said, that when any emergency arises which really demands woman's aid, it is, with rare exceptions, cheerfully met by her. A sensible, well-bred woman, in whatever position in life, will not shrink from self-sacrifice, if she fairly realizes that her husband or father is over-burdened with expenses or labors which it is in her power to lessen.

A very singular superstition still exists in France, which, although the nineteenth continues to be the most enlightened of centuries, justifies the remark of a Frenchman, that it is as yet only lighted by a candle. Recently fifty-seven Parisian housekeepers presented a petition to the Prefect of the Seine, begging of him, in his justice and kindness, the suppression of every number 13 in Paris, and the substitution in each case of No. 11 bis. The petition occasioned great amusement at first. But some time afterward some adjacent lots of land were sold at auction. One lot bringing but a very low price while the others went at a high rate, the reason was asked. "Ah!" was the reply, "the house built on the last lot of ground will bear the number 13, and every house afflicted with this sinister figure loses a fifth of its value."

The young lady—Miss Dunphy—who, with unwearied care and labor, has for more than a year been attempting to reclaim idiots from their unfortunate state of mental imbecility, proves herself wonderfully successful. Her school on Randall's Island contains sixty-two children. Forty-two of these have been under the patient, gentle instruction of this lady for about twelve months, and a comparison of their present condition with that of those yet untaught shows that the labor spent has not been in vain. The principal object in view is to increase the capacity of these unfortunates for useful occupations. The most simple means are used to awaken the intellect, to educate the senses, and to cultivate the affections. Already some have made such progress that they seem to be other beings from what they were a year ago. This is indeed a labor of love.

Tuesday Eve.—Long ago I remember hearing some one tell a story of a pretty, interesting creature who had spent all her life in the city up to the time of her marriage. Then she went to live in the country; but she was quite thrown away upon a rustic life, and, poor thing, was seized with melancholia, and nothing seemed to do her any good. Music and bled chicken didn't cheer her; whilst and calves-foot jelly made her worse; novels and Iceland moss gave her the creeps. The doctors were puzzled, and declared medicines were useless, and she must die unless some new means were discovered for keeping her alive. In a paroxysm of devotion her husband on bended knees implored her to confide in him and think of something that would do her good. There was a long struggle before she could speak, but at last the interesting sufferer confessed that "a good look at the shops might soothe her dying moments!" The sweet invalid had actually been pluing away for want of a glimpse at those elegant silks and laces, those Cashmere and real India shawls, and other delightful details of dress, in which first-class dry-goods shops abound. Nineteen yards of moire antique that could "stand alone" restored her mind to its proper balance.

This incident recurred to my mind while out shopping to-day. Without meaning myself in particular, ladies in general, or at least a large class who perhaps have nothing better to do, certainly have a morbid passion for "shopping"—with money, if they have it, without it, if they haven't. Some ladies "go out shopping" with no idea of what they want to buy; some make a practice of examining specimens of the article they desire in twenty or more different shops before purchasing; some go the next day after they have made a purchase to ascertain whether they have made a good bargain. Alas for the clerks when such customers enter! What wonder if sometimes they tire of pulling down their goods, and forget to be courteous to one who knows not what she wants, or who wants nothing? It is quite true that a lady often needs to examine many qualities or styles of goods before making her selection—it is certainly her privilege so to do; but she should have some idea of what she wants, and of the price she is willing to pay for it, before asking for one thing after another to be spread before her. Otherwise she may find it a help frankly to tell the one who is serving her that she wants to look over the goods and see if there is any thing she would like to buy! If he is at leisure, and understands his business, he will be of immense service!

As I took my seat in the car this morning Uncle Fred, who was with me, secretly touched my elbow, and gave me a significant wink. What it was I couldn't tell, and seeing me quite uncomprehending, he whispered "Gloves!" I looked at mine, and discovered nothing amiss—his were all right—and—

"Quite a dressing-room!" continued Uncle Fred at this crisis in my reflections.

And, sure enough, looking through the car—we were near one end—I saw no less than four ladies and one gentleman tugging away at their kid gloves. Evidently the car had come along a trifle too early for them. And really, from my point of sight, the view was slightly ludicrous; for two of the ladies appeared to have new gloves, about one number too small, and I watched them, in anxiety, lest they (the gloves, I mean!) should be rent. Resolved, to put my gloves on before entering a car, if possible!

And here I am reminded of a story—as to its veracity I can not vouch—can only "tell the tale as it was told to me." A young married lady of this city, possessing a fair amount of personal charms, was riding the other day with her mother in a car. In rearranging some portion of her dress a pin was needed, and an affable specimen of the genus homo presented the article desired. In the next morning's paper the lady read to her amazement: "Will the young lady who borrowed a pin on the car yesterday, meet her adored admirer to-morrow at —, or send a note to H.," etc. The lady's husband accompanied her to the place of the rendezvous, and politely returned the pin his wife had borrowed.

Wednesday Eve.—Heard Ristori in "Elizabeth" this afternoon. Her representation of Elizabeth's character is extraordinary—vivid, powerful, and historically truthful—the acting is beyond comparison. Yet I like her far better as Marie Antoinette, the unfortunate queen, than the loving, devoted wife and mother, than as the successful queen, proud, ambitious, and selfish, lacking the most beautiful womanly qualities.

Read a paragraph to-night headed "Twelve Ways of Committing Suicide." That which attracted my special attention was, "Convincing to keep in a continual worry about something or nothing."

I have just been reading some items respecting the size of London, which give a vivid idea of its immensity. The streets of that great city, if placed in a line, would extend, so it is said, from Liverpool to New York. They are lighted by 660,000 gas lamps, which consume every twenty-four hours about 13,000,000 cubic feet of gas. 44,383,328 gallons of water are used per day. The traveling public sustain 6000 cabs and 1500 omnibuses, besides all the other sorts of vehicles. 2400 doctors find employment in London. It contains more than 350,000 houses, and 852 churches. It is also computed that the average extension of London is at the rate of two miles of finished buildings per day.

But Jeddo, the capital of Japan, contains the vast number of 1,500,000 dwellings, and 5,000,000 human souls. Many of the streets are 19 Japanese miles in length, which is equivalent to 22 English miles. The commerce of Jeddo far exceeds that of any other city in the world, and the sea along the coast is constantly white with sails of ships.

Thursday Eve.—Enjoyed a treat to-day in examining the paintings in the private gallery of Mr. John Taylor Johnston. I know little about paintings, to be sure, but I like to study them quietly—a few at a time. This gallery is a very pleasant one, and the collection choice. Among those that especially pleased me were "Moonlight," by L. De Winter; "Moonlight on Saguenay River," by Gignoux; "Sunset in Vermont," by Church; and "A Misty Morning," by J. M. Hart and A. F. Tait. None of them were large, but they were beautiful. A large painting by Müller, "Roll Call of the Last Victims of the Reign of Terror," was one to be studied long and carefully. "The Letter-Writer of Venice," also by Müller, was very pretty. There were many fine paintings—"The Wounded Poacher," "Return of the Harvesters," "Kathrina," and others equally deserving of study—but I never attempt to examine every thing in a single visit to a picture-gallery—it is unsatisfactory and confusing. We saw Church's "Twilight in the Wilderness" in the parlor, where also were many beautiful paintings. "Niagara," by the same artist, has a place here in general, but is now on exhibition in the National Academy of Design, among the paintings recently returned from the Paris Exposition.

A novel style of arranging a dinner-table for a fashionable party is reported. It purports to come from the "Hub." To say nothing of the silver and cut-glass ware, at the plate of each guest was a prettily-arranged bouquet of the choicest hot-house flowers, held together by a cord of white ribbon, and set in a neat cut-glass holder. These were connected around the entire table by a leafy chain of the Smilax, which is in such demand for fashionable occasions that at the horticultural stores a dollar a yard is asked for it. The novel and highly artistic effect produced by the combination of colors—white table-cloth, sparkling glass, and brilliant silver, variegated bouquets, backed and bound together with the curving chain of green—has made the style the rage in upper-tendom for a season.

Scarfs with Oriental Embroidery.

THESE scarfs are made of a strip of cashmere, a yard and a quarter long and a quarter of a yard wide, embroidered with colored silks. The scarf is then sewed together on the wrong side and turned, the ends gathered, and finished with silk tassels. The first scarf shown in the illustration is of white cashmere, embroidered, after the pattern given in Fig. 32, with different colored silks in chain stitch. The second scarf is of lilac cashmere; the ends are embroidered with a border and figures, the design of which is given in Fig. 31. The figures are embroidered in satin stitch with colored silks, and the border in satin stitch, point russe, and chain stitch.

Double Button-Hole Stitch.

THIS new kind of stitch is used like the ordinary button-hole stitch for an edge, as well as for ornamental embroidery. The illustration clearly shows the manner of execution. Two stitches are needed for a knot, the first being taken in the manner of a common button-hole stitch; then, to make the second, throw the thread upward in a loop, place the needle in the position shown in the illustration, whereby the thread lies in a loop under the point of the needle, and complete the stitch by drawing the needle through. As a matter of course, this stitch can be wrought either in a straight line or in scallops.

Dress for Girl from 10 to 12 Years old.

THIS dress is of blue reps and blue silk. The skirt is gored with a train, and is trimmed round the bottom with a bias fold of silk an inch and a half wide. The pocket lapels are also of silk. The waist is plain and high-necked, the under part of reps, simulating a bodice, and the upper part of silk, and is trimmed with white pearl buttons and blue silk fringe. The waist is cut from No. III., Figs. 12-16, the bodice reaching to the straight line in Figs. 12 and 14.

MATERIALS for the pair: $\frac{3}{8}$ oz. red $\frac{3}{8}$ oz. black zephyr worsted, $\frac{1}{4}$ oz. black Shetland worsted.
This serves at the same time as a trimming for the boot. The lower part is knitted of red, and the upper of black zephyr worsted. Eighteenfold loops of black Shetland wool are knitted in with the top, which is reversed. Beginning on the lower edge, cast on 72 stitches of the red wool; knit 50 rounds, alternately 3 stitches knitted, 3 purled; then splice on the black wool and knit 27 rounds, whereby the above-mentioned loops are knitted in as follows: Lay an 18-thread loop on the out in the shape of a heart in front. The sleeves have a puffing at the top, the pattern of one half of which is given in Fig. 56, the gathers being from \times to \odot . Below the puffing the sleeves are close to the elbow, where they are terminated by two deep frills of lace. The puffing is trimmed with a bias fold of the same material as the dress. A white lace fichu and a belt and bow of brown silk complete the waist.

Knit Hood for Child Under 2 Years old.

back; * knit 2 stitches with the zephyr worsted; bring the loop on the right side and again knit two stitches, thus forming a loop about $\frac{1}{2}$ inch long; bring it again on the other side and repeat from *. In the following round the position of the loops must be changed. This brings the loops on the right side of the reverse top. The diagonal sides of the reverse may be sewed together from underneath.

the front border, and when thrown back forms a pretty ornament. The pattern is worked of blue split zephyr in point de diamant, and is provided with a plainly-knit lining of white split zephyr. The border is knitted double in white zephyr. Fig. 60 gives the pattern of one half the hood. Cut from this figure, and sew the margins of the segments together from 52 on 52 to 51. In knitting, the work must be narrowed along the seam. Begin by casting on 44 stitches for the front of the head-piece. On this foundation knit 52 rounds in point de diamant. Slip the first stitch of each round; knit the last. Point de diamant is worked as follows: 1st and 2d round knitted; 3d, purled; 4th round, alternately make 1, knit 2 together. These 4 rounds form a stitches of the lining with the 2 corresponding stitches of the outside with double blue wool, thus making of 4 1 stitch; this draws the head-piece in somewhat. Knit below 2 rounds in double blue wool, and put the stitches on a thread. The front border should be sewed to the lining. For the cape, cast on 80 stitches, beginning at the lower edge. Knit 12 rounds with white and 16 with blue wool in point de diamant, and take the stitches on a thread. Then collect on the needles the foundation stitches, and knit the lining of the cape, 4 rounds in point de diamant, then 24 plain; join the outside and lining of the cape in the same manner as those of the head-piece, and afterward knit 2 plain rows in double blue wool; take the stitches on a thread. Now crochet together the stitches of the cape and head-piece with the blue wool, and at the same time sew the slanting sides of the cape to the remaining lower part of the front border. Both this and the cape are ornamented with a row of chain-stitch scallops of blue wool, formed by 1 single crochet in 1 border stitch alternating with 5 chain stitches.

It remains only to form the veil. This is knitted backward and forward in an open-work design of white wool, and is finished with a lace of blue wool. Cast on 47 stitches and knit 45 rounds as follows: 1st round, alternately make 1 and purl 2 together. The remaining rounds are only the repetition of this, taking care, however, to purl 1 with the made stitch preceding it. Narrow by missing the last stitch of each round and making none at the beginning.

In forming the lace, knit also to the missed stitches. Cast on 11 stitches and knit as follows: 1st round—Knit 2 together, make 1, knit 2, make 1, knit 5, make 1, knit 2.

2d round—Slip 1, knit 2, make 1, knit 1, knit 3 together, knit 1, make 1, knit 2 together twice (1 stitch and 1 made stitch each time), make 1, purl 1.

3d round—Knit 2 together (1 stitch and 1 made stitch), make 1, knit 2, make 1, knit 5, make 1, knit 3.

4th round—Slip 1, knit 3, make 1, knit 1, knit 3 together, knit 1, make 1, knit 2 together twice, make 1, knit 1.

5th round—Knit 2 together, make 1, knit 2, make 1, knit 5, make 1, knit 4.

6th round—Slip 1, cast off the next 3, knit 1, make 1, knit 1, knit 3 together, knit 1, make 1, knit 2 together twice, make 1, purl 1.

The lace is worked by repeating these 6 rounds. The veil is fastened to the hood under the border. Through the stitches between the cape and head-piece draw a chain crochet-cord worked in blue wool, and finished by a tassel at each end.

MRS. FELIX'S FOLLOWER.

MRS. LUMPKIN and myself you already know. Mrs. Felix is our next-door neighbor, and a superior, well-informed, discouraging woman, who has a quarrel with the age and a friendship for my wife, whom she constantly pounces upon and extinguishes—conversationally I mean.

It was to this lady that my wife incautiously remarked, as she laid down the morning paper, "Poor things!"

"Why poor?" instantly inquired Mrs. Felix, in her pouncing manner.

Mrs. Lumpkin, very much thrown out, murmured something about "sad case."

"Because," continued Mrs. Felix, decisively, "if you should say vicious things, stupid things, drunken things, irreclaimable things, you would be right. Whereas now you are mistaken, and simply out of the kindness of your charitable heart are yielding to one of the most mischievous tendencies of the age."

"But four children and no work," urged my wife, coloring a little as she caught my eye over the edge of the paper.

"Precisely," answered Mrs. Felix, briskly. "It is on those 'four children and no work' that I take my stand. Why? Because I recognize in them the popular, canting excuse for crime. This is the most charitable age ever known, because it is the laziest. Every thing has been made easy for it, till it is a confirmed sluggard, and unable even to be indignant. A woman has tried to poison herself and her four children! Shocking! 'Oh, but they had no work, and were starving!' Poor things!" says the age, tumbling back on its pillow. Never mind about the crime. The label is satisfactory, and it is bolted—without investigation."

"But, Mrs. Felix—"

"My dear," cut in Mrs. Felix, briskly, "I have investigated. The idea of no work looks reasonable on the surface; but is it reasonable? Say that this woman was a coat-maker. I saw last week in a down-town store a placard reading 'Fifty coat-makers wanted.' Or suppose that she is a sewing-machine operator. Is there not always a notice in some window demanding such operators? Say she is a seamstress. Why I want a seamstress, you want one, dozens of ladies want one. Suppose that she could do none of these things. How many families want a dress-maker, or a good, efficient maid? Just think how many things she might have done. She might have taught school, or kept shop, or filled brass letters, or made hoop-skirts, or hair-nets, or candy-bags, or pasted labels, or rolled cigars, or made bead trimming—why I can't recall the names of half of the different kinds of work that she might have done if she had tried. And for my part I believe that to think there is not work enough for all is an insult to God; as if you should say that he sent mouths into the world and not bread to fill them."

"But she might have—"

"My dear Mrs. Lumpkin!"—Mrs. Felix was quite determined that my wife should never finish a sentence—"you are so charitable! But just suppose now that there really was no work. Not a situation in this great city that she could have filled. What do you say to the charitable institutions? So much is said about the four children. Why not have taken them to the Half Orphan Asylum? She was friendless? Why not go to the homes for the friendless? She was starving? There were the missions and the ragged schools, and Mr.—I forget his name—who gives away dinners to the poor; and all the houses from which a beggar is never sent away empty, and the police-stations. There were plenty of resources besides that laudanum; and to say otherwise of a great Christian city like this is to say that Satan is stronger than Christ."

My wife looked quite confounded at having committed herself to such frightful doctrines, and Mrs. Felix rose triumphant.

"Last of all, my dear," she said, "there is faith. If this woman had been, what every woman should be, in a Christian community, and had exercised faith and enough of it, she would have found relief somehow."

My wife had not courage left for even a flicker, but went out entirely—of the argument. Mrs. Felix went out also; that is, she stepped from our door to her door—that is, she would have done so but for an astounding accident. As she left our steps she discovered that she had forgotten her own name and residence. She stopped with her hand on her forehead. She turned about and about. She looked up and down the street. She walked first to one corner and then to another. She repeated to herself all the names that she could recall; alphabetically and then at random, hoping to be struck by the familiar sound. She went likewise over all the numbers that she could recollect. So, counting and looking up at the doors, she found herself opposite her own sister's house. Something familiar in it appealed to Mrs. Felix, and she rang the bell.

Mrs. Felix wore a merino wrapper, a child's shawl that she had picked up and thrown around her, and no bonnet. She was frightened, and panting, and wild, and uncertain. Her sister's maid naturally did not recognize her; and when Mrs. Felix, on being asked her name, stammered, looked over her shoulder, and said that she did not know,

"I thought as much," answered the waitress, pertly, and, shutting the door, reported, "only a drunken woman, ma'am."

Mrs. Felix walked quietly away. She knew that she was shut out, but she forgot to wonder—she was wondering so much more who she herself could be. For a like reason she neither saw the curious glances of people whom she met or the way that she went, but turned here and crossed there without purpose or reason. But at length it did occur to her that she was followed by a strange man, a very odd-looking person, whom she could not describe to herself even while she stood looking at him.

Mrs. Felix stopped. The person stopped. "You are cold and hungry," he said. "Why do you not get work?"

"Work!" said Mrs. Felix, dreamily. "Work! Yes! that must be the thing I have lost."

She turned about and saw a placard in a shop window: "Wanted—Fifty coat-makers."

It was a little shop—so small that it is quite impossible to imagine what it could have done with the fifty coat-makers if it could have got them. But it had not found them. There was no one there except a large, unpleasant man.

"Want work, do you?" he answered, roughly. "Show us what you can do, then"—pushing toward her a half-finished coat.

Mrs. Felix took up the coat, and saw her follower nodding at her from the door.

"Got work at once?" he said. "Of course you have. There is work enough for all; and the cry of 'no work' is the cant of the vicious and idle."

"Got work? Of course you have," repeated Mrs. Felix to herself as she took the first stitch; and the words repeated themselves over and over till they shaped themselves into a sort of tune, to which she stitched—"Got work—of course you have." How many times did it sound in her ears, and how many hours had passed, when the big man snatched her work from her hands?

"Call this work, do you? There, that will do! Call this sewing? What's the matter? You have ruined it, that's all. Will you get out now?"

Mrs. Felix got out, and met—her follower.

"So many kinds of work for women," he observed, in the quick, jerking way that seemed peculiar to him. "Letter-filling, hoop-skirt making, hair-nets, bead-work, label pasting. Why, I can't recall half the names. And plenty of ladies who want fine seamstresses—up town."

Mrs. Felix looked doubtfully up the street.

"Up town," he repeated, with a wave of the hand. "Inquire at the houses. Dozens of ladies, you know, who want seamstresses."

"Dozens of seamstresses," repeated Mrs. Felix, who was not only cold and hungry, but oppressed by a curious sensation of having been cold and hungry for several days till she was all cold and hunger, so that it was really a pity that she should creep up town a mile or two, and drag herself up and down the pitiless steps just to learn that the lady was out, or that the lady had a seamstress, or that she might come next week, or to have the door shut promptly in her face before she could ask her question. Hungry and cold, Mrs. Felix knocked at the doors of thirty-six different houses. Hungrier, and colder, and repulsed from them all, Mrs. Felix, coming down the thirty-sixth flight, felt a sharp, desperate pang at her heart. She was still in that uncertainty about her name and her former self, but the fog had cleared away from her brain. The instinct of self-preservation was stirring within her, and sharpening her faculties for what she at last comprehended was a struggle for life.

"Plenty of ladies who are in want of dress-makers," squeaked her follower's voice at her elbow.

"Do I look like a dress-maker?" cried Mrs. Felix. "Can I receive ladies without a home or a name? Can I even get into their houses? Do they not shut the door in my face before I utter the first word?"

"What! you mean to say, you dare to hint, that you can not find work; as if you should say that God sends mouths into the world and no bread to fill them," cried her follower, winking around the corner as if the sight of her was really too much for a man of principle.

Mrs. Felix looked across the street, and saw a tall sign-board standing by a door: Intelligence Office. Servants Wanted. She crossed over, and met her follower in the door.

"Right!" he said, nodding. "Hundreds of families in want of good girls. Work enough for all, you see, in there!" motioning Mrs. Felix to a room in which twenty or thirty women were sitting. All these women were talking together. Every few moments an old man came in and shouted, "Silence there!" Between times a thin man appeared in the doorway and exclaimed, "A waitress wanted for the country!" "A cook wanted in a family of nine!" and at every new call Mrs. Felix saw her follower nodding at her vehemently—but of what use was it to nod? Nobody wanted her. One thought that she looked sickly, and another that she looked unusual, and another that she must be fretful. And, by-and-by, even the office did not want her any longer; and, shutting up its doors, shut Mrs. Felix out into the street again.

Mrs. Felix's knees gave out, but her brain was busier than ever.

"I won't die," she said to herself. "I am not stupid. I have my wits. There can be no need of starving in a great Christian city full of food!" And she said it the more strongly because of an awful fear, cold at her heart, that somebody else before her, who was not stupid, and not wicked, still might have starved in this great Christian city full of food.

"Right again!" chirruped her pertinacious follower. "To say otherwise would be to suppose that God sometimes sends mouths into the world for which there is no bread."

If any thing could make the fear press yet more coldly on Mrs. Felix's heart it would have been the grin with which he pronounced these words.

"There are charitable institutions!" exclaimed Mrs. Felix, struggling with herself, and, she vaguely felt, with him.

"Yes, there," he answered, pointing up at a tall house near them.

Mrs. Felix looked, and recognized a Home for the Friendless. Mrs. Felix was friendless; but she had been a member, a leading member, among the managers of this asylum, and knew that no friendless person is admitted there without a letter or recommendation from some friend.

"And there are the missions," pursued Mrs. Felix's follower. "And the ragged schools. And Mr.—I forget his name—who gives away dinners. And the police-stations."

"Where?" asked Mrs. Felix; but he was gone.

It was now dark. The cold had grown with every hour, and it was now so intense that the flaring lamps showed few passengers in the bleak streets. Mrs. Felix had twice walked up and down town. She had not tasted food all that day. She was chilled and bitten with cold, till she felt herself turning stupid; and she had still that feeling of having been so chilled and starved through other long days. And she had been refused and turned away all day; and though nobody was speaking to her, or thinking of her now, she still felt that she was being refused and turned away by all the world, and bidden to slink away in some hole, and die in the quiet and dark like the outcast that she was.

You don't understand it? The principle is very simple. If you whirl about till you are dizzy, do you not still feel the whirl when you have come to a stand? Remember it, for it has driven more men and women into the river than starvation has done.

Mrs. Felix set out to find the charitable institutions; not with any real hope, but urged by the necessity of doing something. As she walked, she began to suspect that she was going mad, for whenever she met a porter with nicely-wrapped bundles she saw straight through them, and read in them such receipts as these:

Received—For 10 yards of silk, at $24 the yard, the rent of a poor widow, just turned out of doors, with four children.

Received—For a lace parasol, valued at $150, the heart's blood of three poor seamstresses.

Received—For a ring valued at $1000, the lives of ten children, and the pure air, cleanliness, and comfort, belonging to forty other people, residing in the tenement house No. 13 Blank Street.

Received—For 3 yards of lace, at $5 the yard, the blankets and winter flannels of a poor little shivering consumptive.

Mrs. Felix turned her head aside, not to read any more. The price of one yard of that lace would save her from starvation. The cost of one yard of that silk would procure her a home. And the thought made her almost as hungry as the steam from the gates and areas. A mist came before her eyes, and she fell. She slowly got up again, saying to herself that she could go no further to find the charitable institutions of the Christian city. There was an open door near her, and a dark hall and stairway, across which came an occasional warm blast of steam, and Mrs. Felix crept in there. People passed, but nobody saw her, for she crouched in the dark, and though once or twice she opened her mouth to beg, something choked her and the words would not come.

The steps on the street and the stairs grew fewer. The shops shut themselves up, and the lower stories of houses went to sleep, and then the upper stories put themselves out, and the city tucked itself under its blankets, and none but the idle, the vicious, Mrs. Felix and two little boys, not so old as her boy at home, were left out in the night. And in dozing, and shuddering, and starting, and nestling closer for warmth, and dozing again, the night passed away.

In the morning you should have seen the bland, benevolent, cozy, respectable, well-informed, highly-principled Mrs. Felix! Shivering, wild-eyed, disheveled, stiff, starved—what evil indications could you not have found in her face!

Mrs. Felix started out again. It is the first business of every shed, office, area, box, and wagon that can afford shelter to houseless vagrants to kick them out in the morning, and Mrs. Felix went with the rest.

Perhaps evil associations had already corrupted good manners, for Mrs. Felix made no more attempts to find work. She did beg once or twice, and one man gave her a penny, and another a two-cent piece, and she bought some bread and ate it, but chiefly she hung about the fruit and meat stalls, eying them greedily, and thought how close the loaves were to her hand, and a dozen standing, till—

"Do you really mean to starve, and prove that Satan is stronger than Christ?" squeaked her follower, darting at her from behind the lamp-post.

Mrs. Felix made an effort and roused herself.

"Starving!" she repeated, "so I am! Starving and freezing!"

Just then she saw a policeman and a way of relief together. Eying the guardian of morality she walked up to a fruiterer's stand, and when she saw that he was looking directly at her, stole a handful of oranges under his very nose, and laughed aloud. She had secured an entrance into an institution that is always open, and that has fire, meat, and beds for its inmates. But oh! the grief, the despair, the righteous indignation of her follower, pouncing upon her for the last time.

"Oh! why not have had faith? Why not have been what every woman should be in a Christian land, and then if you had exercised proper faith, and enough of it, you would have found relief somehow?"

Do I mean to say that all this absurd and unnatural stuff is true?

I mean to say, my dear Madam, that just at dark, as Mrs. Lumpkin and I were sitting down at dinner, there came such a knocking, and almost before the door could be opened Mrs. Felix rushed in, and between laughing and crying told us this highly improbable story; and when I suggested "a dream,"

"Mr. Lumpkin," she answered, stoutly, "it is no such thing. I saw and heard those things. And if ever there was a woman who was put in possession of some other woman's body, and haunted by her own proud and wicked and foolish words, I am that woman. And how I got back I am sure I don't know, but there I was in the arm-chair, the canary singing over my head, and I crying as if my heart would break. And it is no dream, Mr. Lumpkin. I will never admit that it was a dream."

THE BOATMAN.

"Pull, boatman—pull! Haste, boatman—haste! my love is far away!"

I must be at her side before the rising of the day. On yonder isle that darkly looms between the sea and sky,

She lives; and with the dawn's first smile beside her must I lie.

The boatman sternly raised his eyes, and sternly he replied,

"Nor morn nor mistress cheer the hearts that chill beneath the tide!"

"Beneath the tide there lie who must—peace with their spirits be! But tell me not of chilly hearts while hers still beats for me.

But yesternight I left her arms; already does my breast

Pant for her, like a wandering bird that yearns toward his nest!"

The boatman said, with bitter tone, as still he plied his oar,

"Once at the bottom of the sea, the bosom pants no more!"

"What! always of the dead you speak! You speak to me in vain;

To-night for me she trims her lamp, to guide me o'er the main.

In absence I sleep not, nor she; at morn we'll mock the light,

And in the sun we'll dream away the sorrows of to-night."

The boatman's brow shrank up, as if with inward agony:

He said, "They neither part nor watch who in the waters lie!"

"Now, by the heavens! art thou, perchance, a comer from the dead,

Thou croaker of ill-omen? Cease thy strain, and pull ahead!

If life has not a charm for thee, then labor at thy beam,

And hold thy peace; disturb me not, and let me dream my dream."

The boatman burst out in a laugh that made his hearer quake,

And said, "If you are dreaming now, ere long you will awake!"

He rose up to his feet. He was a dark and sinewed man;

The moon looked on his face; his cheek was trenched with care, and wan;

His matted locks obscured his brow, but, shining in its gloom,

Two glaring eyes danced wildly out, like meteors on a tomb.

He stood, like some unearthly thing, all ominous and dark,

And pointed grimly to the wave that fretted round the bark.

"You ask me why I speak of death? Because we now are two;

And my boat can never reach the land and carry me and you!

Both can not live! The woman who awaits you by the wave—

That woman was my goddess once, and now—she is your slave!

You have been blest, and I am lorn. I care not which one fall—

But to contain two men like us the universe is small!"

A struggle, and the little boat rocked sullen to and fro;

Then came a splash—and then arose a smothered cry of woe!

The waters heaved up white and rough, the rising winds did moan;

The boatman hearkened for a voice—no sound! He was alone!

He sat him to his oars again, and rowed—he knew not where;

For no one trimmed a lamp for him—he could not go to her!

MARY JONES.

I

"Is Jones coming to-night, Jekyll?"

"Yes, I asked him. He knows the country about Llandollen, so I thought he might be useful," replied the person addressed, as he lay full length on the sofa, smoking.

"I say, Hunt, isn't that a fellow who's a sort of saint, and bores you to death about his mother and sister?" said another of the party to the first speaker.

"I'll tell you how I serve him," drawled out Jekyll, "when he begins one of his domestic yarns. I light my pipe, and the rest goes away with the smoke."

"I don't believe he tells you half as much as he does Hunt. He's afraid of your chaff, Jekyll."

"Nonsense," replied Hunt. "He's a capital fellow, only he does rather victimize me about his sister Mary."

"What's she like?" said Jekyll, a keen admirer of beauty.

"He never talks about her looks; it's her cleverness, her goodness, her archness, and her wit, and all that. I tell him I hate clever women, but he won't take the hint."

"Fancy hinting to Jones! You might as well tickle a hippopotamus and expect it to laugh," said Chesham, who, with another man, named Wyld, completed the group assembled in Jekyll's rooms in College, Oxford, to settle their plans for the next day, when they were to start for Wales, to "read" during the long vacation.

"Well," said Wyld, who lisped from behind a cloud of smoke, "I should have ached to thee her picture. Mind you, Hunt, these ugly fellows thometimes have very pretty thithters."

"Very likely; but this is not a favorable exception. He showed me a photograph once, and she seemed to have goggling, dead-looking eyes, a bad nose, and a prodigious mouth."

"In fact, the ditto of himself," said Jekyll.

"So Mary Jones must be a beauty."

"The name's sufficient," said Hunt. "But don't let's have any more of her. I shall hear enough next term."

There was a slight knock, and Mr. Thomas Jones entered. He was stout and stumpy, with a very short throat and clumsy shoulders: his complexion of that suffused tint—the rubicund sallow—one often sees in mountaineers; light gray eyes; a fat, short, turn-up nose; a large, good-tempered mouth; and straight, no-colored hair; certainly a plain person, and not very likely to have a "pretty sister," yet with so frank and winning a countenance that I, for one, should have put more faith in him than in the elegant Wyld, whose long blonde whiskers rivaled many a lady's ringlets.

"How late you are, Jones!" drawled out Jekyll.

"Yes; and now I can only stay a few minutes—just to make my excuses for not coming before."

"How are you, old fellow?" said Hunt, coming forward and shaking Jones heartily by the hand; secretly, perhaps, he felt ashamed of having ridiculed him to such men as Wyld and Chesham.

"Why don't you come with us to-morrow?"

"You forget I'm going to Paris with Owen for a week, and then I have to read with three of my cousins in Lancashire; otherwise I should have been very glad to have joined you."

"I say, Jones, is there any fishing near Llandollen?" said Jekyll.

"Llandollen! Are you going there?" inquired Jones, with evident interest.

"Well, no; not exactly. In fact, we shall move about."

"I thay, aren't you going home at all, Jones," said Wyld, mischievously. "Your mother and thithter live in Wales, don't they?"

"Yes, in Glamorganshire, near—" But here Hunt, seeing Wyld's drift, broke in by asking Jekyll what was the hour fixed for starting.

"That reminds me I must be off," said Jones.

Our four Oxonians soon after found themselves snugly settled in a small cottage near the romantic village of Llandollen.

Fishing, to Jekyll's infinite disgust, proved scarce; but Hunt, who was fond of sketching, found an abundant harvest among the picturesque and beautiful scenery around them.

Got up, after the fashion of amateurs, in all artistic appliances; and, with his easel, portable tent, and knapsack, full of pencils, nice new brushes, and a color-box of the largest dimensions, with every known combination of color in it, strapped upon his back, he was himself a very taking subject for a sketch.

"Going sketching again?" said Jekyll one morning, when Hunt, laden with his apparatus, entered the room where the others were seated at breakfast. "What earthly pleasure can you find, old fellow, in tramping about the country and spoiling good paper at the rate you do?"

"Come, Jekyll," said Hunt, laughing, "at least I have more to show for my day's sport than you have."

"That's true," said Jekyll, good-humoredly; "for yesterday I never once carried out Dr. Johnson's definition of 'a fool at one end and a fish at the other.' Where are you off to this morning?"

"I'm going up that mountain at the end of the pass. Morgan, the old shepherd, who lives over the way, tells me there is a first-rate view half-way up."

"I've half a mind to go with you," said Jekyll; "these fellows do nothing but smoke and make bad puns."

"Nonsense, Jekyll," said Wyld; "you know we thettled to go over to Llanbeath market to-day. I want to thee some pretty Welsh girls; there are none in this village between theven and therventy."

"So much the better for you and Chesham; you can't get into mischief."

"I don't believe Welsh girls are ever pretty," said Hunt; "they are always red-haired and freckled."

"He's thinking of Mary Jones," said Chesham.

"Well, I must be off, if I mean to get any morning effects in my sketch; so good-by."

Hunt worked hard at his sketch all day, taken from the point to which old Morgan had guided him. Crouching down in the valley was a most charming-looking cottage. The garden presented a brilliant variety of color, both in flowers and fruit, and the dwelling itself was wreathed with flowering plants.

As Hunt sketched he speculated on who might inhabit this isolated paradise, for the smoke rising in a tiny spiral column of blue against the dark back-ground of trees told that there was life within. Once he thought he saw female figures walking in the garden, but he was too far off to be sure.

The day had been oppressively hot; sheltered under his tent, and wearied with his efforts to do justice to the beauty of the scene, Hunt at last consoled himself with a cigar and a novel, in which he became so intensely absorbed as not to heed the warning wind that rushed by him. A vivid flash of forked lightning, followed by a thunder-clap, echoed on from one mountain to another, made him start to his feet. To his surprise, he found that the gathering darkness was not only the effect of the storm, but that it was nearly eight o'clock, and he had seven or eight miles between him and his friends. He packed his tent as rapidly as possible, and began his descent on the side of the mountain nearest the cottage, as it promised to be shorter than the path by which he had ascended in the morning.

The storm was by this time raging furiously; fast and faster came the lightning flashes, scarcely giving time for one thunder-clap to succeed before another overpowered it with louder clamor; and not one drop of rain. The darkness increased rapidly, and by the time Hunt had descended the mountain he could only see his way for the blue, metallic glare of the lightning. Just as he was hesitating which path to take there was an instant of utter darkness, and then down fell the rain—at first in large, heavy drops, then in streams, almost sheets, of perpendicular water, which soon drenched him to the skin.

"I'm certainly in a most unpleasant fix," he thought; "I wish that cottage would show a light; and with all my dislike to strangers—especially Welsh women—I'd ask for shelter. I'll just hallo."

He had been walking on as rapidly as he could in the darkness, for the lightning was now rare, and as though half extinguished by the rain, when it did show itself.

Almost as he shouted he struck against some obstacle that stayed his progress. Cautiously feeling about he became sure that it was the fence of the cottage garden, and now a light shone for an instant from one of the lower windows.

"If I could only see my way a little," said Hunt.

"If I go over hap-hazard, I shall most likely get into the middle of a flower-bed. Well, I can't stand shivering; so here goes," and though encumbered by his traps, he was soon on the other side of the fence, and stumbling, as he hoped, toward the door. The house was well guarded, loud barking showed that his approach was heard; and, not feeling sure that in another moment his legs might not be assaulted by the canine sentinels, Hunt was about to call loudly for admittance, when a broad stream of light issued from the cottage and a dark figure with a lantern stood in the doorway.

Hunt's story was soon told to what appeared to be an elderly man-servant, who meanwhile had some difficulty in quieting the dogs. He left Hunt in a well-lighted little hall, saying he would speak to his lady, and in a few minutes he returned with "his mistress's, Mrs. Vernon's compliments, and she hoped he'd make himself comfortable. I think, Sir, you'd better get rid of your wet things as fast as may be. This way, Sir." And he conducted our shivering hero to his snug pantry, where a comfortable wood fire was burning. "I've only a suit of my own to offer, Sir; for there ain't no other man in the house."

Hunt was a handsome man, at least for those who admire a refined style of manly beauty. There was occasionally a touch of sadness in his countenance, although no one had a heartier relish for a joke. Now he could not repress a shout of laughter as he contemplated himself in the garments of a man about six inches shorter and nearly twice his own breadth.

"It is to be hoped," he thought, "there are no young ladies in the house, or they'll laugh me out of countenance."

The grave man-servant was liberal in his apologies for having no better raiment at hand; but apparently he did not see the joke of laughing at his own clothes, and he gave Hunt no more time to ask questions. He walked across the little hall, threw open the door of a well-lighted room, and ushered the stranger into the presence of its sole occupants—an old and a young lady.

The former was seated in a large easy-chair in a corner of the room, knitting diligently, although at a considerable distance from the lamp, which threw only a subdued light over her delicate features and clear blue eyes. As she sat with her face turned toward the door in expectation, it looked like some classic profile carved in ivory, so smooth and unruffled.

Hunt bowed, but, although the sweet blue eyes looked fixedly at him, there was no answering greeting.

"Mamma," said a voice near him, "this is the gentleman who has lost his way in the storm." The speaker touched her own eyes quickly, and Mr. Hunt saw that Mrs. Vernon's were sightless.

After apologizing for his intrusion and thanking her for her hospitality, he turned to the young lady and stood almost speechless with surprise. He had expected to see a good-tempered, ordinary-looking country girl (probably freckled), and he beheld a lovely creature, as graceful in form and movement as she was refined and spirituelle in countenance. Dark glossy hair, braided closely round her well-formed head; a clear, olive complexion, with a rosy bloom; a delicate nose, slightly aquiline—not cold and cruel; the well-cut nostrils gave a warmth and generosity to the expression, aided by the full rosy lips of a mouth that seemed made for love. Deep blue eyes, with long black lashes, smiled mirthfully at Hunt's costume, which, in his amazement at finding such perfect beauty and grace in this solitary cottage, he had quite forgotten.

It is very unsatisfactory to dissect a face. It is, after all, a sort of verbal photograph, and produces the same impression. Far different was the glowing portrait stereotyped at once on Hunt's memory; and yet the girl's evident and irrepressible amusement at his costume so abashed him that for some moments he did not venture on a second survey.

However, well-bred people are soon sociable, and Hunt speedily found himself relating his adventures, and as much at his ease in his borrowed clothes as if they had been his own.

"Minnie, I know, would like to see your sketches," said his hostess, "and she will tell me if they are faithful delineations of our retreat."

The sketch-book, fortunately, had escaped the rain; and, as the fair Minnie was evidently a novice in the sublime but much perverted art of sketching from nature, she expressed unbounded admiration for what it contained.

The evening passed to Hunt like a delightful dream; and when he was shown to his bed-chamber, and sat down before a cozy fire to think it quietly over, he found out by unmistakable signs that he was desperately in love with the enchanting Minnie Vernon. And why should you laugh at him for his precipitancy? In the first place, pretty and charming girls like Minnie Vernon are not met with every day. Then, she had sung like an angel. When she came to the last verse of "The beating of my own heart," Hunt's head beat in his breast like a sledge-hammer. Then, her conversation showed a highly-cultivated mind, or rather gave him a notion of it, without any attempt at display. And, lastly, bear well in mind that the presence of a blind person as third, gives all the freedom of a tête-à-tête, and that you grow more intimate in one evening under such circumstances than in half a dozen formal meetings in society; and I think you have reasons enough why Hunt felt himself desperately in love.

Poor fellow, he did not sleep well—of course he must take leave of her next morning, and this was a disturbing thought; another, of perhaps greater importance, was, had he made any corresponding impression upon her? He would soon return to finish his sketch, and to thank them for their kind hospitality; he must take care those fellows did not suspect any thing; they would be wanting to go with him. This must be prevented. What a strange thing the whole adventure seemed! If he got her for a wife what a lucky fellow he should be! At last he fell asleep, and dreamed he caught Jekyll making love to Minnie, who had declared herself engaged to marry Jones. He made a desperate effort to tell her how much he loved her, but he could not speak; and he finally awakened in the midst of a terrific conflict with Jekyll and two immense dogs, to find that he had a bad cold and was very feverish, and that it was broad daylight.

He rose and looked out of window with the curiosity one always feels after a late arrival in a strange house. The mountain from which he had made his sketch lay opposite, and appeared more distant than he could have thought. Every thing that had happened seemed so unreal in the morning light that he began to wonder how much of it was the work of his imagination. But one image was too vivid for him to doubt. On leaving her the night before, and in his meditations after, he had felt that at their next meeting he must tell her of his love; sober daylight made him pause and wonder at his folly. He, the calm, self-possessed Stewart Hunt, whose apparently equable temperament was the envy of many of his companions, to find himself bewitched—for that was the word—by a pair of blue eyes and a bright gipsy face!

Stewart Hunt had as yet never really loved any girl. I do not dignify by that name the hundred and one fancies or passions which men go through, beginning at sixteen, or even younger: desperate attachments are formed even at nine years old! It is probably a romantic assertion, but I do not believe that either man or woman loves really more than once.

Hunt had neither mother nor sisters, and so artificial and conventional was the female society in which he mixed that he had little hope of meeting with the devoted love he had fancied might exist; rather, being by the early death of his father the possessor of large property, he became doubtful of being ever loved for himself.

He went down to breakfast trying to convince himself that the morning light would disenchant him. He was delighted, at the same time almost provoked, to find that Minnie looked even more fresh and lovely in morning costume, and that he felt a greater fool than ever.

She held out her hand so winningly, and inquired so kindly how he had slept, and if he had taken cold, that Hunt, for the first time in his life, became positively nervous, and inclined to be cross with the person who caused the feeling.

The conversation at breakfast was chiefly carried on by Mrs. Vernon. Minnie was far more silent than on the previous evening.

When Hunt rose to take leave, Mrs. Vernon said that although she would not press him to remain then, on account of the anxiety his absence might cause his friends, she hoped he would soon pay them another visit. She told him that from their side of the valley was a much shorter road to Llandollen, and proposed that John should guide him to it.

John, when summoned, looked extremely grave, and informed his mistress, in a solemn whisper, "that the youngest cow had calved that morning, and he thought it were best he did not leave the premises."

"Never mind, then, John; Miss Minnie will go," said Mrs. Vernon, smiling; and turning to Hunt, "John is not able to go, but Minnie will. I am sure, guide you: will you not, dearest?"

Minnie said "Yes," but to Hunt's jealous ears it seemed rather timidly than willingly. However, he inwardly blessed the cow for her timely offices in his favor, and felt a third sensation of delight when Minnie reappeared in her black hat and white feather, looking "as lovely as an angel," as he mentally phrased it.

Not a word was spoken by either for some little distance. At length Minnie broke the awkward silence.

"I am afraid you have taken a very bad cold?" A very simple question, but Hunt seized upon it as just suited for his desperate state.

"Should you really care if I had?" he said, coming near to her.

Minnie laughed merrily.

"You must think me a very hard-hearted person, Mr. Hunt, not to compassionate sufferings brought on by your zealous endeavors to immortalize our cottage."

Hunt felt keenly mortified. He did not see the blush on his companion's cheek, nor calculate how much her words might have been intended to cover the embarrassment caused by his abrupt question.

"I have no doubt I shall be quite well to-morrow," he said, very coldly.

With a woman's quick perception she saw she had wounded him, and felt angry with herself for having laughed.

"If I am not asking too much," she said, kindly, "I should much prize a sketch of our cottage."

She raised her blue eyes to his with a look so full of truth that he could no longer think she was quizzing him.

"Any—all my sketches are at your service. I will finish and mount the best, and bring them over the next time I come, as Mrs. Vernon has kindly given me permission."

"She will be very glad; a stranger, or indeed any visitor, in these wilds is so rare an occurrence that, unless it is a great tax to ask you to come, I hope you will. A little change is so good for her."

Hunt seemed, as we say of shy children, to have "lost his tongue." Not even a compliment would come to his aid. He was pondering whether his companion would be glad to see him again, and how he could make her say so. He continued to walk beside her in silence, admiring her firm, springy tread, and noticing that, spite of thick, country-made boots, she had a small and well-shaped foot.

He was roused from this interesting contemplation by her voice.

"Here, I think, I will say good-by! You will find your way easily now if you follow that road, and remember in all its windings always to keep to the right. You can not make a mistake." She stood still and held out her hand.

He started; he had not fancied the parting would come so soon.

"You must think me a dull companion and very ungrateful, after your kindness in—in showing me the road." Then, seeing if he wished to say more it must be at once, he added, hurriedly, "I can not tell you how I have prized this walk. Will you believe me if I say the feeling is far more than I can put into words?"

He looked at her earnestly. Minnie blushed deeply, but she neither smiled nor seemed vexed; so he gained courage to proceed.

"May I ask you to say you believe me?"

He said this so earnestly that she raised her eyes for a moment, and they said quite as much as Hunt dared expect. The expression of joy and rapture that succeeded to his previous depression was instantaneous. He felt as if he should have liked to take her into his arms that very minute; and, as she raised her eyes again, saying,

"I must really say good-by now," his passionate gaze terrified her into a very rapid leave-taking.

Hunt stood gazing after her as long as she was in sight, and then slowly returned to Llandollen.

Of course Hunt had a great deal of questioning to encounter from his friends. At first he declined to satisfy their curiosity, and then admitted that he had taken shelter in a cottage, where he had passed the night. Wyld teased him a good deal—asking him if there wasn't a freckled mountain maid in the cottage; but he kept his own counsel.

For a few days he was laid up with a feverish cold, and when he recovered sufficiently to walk so far without exciting the remarks of his friends he called at Mrs. Vernon's house and found it shut up and deserted, except by a deaf old woman, who told him the mistress and John had gone to the south suddenly to see some sick relation, and would not be back for a month.

"What is the name of the place to which Mrs. Vernon is gone?"

"Well, indeed now, I don't know," said the old woman, and she finished her sentence in Welsh; and, when Hunt reiterated his inquiries, only shook her head and said, "No English."

On his return to Oxford, Hunt found a letter from his friend Jones, telling him that as he now hoped to be ordained in December he did not intend returning to college in the interim. This was a great disappointment. Of all his Oxford friends Jones was the only one to whom he could have confided the story of his love, and through him he hoped to have discovered some tidings of Mrs. Vernon and her daughter; although, even in his short sojourn there, he had learned how little intercourse there is between the northern and southern inhabitants of the Principality.

He became morose and taciturn—angry with himself for indulging a probably hopeless passion—for he found it impossible to discover any traces of the inhabitants of the cottage.

An old don of his college, who one day asked him to dinner, he found had been a good deal in Wales, and when he inquired if he knew a Mrs. Vernon, who lived near Llandollen, told him he had visited her five years before, but then she was neither blind nor had she a daughter. So here conjecture was again at fault.

Besides, if he found Minnie, how could he suppose she would have reciprocated so sudden an attachment? She might by this time be married to some one else. No; he would stake his life on the truth of her last look, and that did not express indifference.

Poor fellow!—he was only twenty-five; he began to feel very old and misanthropical, and to talk of giving up balls and ladies' society. In fact, he was fast becoming cynical and unamiable.

Wyld and Chesham always persisted that some old Welsh witch had cast an evil eye upon him. The more observing Jekyll had a shrewd suspicion of the truth, and one day asked if it were any love-affair that weighed on his mind. But Hunt shrank from mentioning Minnie to any one, far less to Jekyll, to whom he knew the confession of such love as his would only afford matter for ridicule.

He now bitterly regretted that he had not told Mrs. Vernon he was at Oxford, as this might have elicited the mention of Jones, who, after all, was perhaps known to her. Still, his unconquerable reserve prevented him from writing to his friend on the subject.

II.

It was the day before Christmas-eve—a day that brings happy thoughts to most people—(always excepting those relating to Christmas bills). The brightness of the coming season seems to be reflected on the icicles that hang, or ought to hang, on the trees and window-ledges.

Stewart Hunt was usually full of sympathy with the "jolly season;" now he could not shake off his melancholy.

He had had numerous invitations for Christmas-day, but had refused them all, resolved, with a sort of savage satisfaction, to spend it at his club.

Now, as he sat at his late London breakfast, turning over several letters that had come by the post, a well-known handwriting on one of the envelopes struck him. He opened it and found a pressing invitation to spend Christmas with his friend Thomas Jones, at his curacy, in Glamorganshire—his mother and sister, Jones said, would be delighted to welcome him, and he would tell Hunt the secret he had hinted at in his last letter: he was the happiest fellow living; he was going to be married to his cousin; she was staying with them, and he was anxious to introduce her to Hunt.

"Good Heavens! that ugly fellow. I feel as if I must hate him. I hate happy people who are going to be married. I don't suppose she loves him; she is going to marry him for a home. Poor Jones! What does he say? In a few months. He's too good a fellow to be thrown away on any designing woman. I'll go down and see what this cousin is like. I believe I'm his most intimate friend, and if I find there is any chance of his being imposed on my plain duty is to warn him."

Warmed with this benevolent intention, he wrote to Jones, naming the train by which he might be expected on the following day.

It was not till his packing was nearly accomplished that he remembered he should have to meet the dreaded "Mary Jones." The photograph arose grimly before him; but it was too late to retract, and he need never mention it at Oxford.

The pure, bracing air was exhilarating, and when he stepped on the platform at Cardiff he looked more like himself than he had done for weeks.

"Well, old fellow, this is glorious of you," said Jones, rushing up to meet him, thereby oversetting a small railway official and greatly disturbing an old lady who was getting out of a second-class carriage with her arms full of band-boxes and bundles. Away rolled two of the band-boxes; the old lady worrying, and fretting, and scolding, and doing every thing except run after them.

Both Jones and Hunt went in chase, and soon brought back the boxes, which, wonderful to relate, had not come open in their little excursion.

"Here's the trap—this way—come along!" Jones was so full of delighted excitement that he couldn't get his words out fast enough.

"Got your luggage? That's right! Here, porter, this way! Now jump up, Hunt. We've but six miles to go, and then I'll show you my darling Minnie."

"Who!" cried Hunt, so aghast at the name that his friend looked surprised.

"Didn't you get my letter? and didn't I tell you she was staying with us? My cousin Minnie—Minnie Vernon. Hullo, boy! Get out of the way; you're not hurt, are you?"

This, roared out in Welsh, to an urchin whom in his excitement Jones had included in the lash bestowed on his pony, was a seasonable interruption for Hunt, who sat stupefied.

What did it all mean? Was he the victim of a hoax? or was it a dream? and if he rubbed his eyes should he find himself in his rooms in London, safe away from this chattering fellow, who seemed much too full of his own happiness to notice his silence and dismay?

He tried to frame a question which should clear up all these doubts, but he was afraid of betraying himself. No, best to wait and let his eyes tell him the truth.

Just as they drove up to the very pretty cottage which Jones pointed out as his home, Hunt recovered himself sufficiently to ask after his friend's mother and sister.

"Ah! they're quite well, thank you; of course delighted to have Minnie with them. Mary returned with her only two days ago. By-the-by, when I said you were coming, Mary seemed to have heard something about you; but I was talking to Minnie, so I didn't quite remember what it was."

It was his Minnie, then; for how else could Mary Jones have heard of him?

Hunt felt a strong, sudden inclination to fling his friend out of the dog-cart.

His senses were still confused as he entered the drawing-room, and heard Jones presenting him to his mother and sister and Miss Vernon.

He forced himself to look up.

There was the false Minnie, looking more lovely than ever, as she held out her hand and claimed him as an old acquaintance.

She had certainly the grace to blush; but how he hated her—all the more because he felt his love spring up as wildly and madly as ever.

He turned to Mrs. Jones; then, remembering the dreaded "Mary," looked at Jones's sister. Here was another surprise. She was a plump little damsel, with pretty, dark eyes and a sweet smile.

Mrs. Jones offered to take Hunt round the garden and show him the Christmas-roses, now in full bloom; but, just as they reached the sheltered nook where the roses were to be found, she was summoned back to the house by a visit from the doctor.

To Hunt's surprise, Jones walked on in front with his sister, leaving him side by side with the fair Minnie.

"I'll be back directly, old fellow," said Jones, suddenly turning round; "I must go and see after the pony. My man's a stranger." And off he went through a small side-gate with his sister, leaving the others to admire the Christmas-roses.

It was intolerable. Hunt had a great mind to go back to the house.

After the first glance of recognition, he had studiously avoided looking at Minnie. If he staid here alone with her, he knew he must meet her eyes, and then—well, and what then?

Minnie seemed timid; but his silence obliged her to say something.

"Have you ever been in this part of Wales before?" Just the same sweet, bright voice. It stirred his heart to its very depths.

"No," he spoke almost rudely. The sound of his voice seemed to help him. He looked coldly and severely at her, and met her eyes so full of deprecating softness that he stumbled over his question:

"Have—have you ever been here before?"

"I?" she looked astonished. "It is my native place. We consider it so fortunate that dear Tom should have been appointed to papa's old cure. All my early years were spent here, so that it is doubly home to me."

"What bad taste and utter want of tact," he thought, "to talk in this way to me."

"I only hope," she went on, "that my cousin may like it as well. But Minnie has been brought up in such romantic scenery that this must appear tame to her."

"Who?" exclaimed Hunt, almost gasping.

"My cousin. Surely Tom told you he is engaged to be married to her?"

"Then who—who are you?" exclaimed Hunt; and he seized her hand, to assure himself that this was at least reality.

"I—I am Mary Jones."

"You Mary Jones! Impossible! There must be some mistake. Do not deceive and trifle with me. If you knew how eagerly I tried to recover traces of you; how—but I—I forget myself altogether; why should this interest you?" and he let go her hand.

His strange manner frightened her.

"I do not understand, Mr. Hunt; I have only told you the truth. I am the sister of your friend, who has just left you, but whose acquaintance with you I did not know of till last night."

The revulsion of feeling almost overcome him; but something in her manner set his heart at ease.

"Will you pardon me for my rudeness for frightening you? I thought you said your name was Minnie Vernon."

"My dear godmother always calls me Minnie, and I call her mamma when I am staying with her; but," she added, timidly, "we must go and tell my brother of your mistake."

"I shall think you are still afraid of me if you will not listen to me for a few moments longer," he said, taking her hand, though much more quietly than before. "I asked you once to believe me, and you said you did. Will you always believe me, always trust me, always let me love you as I do now, as I have done ever since we parted, dearest Minnie?"

Minnie did not speak. One momentary, glancing look was enough for Hunt, and then he drew her close—close to him.

There is no need to say that that Christmas-day was the happiest Stewart Hunt had ever spent; nor that early in the spring there was a double wedding in the pretty Welsh village church.

Hunt shuddered when his bride signed her maiden name for the last time in the old parish register; but he whispered, as he bent over her:

"Thank God! you will never be Mary Jones again. You are my own Minnie now forever."

CORD AND CREESE; OR, THE BRANDON MYSTERY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE DODGE CLUB."

CHAPTER XXIV.

BEATRICE'S JOURNAL.

BRANDON HALL.

September 1, 1848.—Paolo Langhetti used to say that it was useful to keep a diary; not one from day to day, for each day's events are generally trivial, and therefore not worthy of record; but rather a statement in full of more important events in one's life, which may be turned to in later years. I wish I had begun this sixteen months ago, when I first came here. How full would have been my melancholy record by this time!

Where shall I begin?

Of course, with my arrival here, for that is the time when we separated. There is no need for me to put down in writing the events that took place when he was with me. Not a word that he ever spoke, not a look that he ever gave, has escaped my memory. This much I may set down here.

Alas! the shadow of the African forest fell deeply and darkly upon me. Am I stronger than other women, or weaker? I know not. Yet I can be calm while my heart is breaking. Yes, I am at once stronger and weaker; so weak that my heart breaks, so strong that I can hide it.

I will begin from the time of my arrival here.

I came knowing well who the man was and what he was, whom I had for my father. I came with every word of that despairing voyager ringing in my ears—that cry from the drifting Vishnu, where Despard laid down to die. How is it that his very name thrills through me? I am nothing to him. I am one of the hateful brood of murderers. A Thug was my father—and my mother who? And who am I, and what?

At least my soul is not his, though I am his daughter. My soul is myself, and life on earth can not last forever. Hereafter I may stand where that man may never approach.

How can I ever forget the first sight which I had of my father, who before I saw him had become to me as abhorrent as a demon! I came up in the coach to the door of the Hall and looked out. On the broad piazza there were two men; one was sitting, the other standing.

The one who was standing was somewhat elderly, with a broad, fat face, which expressed nothing in particular but vulgar good-nature. He was dressed in black, and looked like a serious butler, or perhaps still more like some of the Dissenting ministers whom I have seen. He stood with his hands in his pockets, looking at me with a vacant smile.

The other man was younger, not over thirty. He was thin, and looked pale from dissipation. His face was covered with spots, his eyes were gray, his eyelashes white. He was smoking a very large pipe, and a tumbler of some kind of drink stood on the stone pavement at his feet. He stared at me between the puffs of his pipe, and neither moved nor spoke.

If I had not already tasted the bitterness of despair I should have tasted it as I saw these men. Something told me that they were my father and brother. My very soul sickened at the sight—the memory of Despard's words came back—and if it had been possible to have felt any tender natural affection for them, this recollection would have destroyed it.

"I wish to see Mr. Potts," said I, coldly.

My father stared at me.

"I'm Mr. Potts," he answered.

"I am Beatrice," said I; "I have just arrived from China."

By this time the driver had opened the door, and I got out and walked up on the piazza.

"Johnnie," exclaimed my father, "what the devil is the meaning of this?"

"Gad, I don't know," returned John, with a puff of smoke.

"Didn't you say she was drowned off the African coast?"

"I saw so in the newspapers."

"Didn't you tell me about the Falcon rescuing her from the pirates, and then getting wrecked with all on board?"

"Yes, but then there was a girl that escaped."

"Oh ho!" said my father, with a long whistle.

"I didn't know that."

He turned and looked at me hastily, but in deep perplexity.

"So you're the girl, are you?" said he at last.

"I am your daughter," I answered.

I saw him look at John, who winked in return. He walked up and down for a few minutes, and at last stopped and looked at me again.

"That's all very well," said he at last, "but how do I know that you're the party? Have you any proof of this?"

"No."

"You have nothing but your own statement?"

"No."

"And you may be an impostor. Mind you—I'm a magistrate—and you'd better be careful."

"You can do what you choose," said I, coldly.

"No, I can't. In this country a man can't do what he chooses."

I was silent.

"Johnnie," said my father, "I'll have to leave her to you. You arrange it."

John looked at me lazily, still smoking, and for some time said nothing.

"I suppose," said he at last, "you've got to put it through. You began it, you know. You would send for her. I never saw the use of it."

"But do you think this is the party?"

"Oh, I dare say. It don't make any difference any way. Nobody would take the trouble to come to you with a sham story."

"That's a fact," said my father.

"So I don't see but you've got to take her."

"Well," said my father, "if you think so, why all right."

"I don't think any thing of the kind," returned John, snappishly. "I only think that she's the party you sent for."

"Oh, well, it's all the same," said my father, who then turned to me again.

"If you're the girl," he said, "you can get in. Hunt up Mrs. Compton, and she'll take charge of you."

Compton! At the mention of that name a shudder passed through me. She had been in the family of the murdered man, and had ever since lived with his murderer. I went in without a word, prepared for the worst, and expecting to see some evil-faced woman, fit companion for the pair outside.

A servant was passing along. "Where is Mrs. Compton?" I asked.

"Somewhere or other, I suppose," growled the man, and went on.

I stood quietly. Had I not been prepared for some such thing as this I might perhaps have broken down under grief, but I had read the by an expression of surpassing gentleness and sweetness. She looked like one of these women who live lives of devotion for others, who suffer out of the spirit of self-sacrifice, and count their own comfort and happiness as nothing in comparison with that of those whom they love. My heart warmed toward her at the first glance; I saw that this place could not be altogether corrupt since she was here.

"I am Mr. Potts's daughter," said I; "are you Mrs. Compton?"

She stood mute. An expression of deadly fear overspread her countenance, which seemed to turn her white face to a grayish hue, and the look that she gave me was such a look as one may cast upon some object of mortal fear.

"You look alarmed," said I, in surprise; "and why? Am I then so frightful?"

She seized my hand and covered it with kisses. This new outburst surprised me as much as her former fear. I did not know what to do. "Ah! my sweet child, my dearest!" she murmured. "How did you come here, here of all places on earth?"

I was touched by the tenderness and sympathy of her tone. It was full of the gentlest love. "How did you come here?" I asked.

She started and turned on me her former look of fear.

"Do not look at me so," said I, "dear Mrs. Compton. You are timid. Do not be afraid of me. I am incapable of inspiring fear."

I pressed her hand. "Let us say nothing more now about the place. We each seem to know what it is. Since I find one like you living here it will not seem altogether a place of despair."

"Oh, dear child, what words are these? You speak as if you knew all."

"I know much," said I, "and I have suffered much."

"Ah, my dearest! you are too young and too beautiful to suffer." An agony of sorrow came over her face. Then I saw upon it an expression

"I STOOD LOOKING AT HIM WITH A GAZE SO FIXED AND INTENSE THAT IT SEEMED AS IF ALL MY BEING WERE CENTRED IN MY EYES."

MS., and nothing could surprise or wound me.

I waited there for nearly half an hour, during which time no notice was taken of me. I heard my father and John walk down the piazza steps and go away. They had evidently forgotten all about me. At last a man came toward the door who did not look like a servant. He was dressed in black. He was a slender, pale, shambling man, with thin, light hair, and a furtive eye and a weary face. He did not look like one who would insult me, so I asked him where I could find Mrs. Compton.

He started as I spoke and looked at me in wonder, yet respectfully.

"I have just come from China," said I, "and my father told me to find Mrs. Compton."

He looked at me for some time without speaking a word. I began to think that he was imbecile.

"So you are Mr. Potts's daughter," said he at last, in a thin, weak voice. "I—I didn't know that you had come—I—I knew that he was expecting you—but heard you were lost at sea—Mrs. Compton—yes—oh yes—I'll show you where you can find Mrs. Compton."

He was embarrassed, yet not unkind. There was wonder in his face, as though he was surprised at my appearance. Perhaps it was because he found me so unlike my father. He walked toward the great stairs, from time to time turning his head to look at me, and ascended them. I followed, and after going to the third story we came to a room.

"That's the place," said he.

He then turned, without replying to my thanks, and left me. I knocked at the door. After some delay it was opened, and I went in. A thin, pale woman was there. Her hair was perfectly white. Her face was marked by the traces of great grief and suffering, yet overspread which I have often marked since, a strange struggling desire to say something, which that excessive and ever-present terror of hers made her incapable of uttering. Some secret thought was in her whole face, but her faltering tongue was paralyzed and could not divulge it.

She turned away with a deep sigh. I looked at her with much interest. She was not the woman I expected to find. Her face and voice won my heart. She was certainly one to be trusted. But still there was this mystery about her.

Nothing could exceed her kindness and tenderness. She arranged my room. She did everything that could be done to give it an air of comfort. It was a very luxuriously furnished chamber. All the house was lordly in its style and arrangements. That first night I slept the sleep of the weary.

The next day I spent in my room, occupied with my own sad thoughts. At about three in the afternoon I saw him come up the avenue. My heart throbbed violently. My eyes were riveted upon that well-known face, how loved! how dear! In vain I tried to conjecture the reason why he should come. Was it to strike the first blow in his just, his implacable vengeance? I longed that I might receive that blow. Any thing that came from him would be sweet.

He staid a long time and then left. What passed I can not conjecture. But it had evidently been an agreeable visit to my father, for I heard him laughing uproariously on the piazza about something not long after he had gone.

I have not seen him since.

For several weeks I scarcely moved from my room. I ate with Mrs. Compton. Her reserve was impenetrable. It was with painful fear and trembling that she touched upon any thing connected with the affairs of the house or the family.

I saw it and spared her. Poor thing, she has always been too timid for such a life as this.

At the end of a month I began to think that I could live here in a state of obscurity without being molested. Strange that a daughter's feelings toward a father and brother should be those of horror, and that her desire with reference to them should be merely to keep out of their sight. I had no occupation, and needed none, for I had my thoughts and my memories. These memories were bitter, yet sweet. I took the sweet, and tried to solace myself with them. The days are gone forever; no longer does the sea spread wide; no longer can I hear his voice; I can hold him in my arms no more; yet I can remember—

"Das süßeste Glück für die trauernde Brust, Nach der schönen Liebe verschwundener Lust, Sind der Liebe Schmerzen und Klagen."

I think I had lived this sort of life for three months without seeing either my father or brother.

At the end of that time my father sent for me. He informed me that he intended to give a grand entertainment to the county families, and wanted me to do the honors. He had ordered dress-makers for me; he wished me to wear some jewels which he had in the house, and informed me that it would be the grandest thing of the kind that had ever taken place. Fire-works were going to be let off; the grounds were to be illuminated, and nothing that money could effect would be spared to render it the most splendid festival that could be imagined.

I did as he said. The dress-makers came, and I allowed them to array me as they chose. My father informed me that he would not give me the jewels till the time came, hinting a fear that I might steal them.

At last the evening arrived. Invitations had been sent every where. It was expected that the house would be crowded. My father even ventured to make a personal request that I would adorn myself as well as possible. I did the best I could, and went to the drawing-room to receive the expected crowds.

The hour came and passed, but no one appeared. My father looked a little troubled, but he and John waited in the drawing-room. Servants were sent down to see if any one was approaching. An hour passed. My father looked deeply enraged. Two hours passed. Still no one came. Three hours passed. I waited calmly, but my father and John, who had all the time been drinking freely, became furious. It was now midnight, and all hope had left them. They had been treated with scorn by the whole county.

The servants were laughing at my father's disgrace. The proud array in the different rooms was all a mockery. The elaborate fire-works could not be used.

My father turned his eyes, inflamed by anger and strong drink, toward me.

"She's a d—d bad investment," I heard him say.

"I told you so," said John, who did not deign to look at me; "but you were determined."

They then sat drinking in silence for some time.

"Sold!" said my father, suddenly, with an oath.

John made no reply.

"I thought the county would take to her. She's one of their own sort," my father muttered.

"If it weren't for you they might," said John; "but they ain't over-fond of her dear father."

"But I sent out the invites in her name."

"No go anyhow."

"I thought I'd get in with them all right away, hobnob with lords and baronets, and maybe get knighted on the spot."

John gave a long scream of laughter.

"You old fool!" he cried; "so that's what you're up to, is it? Sir John—ha, ha, ha! You'll never be made Sir John by parties, I'm afraid."

"Oh, don't you be too sure. I'm not put down. I'll try again," he continued, after a pause. "Next year I'll do it. Why, she'll marry a lord, and then won't I be a lord's father-in-law! What do you say to that?"

"When did you get these notions in your blessed head?" asked John.

"Oh, I've had them—It's not so much for myself, Johnnie—but for you. For if I'm a lord you'll be a lord too."

"Lord Potts. Ha, ha, ha!"

"No," said my father, with some appearance of vexation, "not that; we'll take our title the way all the lords do, from the estates. I'll be Lord Brandon, and when I die you'll get the title."

"And that's your little game. Well, you've played such good little games in your life that I've got nothing to say, except—'Go it!'"

"She's the one that'll give me a lift."

"Well, she ought to be able to do something."

By this time I concluded that I had done my duty and prepared to retire. I did not wish to overhear any of their conversation. As I walked out of the room I still heard their remarks:

"Blest if she don't look as if she thought herself the Queen," said John.

"It's the diamonds, Johnnie."

"No it ain't, it's the girl herself. I don't like the way she has of looking at me and through me."

"Why, that's the way with that kind. It's what the lords like."

"I don't like it, then, and I tell you she's got to be took down!"

This was the last I heard. Yet one thing was evident to me from their conversation. My father had some wild plan of effecting an entrance into society through me. He thought that after he was once recognized he might get sufficient influence to gain a title and found a family. I also might marry a lord. He thus dreamed of being Lord Brandon, and one of the great nobles of the land.

Amidst my sadness I almost smiled at this vain dream; but yet John's words affected me strongly—"You've played such good little games in your life." Well I knew with whom they were played. One was with Despard, the other with Brandon.

This then was the reason why he had sent for me from China. The knowledge of his purpose made my life neither brighter nor darker. I still lived on as before.

During these months Mrs. Compton's tender devotion to me never ceased. I respected her, and forbore to excite that painful fear to which she was subject. Once or twice I forgot myself and began speaking to her about her strange position here. She stopped me with her look of alarm.

"Are you not afraid to be kind to me?" I asked.

She looked at me piteously.

"You are the only one that is kind to me," I continued. "How have you the courage?"

"I can not help it," she murmured, "you are so dear to me."

She sighed and was silent. The mystery about her remained unchanged; her gentle nature, her tender love, and her ever-present fear. What was there in her past that so influenced her life? Had she too been mixed up with the crime on the Vishnu? She! impossible. Yet surely something as dark as that must have been required to throw so black a cloud over her life. Yet what—what could that have been? In spite of myself I associate her secret with the tragedy of Despard. She was in his family long. His wife died. She must have been with her at the time.

The possibilities that have suggested themselves to my mind will one day drive me mad. Alas, how my heart yearns over that lonely man in the drifting ship! And yet, merciful God! who am I that I should sympathize with him? My name is infamy, my blood is pollution.

I spoke to her once in a general way about the past. Had she ever been out of England? I asked.

"Yes," she answered, dreamily.

"Where?"

She looked at me and said not a word.

At another time I spoke of China, and hinted that perhaps she too knew something about the East. The moment that I said this I repented. The poor creature was shaken from head to foot with a sudden convulsion of fear. This convulsion was so terrible that it seemed to me as though another would be death. I tried to soothe her, but she looked fearfully at me for a long time after.

At another time I asked her directly whether her husband was alive. She looked at me with deep sadness and shook her head. I do not know what position she holds here. She is not housekeeper; none of the servants pay any attention to her whatever. There is an impudent head servant who manages the rest. I noticed that the man who showed me to her room when I first came treats her differently from the rest. Once or twice I saw them talking in one of the halls. There was deep respect in his manner. What he does I have not yet found out. He has always shown great respect to me, though why I can not imagine. He has the same timidity of manner which marks Mrs. Compton. His name is Philips.

I once asked Mrs. Compton who Philips was, and what he did. She answered quickly that he was a kind of clerk to Mr. Potts, and helped him to keep his accounts.

"Has he been with him long?" I continued.

"Yes, a considerable time," she said—but I saw that the subject distressed her, so I changed it.

For more than three months I remained in my room, but at last, through utter despair, I longed to go out. The noble grounds were there, high hills from which the wide sea was visible—that sea which shall be associated with his memory till I die. A great longing came over me to look upon its wide expanse, and feed my soul with old and dear memories. There it would lie, the same sea from which he so often saved me, over which we sailed till he laid down his noble life at my feet, and I gave back that life to him again.

I used to ascend a hill which was half a mile behind the Hall within the grounds, and pass whole days there unmolested. No one took the trouble to notice what I did, at least I thought so till afterward. There for months I used to go. I would sit and look fixedly upon the blue water, and my imagination would carry me far away to the South, to that island on the African shore, where he once reclined in my arms, before the day when I learned that my touch was pollution to him—to that island where I afterward knelt by him as he lay senseless, slowly coming back to life, when if I might but touch the hem of his garment it was bliss enough for one day. Ah me, how often I have wet his feet with my tears—poor, emaciated feet—and longed to be able to wipe them with my hair, but dared not. He lay unconscious. He never knew the anguish of my love.

Then I was less despairing. The air around was filled with the echo of his voice; I could shut my eyes, and bring him before me. His face was always visible to my soul.

One day the idea came into my head to extend my ramble into the country outside, in order to get a wider view. I went to the gate.

The porter came out and asked what I wanted. I told him.

"You can't go out," said he, rudely.

"Why not?"

"Oh, them's Potts's orders—that's enough, I think."

"He never said so to me," I replied, mildly.

"That's no odds; he said so to me, and he told me if you made any row to tell you that you were watched, and might just as well give up at once."

"Watched!" said I, wonderingly.

"Yes—for fear you'd get skittish, and try and do something foolish. Old Potts is bound to keep you under his thumb."

I turned away. I did not care much. I felt more surprise than any thing else to think that he would take the trouble to watch me. Whether he did or not was of little consequence. If I could only be where I had the sea before me it was enough.

That day, on going back to the Hall, I saw John sitting on the piazza. A huge bull-dog which he used to take with him every where was lying at his feet. Just before I reached the steps a Malay servant came out of the house.

He was about the same age as John. I knew him to be a Malay when I first saw him, and concluded that my father had picked him up in the East. He was slight but very lithe and muscular, with dark glittering eyes and glistening white teeth. He never looked at me when I met him, but always at the ground, without seeming to be aware of my existence.

The Malay was passing out when John called out to him,

"Hi, there, Vijal!"

Vijal looked carelessly at him.

"Here!" cried John, in the tone with which he would have addressed his dog.

Vijal stopped carelessly.

"Pick up my hat, and hand it to me."

His hat had fallen down behind him. Vijal stood without moving, and regarded him with an evil smile.

"D—n you, do you hear?" cried John.

"Pick up my hat."

But Vijal did not move.

"If you don't, I'll set the dog on you," cried John, starting to his feet in a rage.

Still Vijal remained motionless.

"Nero!" cried John, furiously, pointing to Vijal, "seize him, Sir."

The dog sprang up and at once leaped upon Vijal. Vijal warded off the assault with his arm. The dog seized it, and held on, as was his nature. Vijal did not utter a cry, but seizing the dog, he threw him on his back, and flinging himself upon him, fixed his own teeth in the dog's throat.

John burst into a torrent of the most frightful curses. He ordered Vijal to let go of the dog. Vijal did not move; but while the dog's teeth were fixed in his arm, his own were still fixed as tenaciously in the throat of the dog.

John sprang forward and kicked him with frightful violence. He leaped on him and stamped on him. At last, Vijal drew a knife from his girdle and made a dash at John. This frightened John, who fell back cursing. Vijal then raised his head.

The dog lay motionless. He was dead. Vijal sat down, his arm running blood, with the knife in his hand, still glaring at John.

During this frightful scene I stood rooted to the spot in horror. At last the sight of Vijal's suffering roused me. I rushed forward, and, tearing the scarf from my neck, knelt down and reached out my hand to stanch the blood.

Vijal drew back. "Poor Vijal," said I, "let me stop this blood. I can dress wounds. How you suffer!"

He looked at me in bewilderment. Surprise at hearing a kind word in this house of horror seemed to deprive him of speech. Passively he let me take his arm, and I bound it up as well as I could.

All this time John stood cursing, first me, and then Vijal. I said not a word, and Vijal did not seem to hear him, but sat regarding me with his fiery black eyes. When at last I had finished, he rose and still stood staring at me. I walked into the house.

John hurled a torrent of imprecations after me. The last words that I heard were the same as he had said once before. "You've got to be took down; and I'll be d—d if you don't get took down precious soon!"

I told Mrs. Compton of what had happened. As usual, she was seized with terror. She looked at me with a glance of fearful apprehension. At last she gasped out:

"They'll kill you."

"Let them," said I, carelessly; "it would be better than living."

"Oh dear!" groaned the poor old thing, and sank sobbing in a chair. I did what I could to soothe her, but to little purpose. She afterward told me that Vijal had escaped further punishment in spite of John's threats, and hinted that they were half afraid of him.

The next day, on attempting to go out, Philips told me that I was not to be permitted to leave the house. I considered it the result of John's threat, and yielded without a word.

After this I had to seek distraction from my thoughts within the house. Now there came over me a great longing for music. Once, when in the drawing-room on that famous evening of the abortive fête, which was the only time I ever was there, I had noticed a magnificent grand piano of most costly workmanship. The thought of this came to my mind, and an unconquerable desire to try it arose. So I went down and began to play.

It was a little out of tune, but the tone was marvelously full and sweet. I threw myself with indescribable delight into the charm of the hour. All the old joy which music once used to bring came back. Imagination, stimulated by the swelling harmonies, transported me far away from this prison-house and its hateful associations to that happier time of youth when not a thought of sorrow came over me. I lost myself therein. Then that passed, that life vanished, and the sea-voyage began. The thoughts of my mind and the emotions of my heart passed down to the quivering chords and trembled into life and sound.

I do not know how long I had been playing when suddenly I heard a sob behind me. I started and turned. It was Philips.

He was standing with tears in his eyes and a rapt expression on his emaciated face, his hands hanging listless, and his whole air that of one who had lost all senses save that of hearing. But as I turned and stopped, the spell that bound him was broken. He sighed and looked at me earnestly.

"Can you sing?"

"Would you like me to do so?"

"Yes," he said, in a faint, imploring voice.

I began a low song—a strain associated with that same childhood of which I had just been thinking—a low, sad strain, sweet to my ears and to my soul; it spoke of peace and innocence, quiet home joys, and calm delights. My own mind brought before me the image of the house where I had lived, with the shadow of great trees around, and gorgeous flowers every where, where the sultry air breathed soft; and beneath the hot noon all men sank to rest and slumber.

When I stopped I turned again. Philips had not changed his attitude. But as I turned he uttered an exclamation and tore out his watch.

"Oh, Heavens!—two hours," he exclaimed.

"He'll kill me for this."

With these words he rushed out of the room.

I kept up my music for about ten days when one day it was stopped forever. I was in the middle of a piece when I heard heavy footsteps behind me. I turned and saw my father. I rose and looked at him with an effort to be respectful. It was lost on him, however. He did not glance at me.

"I came up to say to you," said he, after a little hesitation, "that I can't stand this infernal squall and clatter any longer. So in future you just shut up."

He turned and left me. I closed the piano forever, and went to my room.

The year ended, and a new year began. January passed away. My melancholy began to affect my health. I scarcely ever slept at night, and to eat was difficult. I hoped that I was going to die. Alas! death will not come when one calls.

One day I was in my room lying on the couch when Mrs. Compton came. On entering she looked terrified about something. She spoke in a very agitated voice: "They want you down stairs."

"Who?"

"Mr. Potts and John."

"Well," said I, and I prepared to get ready.

"When do they want me?"

"Now," said Mrs. Compton, who by this time was crying.

"Why are you so agitated?" I asked.

"I am afraid for you."

"Why so? Can any thing be worse?"

"Ah, my dearest! you don't know—you don't know."

I said nothing more, but went down. On entering the room I saw my father and John seated at a table with brandy before them. A third man was there. He was a thick-set man of about the same height of my father, but more muscular, with a strong, square jaw, thick neck, low brow, and stern face. My father did not show any actual ferocity in his face whatever he felt; but this man's face expressed relentless cruelty.

On entering the room I walked up a little distance and stood looking at them.

"There, Clark; what do you think of that?"

said my father.

The name, Clark, at once made known to me who this man was—that old associate of my father—his assistant on board the Vishnu. Yet the name did not add one whit to the abhorrence which I felt—my father was worse even than he.

The man Clark looked at me scrutinizingly for some time.

"So that's the gal," said he, at last.

"That's the gal," said my father.

Clark waved his hand at me. "Turn round sideways," said he.

I looked at him quietly without moving. He repeated the order, but I took no notice of it.

"D—n her!" said he. "Is she deaf?"

"Not a bit of it," said John; "but she's plucky. She's just as soon you'd kill her as not. There isn't any way of moving her."

I turned as he said. "You see," said he, with a laugh, "she's been piously brought up; she honors her father."

At this Clark burst into a loud laugh.

Some conversation followed about me as I stood there. Clark then ordered me to turn round and face him. I took no notice; but on my father's ordering it, I obeyed as before. This appeared to amuse them all very greatly, just as the tricks of an intelligent poodle might have done. Clark gave me many commands on purpose to see my refusal, and have my father's order which followed obeyed.

"Well," said he, at last, leaning back in his chair, "she is a showy piece of furniture. Your idea isn't a bad one either."

He rose from his chair and came toward me. I stood looking at him with a gaze so fixed and intense that it seemed as if all my being were centred in my eyes.

He came up and reached out to take hold of my arm. I stepped back. He looked up angrily. But, for some reason, the moment that he caught sight of my face, an expression of fear passed over his.

"Heavens!" he groaned; "look at that face!"

I saw my father look at me. The same horror passed over his countenance. An awful thought came to me. As these men turned their faces away from me in fear I felt my strength going. I turned and rushed from the room. I do not remember any thing more.

It was early in February when this occurred. Until the beginning of August I lay senseless. For the first four months I hovered faintly between life and death.

Why did they not let me die? Why did I not die? Alas! had I died I might now have been beyond this sorrow: I have waked to meet it all again.

Mrs. Compton says she found me on the floor of my own room, and that I was in a kind of stupor. I had no fever or delirium. A doctor came, who said it was a congestion of the brain. Thoughts like mine might well destroy the brain forever.

For a month I have been slowly recovering. I can now walk about the room. I know nothing of what is going on in the house, and wish to know nothing. Mrs. Compton is as devoted as ever.

I have got thus far, and will stop here. I have been several days writing this. I must stop till I am stronger.

FIFTH EDITION.

WILLIAM MASON AND E. S. HOADLY'S

METHOD FOR THE PIANO-FORTE.
240 Pages Large Quarto. Illustrated.
PRICE $4 00.

Eminently a practical work; the result of many years' successful experience in the actual business of teaching; adapted to the use of beginners as well as to those at advanced stages of progress.

It is carefully progressive; philosophical in arrangement; very clear, full, and perspicuous in its explanations and directions; and illustrated by cuts and diagrams.

It is new, to a considerable extent, both in method and in matter, embodying the best results of modern experience in teaching, and embracing exercises and expedients for facilitating rapid and thorough progress which have not before been included in any book. It is the first book to present the technicals of modern piano-forte playing.

IT HAS A FULL ELUCIDATION OF THE ACCENTUAL TREATMENT OF EXERCISES,
as systematized by Mr. Mason, by which the attention of the pupil is almost compelled, and careless practice is rendered nearly impossible, while not only the hands, but also the mind, taste, and artistic perceptions, are cultivated and trained. The advantages of the proper use of accented exercises are highly appreciated by the best teachers. They will find them reduced to a system in this book.

ITS SELECTION OF
EXERCISES, RECREATIONS, AND PIECES
is one of its most valuable characteristics. These are mostly from composers of recognized eminence, and are believed to be all intrinsically good, in the highest degree attractive, and adapted to the purposes of training. The same music in sheet form would cost several times the price of this book.

An indication of the favor with which this work is received is afforded by the fact that, though first published in September last, a fifth edition is already called for.

It is published with American Fingering, and also with European Fingering. Purchasers should be careful to indicate which is required.

Consumers can save from 50 cents to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of
THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St., (Post-Office Box 5643), N. Y.

To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea Trade (previous to the establishment of the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,) we will start with the American Houses, leaving out of the account entirely the profits of the Chinese factors.

First. The American House in China or Japan makes large profits on their sales or shipments—and some of the richest retired merchants in this country have made their immense fortunes through their houses in China.

Second. The Banker makes large profits upon the foreign exchange used in the purchase of Teas.

Third. The Importer makes a profit of 30 to 50 per cent. in many cases.

Fourth. On its arrival here it is sold by the cargo, and the Purchaser sells it to the Speculator in invoices of 1000 to 2000 packages, at an average profit of about 10 per cent.

Fifth. The Speculator sells it to the Wholesale Tea Dealer in lines at a profit of 10 to 15 per cent.

Sixth. The Wholesale Tea Dealer sells it to the Wholesale Grocer in lots to suit his trade at a profit of about 10 per cent.

Seventh. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail Dealer at a profit of 15 to 25 per cent.

Eighth. The Retailer sells it to the Consumer for ALL THE PROFIT HE CAN GET.

When you have added to these EIGHT profits as many brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, and add the original cost of the Tea, it will be perceived what the consumer has to pay. And now we propose to show why we can sell so very much lower than small dealers.

We propose to do away with all these various profits and brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, with the exception of a small commission paid for purchasing to our correspondents in China and Japan, one cartage, and a small profit to ourselves—which, on our large sales, will amply pay us.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city. Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a Club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a Club say how much Tea or Coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price-List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete, send it to us by mail. We will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost—so that there need be no confusion in their distribution: each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the Club can divide equally among themselves.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford.

We send no complimentary package for clubs of less than thirty dollars.

COUNTRY CLUBS, Hand and Wagon Peddlers, and small stores (of which class we are supplying many thousands, all of which are doing well), can have their orders promptly and faithfully filled, and, in case of Clubs, can have each party's name marked on their package and directed, by sending their orders to Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey street.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than thirty dollars had better send post-office drafts, or money, with their orders, to save the expense of collecting by express; but larger orders we will send by express, to collect on delivery.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third by sending directly to

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.

PRANG'S AMERICAN CHROMOS are fac similes of Oil and Water-Color Paintings by the best masters. They are artistic copies, and, in most cases, fully equal to the originals. An eminent critic says of our Chromos of Tait's Groups:

"Mr. Louis Prang, of Boston, of whose efforts to disseminate through the country faithful copies of our wild flowers, butterflies, moths, and birds, in such pretty forms, and so cheaply, as to drive out of the market all inferior publications, has just issued a chromo-lithograph in oils of one of Mr. A. F. Tait's clever little pictures. The chromo-lithograph is a perfect fac-simile of the original painting, reproducing not only the brush-marks, but the very lines of the canvas, in a way that surprises by its ingenuity. Mr. Prang tries with all his might to make his imitations absolutely deceptive, not for the purpose of deceiving, but in order to put faithful copies, 'as good as the originals,' within the reach of small purses. He brings to the work knowledge, business energy, and enthusiasm, and what is more, a generous spirit toward art and artists, which is very pleasant to meet with. He has our cordial thanks for what he has already done, and our trust that he will do his best to educate the class he works for in the love of what is true as well as beautiful."

RISE AND FALL OF CRINOLINE.

THE RISE AND FALL OF CRINOLINE.

VI.

ANNO 1780, VIENNA.—In nothing was the pleasure-loving lady of Vienna in the latter part of the last century more regular than in her mid-day visit to the Prater. Her maid accompanied her, carrying cushions; and the two would seek a stone seat a little withdrawn from the frequented walks. The maid, after placing one cushion on the seat and the other at the feet of her mistress, courtesied and retired a few paces, while the lady proceeded to make herself as comfortable as her stony sofa would permit. Her head-dress was after the style of Marie Antoinette, and abundant golden hair, which shone through the sparsely-used powder, framed her face. A cambric skirt enveloped her figure tightly, and over all fell the robe in majestic folds. Thus sat the fair one, motionless, save the play of her fan, until a tread on the sand called a faint color to her cheek, and a gentleman approached and bent familiarly over the back of the seat. However, crinoline is our subject at present, not love-making. The hoop-skirt had already begun to be modified; indeed, at the French Court—then, as now, the arbiter of fashion—it was hastening to its end with gigantic strides. A new contrivance had, however, been applied to the interior of the skirt, viz.: fine steel bows, which were dextrously sewn in the folds so as to give a most majestic swing even to those of plebeian gait. Even this final flicker of waning light was soon lost in the French Revolution, which brought so many things to an end. The last hoop-skirt perished under the guillotine with Madame Dubarry, who felt as much pain at parting with it as with life. "One moment, Mr. Executioner," were her famous last words, and as her head was held on high, Sanson's assistants tore the skirt from her lifeless body, and held it up to the ridicule of the assembled crowd. Thus died crinoline, to rise again, however, in new splendor, like the phoenix, within seventy years.

FACETIÆ.

JONES. "I thought I warned you particularly, cook, against boiling my eggs hard. Now, how is this? Here they are boiled fit for salad, in spite of every direction. What did I tell you?"
 COOK. "Oh, Sir, I remember exactly what you told me, and acted accordingly. The eggs were in the water, to a moment, precisely nine minutes."
 JONES. "Nine! I told you three."
 COOK. "Yes, Sir; but there are three eggs. Of course, if one takes three minutes' boiling, three must take nine. I may be a fool, Sir, but I happen to know what three times three makes for all that."

When are your eyes like isinglass?—When you put on spectacles, your eyes then are eyes in glass.

What bird would you expect to find the toughest in carving?—A Wood-cock.

THE MONEY MARKET.—Such is the state of commercial depression in the foreign markets that nature has been assisting to raise the wind by a series of Cyclones. A panic was the result.

AN UNACCOUNTABLE FACT.—It is astonishing what ugly women you do sometimes see with a ring on the left fourth finger.

RULES FOR RECRUITING THE ARMY.

The army is to be recruited every year by lot. Those who draw the lowest numbers are to set off the same night; the rest are allowed till the next morning to take leave of their families.

All young men over twenty-one are subject to conscription, whatever may be their stature. To procure uniformity in the ranks, the small ones are to be provided with tall hats and high-heeled boots.

Any one is at liberty to furnish a substitute whom, however, he must accompany every where, so as to take his place in case he should be disabled by a bullet.

The sons of widows are exempt from service while their mother remains a widow. N.B.—All widows are required to marry again within a year after their husband's death.

Bodily infirmities constitute no exemption from military service. Invalids are to be paired so that two shall make a whole soldier; a cripple with good eyes to be mounted on the shoulders of a near-sighted man with sound legs, and so on.

After seven years' service every soldier is free to return home, and is only required, first, never to take off his uniform; second, to devote two hours a day to drilling; and, third, to go every night to the barracks to sleep.

Octogenarians are to be placed in the home-guard and never to be sent on expeditions more than five hundred miles away.

Why is a person who can not guess a riddle like one who finds a pistol at his head with a demand for his purse?—Because both are obliged to give it up.

A COMPLIMENT.—An Irish waiter once complimented a salmon in the following manner: "Faith, it's not two hours since that salmon was walking round his real estate, with his hands in his pockets, never dreaming what a pretty invitashun he'd have to jine you jintlemen at dinner."

Wanted to know, whether the clerk of the weather is a good coachman? as he is in the habit of holding the reins (reins).

A RECEIPT IN FULL.

"Paper from tow is said to have been invented and made at Berlin, so difficult, if not impossible, to be counterfeited, that it will supersede all other fabrics for bank-notes, stamps, etc."

All receipts given on this paper will be acknowledged in to-to.

REMARKABLE REMARKS.

"I want an engagement," as the old maid said to an eligible young man.

"Stop that noise," as the woodman said to the bark of a tree.

"No whistling allowed," as the soldier said to the bullets in the field of battle.

"I'm in the dock," as the ship said to her owners.

"I'm stone blind," as the boy remarked when a piece of granite met his eye.

"Bakings carefully attended to," as the sun said on a hot, windy day.

"No smoking permitted," as the fellow exclaimed when a widow brought her "weeds" into the house.

"I don't admire ladies' cuffs," as the husband said when his wife boxed his ears.

"I'm to the manor born," as the son and heir informed his father.

"I've no grounds for complaint," as the cup of clear coffee remarked.

"So-fa(r) so good," as the lady said when she sat on an easy couch.

"You are a duck," as the drake said to his mate.

"I've had a drop too much," as the man exclaimed when he was hanged.

A little one after undergoing the disagreeable operation of vaccination exclaimed, "Now I won't have to be baptized, will I?"

MOTTO FOR THE ISLAND OF ST. THOMAS.—"When taken to be well shaken."

How may you keep eggs from spoiling?—By eating them while they're fresh.

Why are people who stutter not to be relied on?—Because they are always breaking their word.

A little boy in New Bedford, in giving an account to his brother of the Garden of Eden, said, "The Lord made a gardener, and put him in the garden to take care of it; and to see that nobody hurt anything, or pasted bills on the trees."

What did the spider do when he came out of the ark?—He took a fly and went home.

Freddy, a fair-haired youngster of four summers, the other day, after being for some time lost in thought, broke out thus: "Pa, can God do any thing?" "Yes, dear." "Can he make a two-year-old colt in two minutes?" "Why, he would not wish to do that, Freddy." "But if he did wish to could he?" "Yes, certainly, if he wished to." "What! in two minutes?" "Yes, in two minutes." "Well, then, he wouldn't be two years old, would he?"

"What!" exclaimed an Irishman to a gentleman who was threatening to chastise his dog for barking incessantly; "what, would ye bate the dumb animal for spakin' out?"

A TOAST—"THE LADIES."

The cemetery at Tippinsville is about undergoing various improvements. In the course of an argument in favor of the proposed renovation, good old Deacon T— remarked that it was a duty to render the place as attractive as possible, "because"—with a sigh—"we shall all be buried there if we live!"

"Mary Magdalene had seven devils cast out of her. I never heard of a man having seven devils cast out of him," growled a cynical bachelor, in the course of a discussion on the "woman question." "No, they are not cast out yet, I believe," was the quiet response of his fair antagonist.

"Oh, that my father was seized with a remittent fever!" sighed a young spendthrift at college.

Why is a thief your only true philosopher?—Because he regards every thing from an abstract point of view, is opposed to all notions of protection, and is open to conviction.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1868.

[SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS.
$4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1868, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

Coiffures.

Fig. 1.—Scarf coiffure of black guipure, caught up at the side by a spray of velvet leaves. The ends of the scarf are confined under the chin by a similar bouquet.

Fig. 2.—Dress cap of puffed muslin mounted on lace. The crown simulates a single puff, and is encircled with mauve ribbon, and trimmed with bows on the front and back. The whole cap is bordered with guipure lace and narrow mauve ribbons, the ends of which form strings, and are tied beneath the chignon.

Fig. 3.—“Peasant” breakfast-cap. This cap is composed of a large crown, made of guipure insertion, and a small border trimmed with narrow guipure. The border is trimmed in front with loops of blue ribbon set on similar ribbon laid flat, and the ends of which form strings that tie behind.

Evening and Opera Toilettes.

Fig. 1.—Empire skirt of pearl-gray pout de soie. Corsage of white tarlatan, gathered all round into cherry silk, edged with narrow lace, and Middle-Age sleeves in two pieces, with white puffing at the elbow. Lace cuffs. Broad corselet-ceinture of cherry silk, knotted at the side. White kid gloves.

Fig. 2.—Dress of tea-rose pout de soie, covered with an opera cloak of white silk, trimmed with white galloon embroidered with gold. This cloak is loose and open up the middle of the back, the opening being finished at the top with a Gothic ornament. The collar is trimmed with heavy silk tassels, matching the galloon. The close sleeves are likewise open in the back, and are trimmed in the same manner. White kid gloves.

Fancy Costumes.

See illustration, page 248.

At this season of the year, when fancy dress and masquerade parties are favorite amusements, we feel sure that the illustrations of costumes which we present will be found especially useful. These costumes can be varied and adapted to children, and will suggest many ideas to be carried out by persons of taste and ingenuity.

Fig. 1.—TYROLIAN costume of dark-brown velvet, composed of a jacket, open and rounded in front, and bound and trimmed with green satin galloon, and tight knee-breeches, confined by a gold buckle and buttons. The shirt-collar is turned down over a black and white cravat, twisted à la Colin. A breast-plate of scarlet cloth, trimmed round the edge with broad white and gold galloon, reaches half-way to the throat. A belt of black velvet, trimmed in front with white galloon, and a small hat of green cloth, with a long green plume and a variegated palm leaf, completes this picturesque dress. Striped stockings and high gaiters.

Fig. 2.—SWEDISH. This is a simple costume, well suited to a young girl. It is composed of a skirt of brown cashmere, bordered with a broad strip of blue silk, trimmed with four rows of velvet of different widths, the narrow velvet being in the middle. Bodice like the skirt, bordered with black velvet, with narrow velvet shoulder-straps. Under-waist of raw silk, trimmed round the neck and down the front with a strip of cherry silk, edged with gold galloon and narrow black lace. Flowing sleeves. Apron of raw silk. Leghorn hat, turned up at the side, with a cluster of honey-suckle. Wreath of the same flowers round the crown.

Fig. 3.—ITALIAN. White silk skirt, very short, and lengthened at the bottom by a wide lace flounce over white silk, surmounted by a ruche of blue silk. Short fourreau of blue silk, open at the side, and bordered with a bias fold of white silk, on which three rows of gold and pink galloon are arranged alternately. The fourreau is laced at the side with blue galloon. Bodice of black velvet, edged with pink galloon; yellow, blue, and pink shoulder-knots. Low-necked batiste under-waist, with short, puffed sleeves, confined by narrow black velvet ribbon around the neck and the bottom of the sleeves. Necklace of two rows of gold beads, and long ear-rings. Small round lace cap, encircled with a wreath of full-blown roses.

Fig. 4.—Sergeant Fritz, the handsome soldier of the Grand Duchess of Gérolstein. Coat of white cloth with collar, broad cuffs, and facings of black velvet, studded with white buttons, and bound with scarlet galloon. Louis XV. waistcoat of scarlet cloth, with gold braid and buttons. Knee-breeches of white cloth; white gaiters with gold buttons, and velvet garters. Shoulder-belt and musket. High cap of scarlet cloth, elaborately trimmed with gold braid, and a small scarlet feather in the top.

Fig. 5.—SPANIARD. Spanish costume composed of a short skirt, encircled with bands of different colors. The lower part of the skirt is of crimson silk, trimmed with two rows of broad black satin ribbon, embroidered with hieroglyphics in gold, and edged with narrow gold braid. Above the second black band is a strip of white silk, covered with a flounce of rich Spanish lace, surmounted by gold braid. All the rest of the skirt is of black silk or satin. Over the white satin waist is worn a very small black velvet jacket, bordered with several rows of gold sequins and grelots. The upper part of the waist is of lace, edged with sequins. The short sleeve, of crimson silk, is likewise covered with sequins. Crimson satin gaiters, edged round the top with a rim of gold and gold tags. Hair in curls, confined behind by a chased gold band, with two red roses at the temple. Tambourine in the hand.

Fig. 6.—CHINESE. Over-skirt of rich gold brocade, bordered, like the pagoda sleeve, with a broad violet velvet band, embroidered with strange flowers. Blue silk sash, tied behind, with long ends. Very narrow under-skirt of green and white brocade silk, scalloped round the bottom, and bound with violet velvet, which also separates the stripes. Hieroglyphics embroidered on the white stripes. High Japanese wooden shoes. Hair combed straight back, and confined with a gold comb and Japanese hair-pins. Mandolin in the hand.

Fig. 7.—PACHA. Full green trowsers. Yellow slippers. Short jacket of red velvet, richly trimmed with gold braid. Long open sleeves of the same material. Broad Algerine sash, with a large pistol stuck therein. Close-fitting vest, of steel and gold stripes, with tight sleeves, ornamented with sequins. Turban of white cashmere. Long nargileh, and white beard.

Fig. 8.—GREEK. Full trowsers of maroon cloth. Short jacket of the same material, with coat sleeves, elaborately trimmed with black gullion. Sash of crimson silk. Red cap, with heavy green tassel. Turned-down collar and cuffs. White silk stockings.

STEP GENTLY!

Step gently! speak softly!
She comes—she is nigh,
With a blush on her cheek
And a light in her eye,
With the smile on her lips
And the flash of her hair,
For never, oh never!
Was woman so fair!

Step gently! speak softly!
She stands in the light,
Her eyes and her blushes,
Her hair golden bright,
With a smile on her face
As she stands near me there,
For never, oh never!
Was woman so fair!

Step gently! speak softly!
She comes—she is nigh,
With a calm on her face
And a light in her eye,
With a seal on her lips
And a halo of hair,
And never, oh never!
Was vision so fair!

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1868.

THE HAND.

SIR CHARLES BELL, the great surgeon and anatomist, was so impressed with the adaptation of the hand to the various uses of man that he made it the subject of the "Bridge-water" treatise he was appointed to write. He could find no better proof of the manifestation of design on the part of the Creator throughout the whole human structure than in that small but most finished piece of mechanism. The hand is indeed the most serviceable instrument with which man is endowed. It works so obediently to the will of its master that there is nothing within the range of human power that it does not perform. It records indelibly the quickest flash of thought, and gives, in a deadly stroke, terrible expression to the rage of man. Such is its flexibility that it turns in a moment from a blow to a caress, and can wield a club or thread a needle with equal facility.

The hand can not only perform faithfully its own duties, but, when necessary, will act for other parts of the human frame. It reads for the blind, and talks for the deaf and dumb. Machinery itself is but an imitation of the human hand on an enlarged scale; and all the marvelous performances of the former are justly due to the latter. It thus not only thoroughly performs its natural task, but, having the rare quality of extending its powers, enlarges its scope of work almost indefinitely. With the steam-engine, made and worked by itself, the human hand executes wonders of skill and force; and with the electric telegraph it, by the gentlest touch, awakens the sentiment of the whole world and makes it kin.

"For the queen's hand," says an elegant writer, "there is the sceptre, and for the soldier's hand the sword; for the carpenter's hand the saw, and for the smith's hand the hammer; for the farmer's hand the plow; for the miner's hand the spade; for the sailor's hand the oar; for the painter's hand the brush; for the sculptor's hand the chisel; for the poet's hand the pen; and for the woman's hand the needle. If none of these or the like will fit us, the felon's chain should be round our wrist, and our hand on the prisoner's crank." The hand was undoubtedly made for work, and should be used in accordance with its design.

The labor of the hand, however, especially that of the lighter kind, which generally falls to the lot of woman, ought not to prevent a due attention to the preservation of all the grace and beauty with which nature originally endowed it. The idea is prevalent that absolute smallness, without regard to proportion, is essential to the beauty of a woman's hand. This keeps many a young girl idle, lest by work it should become enlarged. The hand will undoubtedly increase in size by use; but, if it only grows in proportion to other parts of the body, so far from this being an ugliness, it will be, according to all the laws of taste, a beauty. Fashion alone can find grace in a female hand dwarfed of its proportions by depriving it of its natural exercise, and by pinching it with a too short and narrow glove. Nothing is uglier, except it be a Chinese club foot, to our sight, than those cramped paws of kid in which our fashionable women delight. All true artists have such a horror of them that they avail themselves of every pretext to keep them out of the pictures of their female sitters. The pinching glove, as generally worn, is not only excessively uncomfortable, especially in cold weather, but it permanently deforms the hand, rendering it lumpy and podgy.

Much can be done by care in beautifying the fingers, upon whose grace depends greatly the beauty of the whole hand. The natural tapering length of these can only be preserved by removing from them all pinching manacles of kid and jewelry. Much of the beauty of the finger depends upon the proper treatment of the nails. These, if cut too close, deform the finger-ends and render them stubby. The upper and free border of the nail should always be left projecting a line or so beyond the extremity of the finger, and should be pared only to a slight curve without encroaching too much on the angles. To preserve the half moon, or what the anatomists call the lunula, which rises just above the root of the nail and is esteemed so great a beauty, care must be taken to keep down the skin which constantly tends to encroach upon it. This should be done with a blunt ivory instrument, and the growth gently pushed away, but never cut. The habit of filing or scraping the nails is fatal to their perfection, as it thickens their substance and destroys their natural transparency. The ordinary finger-brush should alone be used for cleaning and polishing the nails. It is a curious fact that Rousseau records the use of this simple instrument, now indispensable to every cleanly person, as proof of the excessive coxcombry of his friend the courtly Grimm. Thus the luxury of one age becomes the necessity of another.

VANQUISHED PREJUDICES.

IT is pleasant to see prejudices passing away. A man of any inbred truthfulness never conquers a prejudice without feeling that he has not only gotten rid of something noxious, but that he has made a positive addition to his strength and happiness. He has a sense of enlargement, as of one breathing a finer air, or having a fuller command over nerves and muscles. To some extent the same feeling arises when we witness the decay and extinction of prejudices in society. These social prejudices do not affect our inner nature quite as thoroughly or as perniciously as those of a personal kind. They do not mingle with the secret currents of one's temperament, and yet they work a vast amount of evil, not the least of which is the social tyranny which they establish, and which is often strong-handed in the ratio that it is weak-minded.

Late years have done much for us. One of their best services has been to teach us the infinite worth of common-sense as a fundamental requisite in getting along with other people, and particularly with other nations. This common-sense, which has slowly triumphed over hereditary logic and chronic predilections, has led to liberality of opinion, to catholicity of sentiment, and, correspondingly, to a better understanding and tolerance of peculiarities. Thanks to Richard Cobden, England and France are getting to know each other, and to stand together on the basis of interchangeable interests. But this instance of true internationalism is simply typical of what is progressing every where, the main fact of the day being that German interests, Italian interests, American interests, are coalescing each among themselves, and each with one another. This is a large advance in genuine fraternity, and it has been accomplished by trampling down those unreasoning prejudices which, under the prestige of generations, have shut up men in their silly exclusiveness. The good work will go on to perfection. First blows are the hardest; they are the telling master-strokes; and we may rest in cheerful content that others will follow until the end has been grandly attained.

But nearer home, and in matters more immediately touching us, we see this steady progress in dethroning our idolized prejudices. Not many years ago every interest had its aristocracy. There was Art—proud of its inherited position and intent on its solitary self-exaltation; but its selfishness has been compelled to yield; the wood-engraver, the photographer, the Schools of Design, have asserted the claims of the multitude against prejudice and achieved their purpose. There, too, was Literature—courting the patronage of lords and fine ladies, obsequious toward the titled and as contemptuous toward the masses; but the scorned heart of the people gave birth to genius; cheap reading followed; the million were eager enough to read when their own intellect wrote; and on this same multitude, once hooted at and hated, Literature is now relying for its sustenance. There, again, was Science—the haughtiest of all—afraid to soil its fingers with everyday homeliness—right enough in ridiculing "Science made Easy," and wrong in obtuse folly in setting itself against a true popularization of its doctrines and discoveries; and it has had to descend from its pedestal and teach the farmer how to use his commercial manures, and the cook how to economize fuel. And there yet again was even the Pulpit—most home-like and life-like of all institutions, and, notwithstanding this, too remote from popular contact, too much divorced from the practical issues of struggling hearts, and laying not too great a stress on Theology, but too little on Religion—a victim, like all the others, to its prejudices; but now wiser and more genial, and more like Him whose words caught the ears of men on the highways, at the gates of business, and in fishers' boats.

Strange things have happened. So, indeed, would Dr. Johnson think if he could return to the literary society of this day and find himself confronted by the rivals of the other sex. And so Sir Isaac Newton, if he were here and knew such women as Mrs. Somerville. But the strangest of all is that men should be so surprised when their prejudices are battled out of them. Sometimes we have wondered if the demons knew what to do, and how to handle themselves when the devils were driven out of them. Did their eyes see landscape and sky in clear and vivid restoration, and their hands instantly renew the touches of affection, and their hearts, freed from infernal heavings, beat in measures low and sweet the blessed repose which had been breathed into them? Whether so or not, we know something of that bewildering newness of thought and feeling which this age is undergoing in getting disembodied from its old prejudices and building a fresh habitation for its soul.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

A Letter to Melancthon.

MY DEAR MELANCHTHON,—You are kind enough to ask my advice, telling me that you are just about to be ordained to the ministry, and are curious to know my views as to your behavior, or upon the general subject of the manners of a clergyman. When I first wrote to the young Papa whom I had the pleasure of meeting in the cars, I confess that I had no intention of treating the general subject of manners from so many points of view. But you know how a text expands into a treatise; and I hope sincerely, my dear fellow, that in your daily work you will find every text so fruitful that you will never be obliged to wonder where you shall find a subject to discourse upon.

It is very pleasant to know that my letter to our common friend, the young missionary, was of such service. And if I am pleased that he finally decided to remain and attack the paganism and barbarism of New York, think how "somebody else" must feel, the nameless person whose cheek was growing whiter and thinner as the day of his departure drew nearer. If he has erred in staying, it is an error which he can always repair. Africa, and Asia, and the Polynesian Islands are always open for missionary effort; but I shall still contend that the Sixth Ward and Mackerelville are no less so; and if a man has the zeal of a missionary "pure and simple," without morbid feeling or wish of personal distinction—for that takes many forms—I am persuaded he is quite as likely to devote himself to New York as to sail for Cochin China.

However, you have not asked me to exchange pulpits, so that I have no right to preach upon this occasion. And to come straight to the point, I hope you will remember, to begin with the outside, that in this country the clergy are not a priesthood, and that therefore any uniform, whether of dress or of manner, is not desirable. Look at our young friend, the Reverend Samuel Shuffle, as good a young fellow as can be found—a very blameless man and excellent preacher. Now can you tell me why, because a man chooses to devote his energies to preaching and visiting the widows and fatherless, he should put himself into such an extraordinary costume as that in which the Reverend Samuel Shuffle goes forth upon his daily pilgrimage? I look at him in amazement. His hat has a certain lowness of crown and breadth of brim—by no means a Quaker hat, but a hat distinctly different from that of other men. It varies just enough to be peculiar. Then, he is clad always in black—black coat, waistcoat, and trowsers. The waistcoat is single-breasted and has a standing collar, and the Reverend Samuel either wears a white cravat, so stiffened as to resemble the collar of the ministers of the Church of Rome, or else that very collar itself. Moreover, his rosy face is smoothly shaven so as to leave neat mutton rib-chop whiskers upon each cheek.

My dear Melancthon, the Reverend Samuel Shuffle has exactly the same right with you and me to wear such clothes and in such a fashion as he chooses. But why is it that only men of his profession—and not all of them by any means—indulge in this remarkable style of apparel? What is the relation between the duties of his profession and a single-breasted waistcoat with a standing collar, or a hat with a broad brim? I knew the Reverend Samuel when he was Sam Shuffle and the same good fellow that he is now. He danced as nimbly as any body; he relished a good opera; he laughed merrily at a simple farce; he was a good rider; a good bowler; he played an excellent game of billiards, and he dressed like the men of his years and acquaintance. He grew a little older and became a clergyman. It was a natural thing for him to do; and every good word he utters is sustained to those who know him by the whole force of his character.

But why should he have made himself externally so different? If the duties he has undertaken were merely ceremonial, then, of course, he should wear a costume suitable to the ceremony. But they are not. They are most real and earnest. His business is to show me and all men the beauty of holiness, that we may be drawn toward the House Beautiful as Bunyan was; or, if you choose, he is to show us the sure penalty of outraging the divine laws. My dear Melancthon, is it not, then, his first duty to establish between us a perfect community of feeling? You observe he does not claim authority to compel. He assents to a logical process. He proposes only to persuade my reason, or to touch my apprehension. Therefore the more he separates himself from me in unessential things the less likely he is to succeed in his work. If I, or any other man, see him in a certain costume and with a certain manner, we naturally suppose that what he says is, in some way, a part of what he wears; that he is not a man dealing simply with other men, but some kind of official personage whom we do not recognize.

Inevitably, therefore, although I know how good a man he is, when I now meet the Reverend Samuel Shuffle, the feeling is instinctive, and it is not peculiar to me, that he hopes to help out the impressiveness of the truths he utters by his clothes; that he is secretly hoping to speak with the authority of some hierarchy or institution. But, my good Samuel, the only authority which I or any other truly sane man can acknowledge is that of the truth. If I do not feel what you say to be true in itself, it certainly becomes no truer because of some material pomp or circumstance. And to tell you exactly what I feel, the truth somehow always seems much truer when it is simply uttered, than when it is artificially mouthed.

And so to pass from manner in dress to manner in delivery—why should the Reverend Samuel leave all naturalness and simplicity of tone and style when he ascends the pulpit, and express himself whether in preaching or in reading in such a thoroughly artificial way? If you have heard Mr. Dickens read the trial scene from Pickwick, you have remarked in the absurdity of the tone and pronunciation of Sergeant Buzfuz exactly in kind what I remark in the Reverend Samuel Shuffle. The tone and pronunciation of Mr. Shuffle are not precisely those of Sergeant Buzfuz, but they are just as suggestive of insincerity; they are just as far from the honest simplicity of nature. In both cases it is the "hack" style, and that is wholly repulsive in the Reverend Samuel's profession. I wonder that he does not observe that all the most effective orators are the most simple of speakers. Declamation carries no conviction; and when a fellow-creature who wishes to show me the charm of religious resignation to sorrow, for instance, first attires himself grotesquely and then puts his voice and manner into costume, he has separated himself so far from me that I can scarcely believe the truth he utters to be true.

I am, therefore, always very much inclined to suspect that the gentlemen of your profession, my dear Melancthon, who isolate themselves from the rest of us in dress and manner, are a little doubtful of their ability to get on without those supports; and I am very apt to find that the most vigorous, efficient, and inspiring clergymen avoid a uniform as much as possible. If you would lead men they must feel that you understand them; and if you would understand them you must share their experience. I remember that one of the best men and most effective preachers and efficient pastors I ever knew came to me in inexpressible indignation because he heard women and ministers so constantly classed together. "Men," said he, "don't treat me as they do other men."

They have a kind of tolerating air, as if it were not good-manners to go away, but as if they would be very glad when I went away from them. And no wonder," he added, bitterly. "The customs of my profession seclude me from real contact with others; and they know it; and when I preach they feel that I don't know what I am talking about."

That, you see, is a different feeling from that of the Reverend Samuel Shuffle. But you, my dear Melanchthon, are too wise to follow Samuel. Don't be afraid, if you have a real relation with your people, that they will be troubled by your wearing a colored cravat, and a comfortable coat, and a hat like other people. If your relation is not real, the more queer hat and white cravat you wear the better. The great want of the clergy in our Church is a hearty and humane contempt of Mrs. Grundy. I saw some very truthful remarks upon that very subject in a late Number of Harper's Magazine—an admirable work, to which I hope, dear Melanchthon, that you regularly subscribe. The author, who was evidently an old gentleman of experience, denounced Mrs. Grundy as the most intolerable tyrant of your profession, gossiping and grumbling and censuring in such a manner that, except for her sex, the more ardent of ours might be willing to call her to account. My advice to you is in one phrase, if you understand how comprehensive it is: Despise Mrs. Grundy; and when she calls herself a healthy public opinion, insist upon showing her the door, under plea of the necessity of getting your sermon ready.

And, dear Melanchthon, be as chary of the hat and single-breasted waistcoat business as you can. Learn of life, not of books only. Don't make men feel that you have come out of your study into the pulpit, but out of the world, and its darkest and brightest ways. Then they will feel, in the homely phrase, that you know what you are talking about.

Your friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

MATERIALS for skating-suits should be chosen for service and durability, as the most experienced skaters are liable to accidents on a crowded rink. Cloth, serge, velveteen, and poplin are more appropriate than the handsome velvet and plush dresses in vogue this winter. The skirt of the dress should be shorter than the usual walking-dress, and not so full. Tight-fitting basquines are the most jaunty wraps. Loose redingotes and paletots of the same material as the dress are preferred for slender figures. A belt with short sash ends is worn with loose garments.

Gray felt cloth, entirely water-proof, makes an appropriate skating-costume. It is a yard and seven-eighths wide. Six yards make the short dress and jacket. The price ranges from $2 50 to $4 a yard, according to quality. Skirts of real Scotch woolen plaid, such as are worn by children, are bright and pretty, with dark velvet jackets and turbans. We have seen some very beautiful suits of English corduroy, light-gray skirts, and short basques, worn with a longer skirt of blue poplin, or over green ottoman reps.

There has been a further reduction of twenty-five per cent. in the low price demanded for furs at the beginning of the season. Very pretty skating-sets of Siberian squirrel, short boas, and pocket-muffs, ornamented with the head of the animal from which the fur is taken, are bought for $12. Similar sets of black Astrakhan are $15, and ermine varies from $20 to $30. Krimmer sets for misses are sold for $10. Round muffs and capes require almost twice as much fur as the flat pocket-muffs and boa, and are consequently double the price. Skating turbans of seal-skin and of Krimmer, adorned with wings of gay plumage or clusters of metallic leaves, are $12. Those of Astrakhan and Persian have long tassels of the fur.

Borders of fur for trimming are sold by the yard. Astrakhan bands two inches wide may be bought for $2 a yard, but there is a superior quality worth $6. Real ermine bands vary in price, according to quality, from $4 to $8, and mink from $5 to $10.

A pretty costume is of bright blue cloth bordered with gray chinchilla plush around the skirt and half-way up the seams. Short, tight basque, trimmed to match. Gray chinchilla hat, with blue wing at the side.

Another is of gray felt cloth, with scarlet band of opera cloth on the skirt and jacket, edged with mixed gray and red embroidery. Gray felt turban, trimmed with a shirred band of scarlet velvet, and fan rosette on the left.

An Oriental suit is of black Thibet cloth, made with full trousers, short skirt, and jacket. The trimming is a broad Cashmere band in the gay Persian colors, with narrow silk fringe on either side. A full turban is gathered at the centre of the crown, with long silk tassel of bright colors.

A black velveteen skirt is entirely untrimmed. Long Polonaise, reaching within ten inches of the edge of the skirt, with scarlet velvet revers on the waist and facings at the side and on the wrist. Velvet cap, with scarlet wing. A plaid suit with Highland scarf and pouch is very gay, among many more sombre ones.

An olive-green dress is of the spotted English velvet. The dress is gored with skirt and body in one, and trimmed à la militaire with narrow bands of gray plush. A short, round mantle, quite open in front, leaves the arms free, and displays the figure to fine advantage. A jaunty cap of green velvet, with gilt aigrette at the side.

A very rich suit is of ruby velvet. The skirt is almost entirely concealed by the long redingote, which is bordered with bands of black Astrakhan four inches wide. An Astrakhan belt, with pocket attached, confines this loose garment at the waist. Deep-pointed collar and cuffs of the same fur, with small turban and flat muff, complete one of the most attractive costumes of the season. Another, very handsome, has a skirt of purple Ottoman reps, with basquine of purple plush trimmed with ermine. A black velours is faced with scarlet plush, with vandyked plush border on the jacket. Tassels finish the sharp vandykes.

CARRIAGE AND SLEIGH ROBES.

There is a handsome display of carriage and sleigh robes this season. The most valuable is a lion's skin, large enough to deserve its name of Nemean. The stuffed head and claws are perfect, and with half-open mouth and glittering teeth look savage and threatening. The price is $200. Tiger robes, said to be the royal Bengal, are marked $150. The head is also attached to these, and is to be thrown over the back of the sleigh. Polar bears' skins of immense size, with white, glossy fur, as soft as eider-down, are $125.

Smooth, silky beaver robes, gray or brown, are most suitable for ladies' carriage Afghans. They are lined with scarlet or orange-colored cloth, which is fancifully notched to form a border. Others are lined with heavy plush. These vary in price from $60 to $80. Lap robes of the white fox skin are from $50 to $100. The corners are ornamented with foxes' tails. Black bear's skin, from $75 to $100, are very desirable, as they are thick and soft, and very glossy.

VARIETIES.

Among the latest importations shown us are some dress silks of beautiful quality, in new colors and strange combinations. The patterns are simple narrow stripes, solid and even, only a few threads in each. The colors are most brilliant, often contrasting widely, yet so prettily blended that each softens the other. Fancy, if you can, alternate stripes of the gay marigold and rich capucine toned down to a quiet and tasteful shade. Another pattern has a purple stripe on a chameleon ground of pink and gray; still another is apple green with mauve; again there are tiny threads of cuir color on Bismarck, and two shades of lavender on white. These silks are three quarters of a yard wide, and worth the price asked for them—$4 50.

A dinner dress with skirt, made and trimmed in Paris, is marked $250. It is made of gros grain of a rich golden brown. Several yards are furnished for corsage, skirt, and sleeves. The trained skirt, two yards and a half long in the back, consists of nine widths; a sloped front breadth, three narrow gored ones on each side, and two full widths behind. The sloped widths are very narrow at the waist, requiring only one pleat in each to fit it to the belt. The two back widths are gauged in deep French gathers. A waving flounce is sewn ten inches from the edge of the skirt. This is of brown guipure lace on alternate widths with bias silk ruffles bound with satin, and ornamented with chenille ball fringe.

Another imported dress, entirely made, is of steel gray poplin with thread-like stripes of black, gored in the Princesse style, corsage and skirt in one. Cross-cut bands of shot poplin, gray and black, with black guipure insertion in the centre and edged with vandyked velvet, form the trimming. Two such bands are sewn down the front, each side of the buttons, thence around the skirt and up the centre of the back width to the belt. Coat-sleeves, wrists, and epaulets surrounded with two bands and butterfly-bows. A fichu of the shot poplin is arranged as a berth in the back, with large bow and sash ends. Steel and ebony buttons. Price $150.

A Bismarck faille, made by one of our most tasteful modistes, has a Pompadour waist. The square neck is filled in with Valenciennes. A square tablier, or apron, is arranged on the front width by three bands of faille of a darker brown than the dress, corded with satin of a still darker shade. Below the folds at the bottom of the tablier are bias ruffles bound with satin. Leaf-rosettes, or dahlias, of the different shades combined in the trimming, are in the corners of the apron. A larger tablier is arranged on the train. Bands and ruffles about the square neck and on the cuffs of the coat-sleeves. Belt of narrow folds with broad sash ends at the back. A large dahlia ornaments the sash.

A pretty coiffure for morning negligée is of blond-lace over pink silk. A square medallion is for the top of the head. Long lace lappets fall over the chignon, and pink crape rouleaux form a coronet at the sides, on which are small beetles, real bugs, their green backs glistening like enamel.

A breakfast-suit for a Southern climate is of thick nansook. A short, round jacket is worn over a puffed waist. The skirt is long and gored. Two standing ruffles of Valenciennes trim the neck and wrists of the jacket. Bands of cambric insertion and Valenciennes, arranged diagonally in square blocks, are inserted down the front. An outside breast-pocket is ruffled with lace, and a monogram is embroidered in the centre. Two box-pleated ruffles are on the edge of the skirt, above them is a row of lace blocks or medallions.

The becoming Duchesse cravat, or collar, is easily made by forming a puff of white net over blue ribbon. A narrow lace on either side. The puff laps at the brooch. Wider lace and appliqué embroidery are sewn at each end, forming tabs.

The fashionable feather trimming is seen on imported veils. A square of Brussels net pointed below the chin, has a border of delicate white and black feathers, and tiny pearl beads.

Sashes are worn wider, and not so long. Rosettes or bows are placed near each end. Lace sashes are worn for evening full toilette. Those of black velvet are lined with scarlet or capucine, or with white satin. Heavy netted fringe and jet pendants on the pointed ends.

A green silk dress, part of a bridal outfit, is cut Gabrielle, and trimmed with long barbes of black thread lace, beginning half-way up the bodice, and reaching below the knee, two on each side of the front. Knots of lace on cuffs and wrist.

For courtesies received we are indebted to Madame DIEBEN; Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co.; LORD & TAYLOR; C. G. GUNTHER & Sons; F. BOOS; and many others.

PERSONAL.

THE Bazar is enabled to state on the best authority that Mlle. ADELINA PATTI's nuptials with the MARQUIS DE CAUX will take place next September. The Marquis is about forty-two, very accomplished, very practical, and sensible, and a favorite of the Emperor and Empress. Indeed, the latter has addressed a congratulatory note to Miss PATTI, in which she has expressed the pleasure with which, as MARQUISE DE CAUX, she will be received at the French Court.

—On duty that General SICKLES is busily engaged in preparing a book on the war. Probably no man in the country, certainly no man in the army, is more familiar with the public men and measures of his time than General S., and none more competent to criticize the events of the last few years with greater skill, or who possesses the capacity to record his statements and reflections in a style to command the attention of the literary as well as the political and military world.

—General HANCOCK is a wag as well as warrior. General JAMES LONGSTREET called to see him the other day, at New Orleans, and sent in his card. General H. came out, took him into the parlor, and spoke the words following, 'twit, namely: "Ladies and gentlemen, allow me to introduce to you a gallant gentleman, to whom I am indebted for an ungraceful limp, and whom I had the misfortune to wing in the same combat." Although the company was composed exclusively of ladies and gentlemen whose sympathies were on the Union side in the late war, the incident excited a profound and pleasurable sensation.

—The American Minister, Mr. CHARLES FRANCOIS ADAMS, is said to be the author of the clever editorials in the London Star on American politics.

—Miss FENNIMAN, formerly of Union Square, but for some years a belle in Paris, is about to change her local habitation and her name and become the wife of M. ROMERO, Secretary of the Spanish Embassy at France. The FENNIMANS are opulent, very.

—A very young member of the Assembly of this State is making his mark as a graceful and accomplished speaker. His name is LAWRENCE D. KIERNAN; he is only 23 years of age, and graduated from the Free Academy with the first premium for prize speaking. He represents one of the districts of this city. The handsomest member of the New York delegation is said to be WILLIAM L. WILEY, who has recently inherited a handsome fortune. He represents the philosophers of Manhattanville.

—The venerable Dr. SPRING, who for 58 years has been pastor of the "Brick Church," was able to be present and address his congregation on the 5th inst., it being the celebration of the centenary of its existence. The First Presbyterian Church, of which the Rev. Dr. FANTON is pastor, is now in the 149th year of its organization.

—Judge BUSTEED, of Alabama, is slowly recovering from his wounds. He is confined to his room, and obliged to remain as much as possible in one posture to enable the flesh to heal firmly around the ball yet in his body, which the surgeons were unable to extract.

—A Chicago lady is stated to be the owner of the residence of Napoleon I., at St. Helena. That is just like Chicago.

—Mrs. STONEWALL JACKSON is reported to have received $15,000 from the sale of the "Life" of her husband.

—The moral atmosphere of the court and military institutions of Prussia is of a high and rigid order. Much of this is said to be due to the present Queen of Prussia, and the growing influence of the Crown Princess, the daughter of Prince ALBERT and VICTORIA, of England. The latter is said to have inherited from her father wise, decided, and highly moral attributes of character; so she exerts, in an unobtrusive, modest way, an influence for good. She does not hesitate to express her convictions of right, though they may differ widely from those of the King and his adviser and chief minister, Count BISMARCK.

—The Rev. CHARLES BEECHER, who was suspended a few years ago from preaching, by a Congregational Conference, has recently received notice that the vote suspending him was un-Congregational and unconstitutional, and is, therefore, rescinded. Suspending really good men from the exercise of the ministry on purely technical grounds doesn't seem to amount to much nowadays.

—Mr. BRENSTADT is in the most elevated sort of English clover, having been invited by the Queen to send some of his pictures to the Royal Palace at Osborne, for Her Majesty and the Royal Family to see. Mr. B. writes: "I was also desired to accompany them. I did so, and was much pleased with the very kind manner in which I was received. Her Majesty is a very charming and agreeable lady, and makes one feel quite at home in her presence. She seemed much pleased with my works. I was then invited to see the Palace, partake of lunch," etc.

—ELLIOTT, the portrait painter of the time, is in town for the winter, to paint several of our most prominent citizens—Mayor HOFFMAN (for the Governor's Room, City Hall), MARSHALL O. ROBERTS (a full length), Mr. S. B. CHITTENDEN, Mr. WILLIAMS (President of the Metropolitan Bank), etc., etc. ELLIOTT was never in finer brush than now.

—The Princess MARY, wife of Prince TROK, a most beautiful and charming woman, recently laid the foundation-stone of a new church at Brentford. The religious part of the service was performed by Bishop QUINTARD, whose address on the occasion is said to have been very impressive. At the luncheon which followed the Hon. SPENCER WALPOLE presided.

—Mr. MOTLEY's new volumes, just published by the HARPERS, meet with marked favor at the hands of the English press. The Saturday Review says: "Not the least of Mr. MOTLEY's merits is that he always writes, as an American writing of those times always should write, in the spirit of an Englishman." The work is having a large sale.

—Miss THACKERAY had the pleasure of being christened EUPHRAIA ELLA VICTORIA REGINA SARAH. Said to be a very pleasant girl, and writes nicely.

—"ANNIE THOMAS" is the writing name of Mrs. PENDER CUDLIP, whose novels, published by the HARPERS, are among the best of the day.

—Bishop SELWYN, the new bishop of Litchfield, is a prelate who in a certain sense verifies the remark of CONYBEARE, that "the clergymen of the English Church might be divided into Nimrods, ramrods, and fish-rod-men." The anecdote is current that he owed his appointment to New Zealand to the fact that he was the only clergyman who could swim around the island.

—Mr. GEORGE PEABODY has caused to be made a service of solid silver (12 pieces), inlaid with gold, on each piece of which is inscribed, "GEORGE PEABODY TO CYRUS W. FIELD in testimony and commemoration of an act of very high commercial integrity and honor. New York, November 24, 1866." On each piece, also, are medallions of Mr. PEABODY and Mr. FIELD.

—The French Minister at Washington, M. DE POTHENY, is a bachelor, tall, distingué in appearance, and always draped in the height of fashion. It is reported that he has suggested to a Washington belle the propriety of "changing her local habitation and her name," and becoming Mrs. B.

—Mr. BANOROFF has been having a pleasant time with a little crowd of American girls, seven in number, who are traveling in Europe for pleasure. They belong to some of the first families in the Northern States, one of them being the daughter of a Governor, and are enormously rich, and came with letters of introduction to Mr. BANOROFF, who has extended to them his fullest protection. On the evening of their arrival from Hamburg they sent for the head-waiter of the hotel, who, of course, speaks English, and requested him to accompany them to a concert. The knight of the knife and fork, a very handsome man, easily obtained leave of absence for the evening, and, dressed in the most elegant toilette he could procure, gladly accompanied the young ladies to the concert, where they, despite his strenuous opposition, paid both for their own tickets and his. They were to spend a month in Berlin to see the sights; but, adds the writer, "the matter is much talked of here, and can not be quite reconciled with European ideas of propriety."

—A gentleman notable for wealth, benevolence, and intellect is GERRIT SMITH, of Peterboro, in this State, who resides in a fine old mansion, surrounded with gardens, lawns, graperies, green-houses, etc. Mr. SMITH's father received from the Oneida Indians fifty thousand acres of land. At his death the property descended to his son GERRIT. These lands he has gradually sold and given away, until five hundred acres only remain, and these constitute the present home-farm, which is under the care and management of his grandson, GERRIT MILLER. GERRIT SMITH's own purchases of lands have been further to the north—many of them at and near Oswego, and at one time he held seven hundred and fifty thousand acres. The immediate family of Mr. SMITH consists of himself, wife, son, and daughter. The daughter, Mrs. MILLER, now traveling with her husband in Europe, has a country seat near her father. Her two sons, GERRIT and WILLIAM, at present make their home with their grandparents. Mrs. SMITH, formerly one of the Prizewinners of Maryland, is a lady of quiet manners, with an affectionate, sympathetic nature, having a keen perception of the beautiful in nature, music, and the fine arts. She is an ornament to society, and at the same time fully awake to the practical part of life necessary in good housekeeping, is a tower of strength to her husband, and seconds heartily all his movements for the good of mankind. Mrs. JAMES G. BIRNEY, a sister of Mrs. SMITH, now visiting the family, is a lady of marked ability and force of character, who, with her buoyant health and sprightly manners, gives great life and cheerfulness to the household. GERRIT SMITH (or Garrit, as he is called by his neighbors) is one of the most genial and hospitable of men. His guests are made at once to feel that they are members of his family. He is seventy years of age, but his fine physique and cheerful spirit make him appear much younger. Rising at five in the morning, he occupies his time in study, or in directing matters out of doors until the hour arrives for family worship. This ceremony he conducts in a most impressive manner—first by reading, or repeating some familiar hymn, and frequently leading the singing himself, though usually this is done by Mrs. SMITH. He then repeats, without referring to the printed page, a chapter from the Bible, for he seems to have memorized the entire book. Then follows a prayer, earnest and powerful, and full of love to God and man. His voice, deep and sonorous in tone, adds greatly to the beauty of his song, recitation, or prayer. As frequently occurs in deeply religious natures, there is in Mr. SMITH a latent vein of wit and merriment which sparkles out in many ways in social converse with his friends. No entertainment is more charming than his dinner-talk.

—In Colonel BADEN's history of General GRANT the prominent traits of the General's character are thus concisely and neatly summed up:

"The truth is, that GRANT's extreme simplicity of behavior and directness of expression imposed on various officers, both above and below him. They thought him a good, plain man, who had blundered into one or two successes, and who, therefore, could not be immediately removed; but they deemed it unnecessary to regard his judgment, or to count upon his ability. His superiors made their plans invariably without consulting him, and his subordinates sometimes sought to carry out their own campaigns, in opposition or indifference to his orders, not doubting that, with their superior intelligence, they could conceive and execute triumphs which would excuse or even vindicate their course. It is impossible to understand the early history of the war without taking it into account that neither the Government nor its important commanders gave GRANT credit for intellectual ability or military genius.

"His officer qualities were also rated low. Because he was patient, some thought it impossible to provoke him; and because of his calmness, it was supposed that he was stolid. In battle or in campaigning he did not seem to care or consider so much what the enemy was doing as what he himself meant to do; and this trait, to enthusiastic or even brilliant soldiers, appeared inexplicable. A great commander, it was imagined, should be nervous, excitable, inspiring his men and captivating his officers; calling private soldiers by their names, making eloquent addresses in the field, and waving his drawn sword in battle. Great commanders had done all these things, and won; and many men who could do all these things fancied themselves therefore great commanders. Others imagined wisdom to consist in science alone; they sought success in learned and elaborate plans, requiring months to develop when the enemy was immediately before them; they maneuvered when it was the time to fight; they intrenched when they should have attacked, and studied their books when the field should have been their only problem."

Alphabet in Satin Stitch.

This alphabet is designed for marking handkerchiefs, table-linen, etc., and is easily wrought, even by those unaccustomed to embroidery. The accompanying first letter of the alphabet shows the manner of execution. First make the outline of the letter in satin stitch, with white embroidery cotton, and then work over this with black silk or red worsted, so as to give it the appearance of a fine cord, as is shown in the illustration, which gives the letter magnified.

Apple-Seed Comb.

Three rosettes with which this comb is ornamented are made of apple seeds, fastened on a circular piece of stiff lace and varnished. The illustration shows the comb two-thirds the full size. The stiff lace is encircled with fine wire. The seeds are sewed on with fine silk, in single rows, beginning at the outer edge, and placing them in such a manner that the round side shall be uppermost. When completed, the rosettes are varnished with shellac dissolved in spirits. They are then dried, after which they are glued to the comb and given a coating of copal varnish.

Black Velvet Cravat.

This cravat is of black velvet ribbon, the ends of which are embroidered with bright-colored crochet silks in any design that may be wished, and are finished with knotted fringe, as seen in the engraving.

Child's Knit Under-Jacket.

MATERIALS: 1 oz. white split worsted.

Knit with rather coarse steel needles, in order to have it light and flexible. Begin at the border-row of the back; cast on 80 stitches and knit 90 rounds plain backward and forward. In the next round cast off the first 32 stitches for the arm-hole; knit 2 rounds, cast on 40 stitches and knit 50 rounds. In the 51st round cast off the first 12 stitches next the neck, then cast off 1 stitch in every 2d round from the 53d to the 74th, and knit afterward 25 rounds. The jacket is now half completed. For the other half it will be necessary to reverse the order of the rounds. Crochet the back and front together on the back of the shoulder. Collect on the needles all the stitches around the neck and knit 4 rounds plain; then 1 round. * 2 stitches knitted together; 2 made, 2 knitted together; 3 knitted. Repeat from *. Then follow 5 rounds plain (in the 1st of which knit the 1st made stitch, purl the 2d, etc.). Cast off. Collect the stitches of the under edge and knit the lace as follows:

1st-3d rounds. Plain.

4th round. * knit 9; make 7 alternate; knit 1; make 1. Repeat from *.

5th-7th rounds. Entirely plain.

8th round. * knit 2 together 8 times successively; make 8 alternately; knit 1. Repeat from *. Repeat the 5th-8th rounds 4 times; then knit 3 rounds and cast off.

Begin the sleeve with a foundation of 60 stitches (this is the length) and knit 4 rounds. In order to make the upper part of the sleeve wider insert a gore. Begin on the upper side with the first 5 stitches of the round and knit 2 rounds. Lengthen the next row by knitting the following 5 stitches. In this way increase by 5 every 2d round till the whole 60 are included; then knit 44 rounds, widening once next the upper-end stitch in every 4th row after the 9th; then knit 12 rounds plain. The sleeve is now half finished. The other half is continued in the same manner, but in the reversed order of the rounds. Instead of widening, it will be necessary to narrow the same number of stitches in the same positions. The rounds must also be shortened for the gore by leaving, without knitting, the stitches opposite those left on the other side. Collect the stitches at the wrist, fasten them in a circle, and knit 18 rounds, alternately knitting 2 stitches and purling 2. Then follows a narrow lace of 7 rounds. 1st round. * purl 2, make 1, knit 1, make 1. Repeat from *. 2d round. * purl 2, knit 3 (one in each made stitch). 3d round. * purl 2, make 1, knit 3, make 1. 4th round. Alternately at every 2d round till the needle contains 32. Then make one rib over the entire row, after which finish the gore. Knit 8 ribs. The corset is now half finished. The second half is worked in the same manner, excepting that the order of the rows is reversed. This done, collect on needles all the border stitches around the arm-hole, add to these 35 for the shoulder, fasten to the 2 purl and 2 knitted. 5th round. * purl 2, make 1, knit 5, make 1. 6th and 7th rounds plain; then cast off.

Crochet 1 row single crochet on the border stitches. Join the sleeves and set them in with the same stitch. Draw a colored taffeta ribbon through the eyelets around the neck in order to fasten the jacket.

Knit Sleeved Corset for Girl from 6 to 8 Years old.

This corset, of coarse white knitting cotton, is ribbed, and is slightly trimmed on the upper and lower edges. Cast 122 stitches on steel needles of suitable size (the back of the corset measures about 7 inches across the side, and about 12 inches in length). Knit in ribs, each composed of 5 rounds, which are so knitted that one appears entirely plain, the next entirely purlled, alternately. The last 3 stitches on the side of the work appear entirely plain. In the 1st round of the 14th rib cast off the first 20 stitches for the arm-hole; cast off 2 stitches on the same side in each of the following rounds. After the 15th round begins the first hip gore. Begin this on the lower edge of the corset with the first 2 stitches of the next round, and knit backward and forward in such a manner that the gore shall appear plain on the right side 14 rounds, in every 2d round of which 4 stitches of the corset must be added to those of the gore, so that the 14th round has 30 stitches on the needle. Now follows one rib the entire length. Then form the other oblique side of the gore, missing the stitches in the reverse order from that in which they were taken up on the other side. When only 2 stitches remain on the needle the gore is finished. Follow with 4 ribs. In the two following, the 21st and 22d from the beginning, cast on in each 2 stitches, corresponding to the other side of the arm-hole. In the 23d cast on 20 stitches to obtain the required height of the front. Knit 5 ribs, and begin the gore on the upper part with the first 8 stitches of the next round. This is formed like the former, adding 4 stitches border and knit 7 rounds plain, narrowing each side of the 10 middle stitches under the arm, at every 3d round. Then knit 46 rounds, alternately 5 stitches knitted, 5 purled, continuing to narrow till the 10 stitches are gone, thus forming a gore under the arm. Finish the sleeve with 5 plain rounds. The backs are finished with 2 rows single crochet, in making the first of which crochet, after every 10 stitches, 4 chain stitches, missing the same number in order to form eyelets. The upper and under edges of the corset, as well as the sleeves, are trimmed with tatting.

Crochet Carriage Blanket with Knit Fringe.

See illustration, page 244.

THIS blanket is worked in relief in 12-strand carpet-wool; it is bordered with a knitted fringe, and is (including the fringe) about 67 inches square. The broad stripes are worked in bluish-green wool; the three narrower stripes in brown wool, the middle in light, the outside ones in a darker shade. The fringe is also of light brown wool. The illustration on page 244 represents a portion of the blanket and fringe of the full size. The relievo stitch is worked in backward and forward rounds as follows: On a foundation-chain of proper length the 1st round is entirely in single-crochet, in working which, in this as well as in the following rounds, the thread is not brought over as usual before taking the stitches together, but is taken over the needle from the front backward. At the end of each round 1 chain-stitch, which is missed at the beginning of the following round.

2d round: 1 sc. (single-crochet). In the sc. stitches the needle must always be put through the back parallel thread of the stitch of the last round, * 1 double in the 2d following stitch of the last round (1 stitch missed), on the right side the needle is put around both upright threads of the stitch: 1 sc. in the same stitch; 2 sc. in the 2 following stitches of the last round (each of the 3 sc. is worked in the parallel thread of a stitch of the last round); then 1 double around the same stitches, around which the former double stitch was worked. Repeat from *.

3d round: 4 sc. in the next 4 stitches of the last round; * 1 sc. in the missed stitch of the round before the last, this clasp-like stitch embraces 2 rounds and must always come between 2 double crochets of the last round 4 sc. in the next 4 stitches, missing 1 stitch. Repeat from *. The pattern is completed by repeating the 2d and 3d rounds, but in the 2d round the raised double-crochet stitches must always be worked around the upright threads of the clasp stitch of the former round. In this design now work the required number of stripes of the correct length and in the given colors. Every green stripe in the pattern is 15 stitches wide, and each of the 8 brown stripes 7 stitches. The completed stripes are either sewed together or worked together in crochet. The fringe which surrounds the blanket is knitted backward and forward in a stripe, a part of which is afterward unraveled. Cast on 6 stitches and knit as follows: 1st round—Thread thrown over the needle (always from back to front); 2 stitches knitted together in twist (put the needle from the front backward, as if intending to purl the stitches). Repeat twice from *. Repeat this round until the stripe is of required length, knitting together 1 stitch and the preceding made stitch in every following round. Having cast off the stitches of the last round, take the end of the foundation-thread and pull it out of the stitches as far as the opposite outer edge. The fringe is formed of this outer half of the border. In order to make the fringe pull out in loops the thread must, however, be drawn out as far back as the middle firm row of stitches. Then draw out each following stitch of the outer row by means of which the lower rib unravels and forms a fringe falling together in loops. The fringe may be either sewed on the blanket or knitted on at the same time it is formed, by knitting 2 stitches with 1, on the edge of the blanket, at the end of every 2d round.

Lady's Knit Glove.

See illustration, page 244.

MATERIALS for the pair: 1 oz. black twisted wool: a few threads red silk-twist.

The glove is knitted in black twisted wool and worked in braid stitch on the back. Begin at the wrist with a foundation of 78 stitches and knit 24 rounds, alternately 2 stitches knitted and 2 purled. After finishing this ribbed cuff the glove is knitted plain except, at the end of every 2d round, 1 stitch is purled for the seam. Purl also the beginning of the gore for the thumb. Begin this gore in the 4th round above the ribbed border by purling the 44th to the 51st stitches. Purl in the 5th round the 43d-52d; in the 6th round the 42d and 43d and the 52d and 53d; in the 7th-15th rounds the 42d and 53d. In the 16th round begin to widen for the thumb, continuing to purl 1 on each side. This widening takes place both in this and in the following rounds after the 1st purled stitch and before the 2d; and a stitch is added every round; this widening is repeated 4 times after each 9 rows, so that the finished gore including the purled stitches has a breadth of 22 stitches. Having knit 9 rounds on the last widened round, take these 22 stitches off on two separate needles; cast 11 stitches on a third needle and knit the thumb on these 33 stitches. In the 6th, 12th, and 17th rounds of the thumb narrow at the beginning and end of the 11 extra stitches by knitting 2 together. In the 21st round knit together the 2 middle stitches of each gore. Then knit 25 rounds and taper off the thumb by knitting 2 together three times in every 2d round, and always in the same line. Now continue the hand. Take up, however, the under row of the 11 stitches which were cast on for the thumb and knit 2 together at the beginning and end of the 3d and 7th rounds. Knit 12 rounds; then begin the little finger, for which collect the seam-stitch with 8 stitches before and 7 after (the seam is to be continued to the end of the little finger). This counts 16 of the hand stitches which must be put on two needles. Cast 8 stitches on a third needle; then knit 21 rounds on the 24 stitches, narrowing at each side, however, in the 13th round; then taper off the finger similarly to the thumb. Now take the 8 made stitches of the little finger and knit 4 rounds on them and the remaining stitches of the hand; then knit the next finger on 34 stitches. For these take the 8 of the last finger; 9 on the back and 8 on the front of the hand; then cast on the 9 still wanting. Knit 50 rounds, narrowing in the 7th, 14th, and 21st on both sides of the made stitches, as also of those taken from the little finger. Then finish the finger like the former. The middle finger is knitted precisely like the last except that it is longer and a stitch wider. On the remaining stitches of the hand and the under row of the 9 of the middle finger, knit 50 rounds for the forefinger, narrowing in the 13th, 20th, and 25th rounds at both sides of the stitches taken up. Taper this off like the others. Finally work, with the red silk, 3 rows of plait stitch in the back of the hand.

Lamp Shade.

See illustration, page 244.

THE foundation of this lamp shade is fine white lace. It is in five pieces, one of which is shown, of the full size, in the illustration. The design is first drawn on paper; the lace is then basted over it, and the pattern worked thereon in green flosselle, which is run through the meshes of the lace, taking up one of the latter here and there. The foundation is worked in cross stitch, with fine black sewing silk; the accompanying illustration shows how to make the stitch. Each stitch must cover one mesh of the lace. An unfinished stitch is shown in the engraving: to complete it, put the needle in at * and draw it out at *. The different sections of the shade are finished round the edge with button-hole stitch in flosselle. Overhand the parts together to complete the shade.

Silk Brush.

See illustration, page 245.

THIS brush is well adapted for use on silks, which soon become rough when rubbed with a stiff brush. It consists of a square, three inches wide and seven inches long, knitted of gray yarn and two shades of coarse crimson worsted, and fastened to a piece of gray cloth, laid over pasteboard. The centre of the square is of the darker, and the outer part of the lighter red. Each tuft of the brush is an inch and a quarter long and four strands thick. For the square, which is knitted backward and forward in plain knitting stitch, with tolerably fine gray yarn, cast 44 stitches on middling sized knitting-needles. The knitting of the tufts begins on the second row. For these cut pieces of coarse worsted, three inches long, and four strands thick, and knit them in the middle, letting the ends hang down on either side, and leaving two stitches between each one. Thirty rows complete the square, the design of which may be varied to suit the taste. The top is made of six or eight thicknesses of pasteboard, to which the square is fastened.

Skirt Trimming.

See illustration, page 245.

THIS simple trimming for under-skirts is easily made by pleating a strip of cloth, and setting flat on it, at a little distance from the bottom, a scalloped strip of some bright color, bound with braid, in the manner shown in the illustration, somewhat in the form of a lambrequin.

PLAYED OUT.

PLAYED out, played out, good-by, dear;
The pretty game is done.
Shall we sigh for what is lost, dear?
Or smile for what is won?

Lost? only hope and freshness;
Won? only vain regret.
We staked our counters gayly;
We needs must pay the debt.

"We?" Well, two played the game, dear;
But was it really "we?"
For one was very earnest,
And one "amused," you see!

This game's a little hard, dear,
In its unshaken law.
I do not seek to mend it:
I only mark the flaw;

That when a hand's played out, dear,
One laughs and turns away;
And one has just a wound, dear,
To sting her dying day.

And which must bear the pain, dear?
Why, justly, she who made
Sweet, solemn, foolish earnest
Of the graceful game they played.

Played out, played out—content you,
You need not frown nor fear;
I make no idle moanings;
I, too, am tired, dear.

As tired of baseless trusting—
As tired of cold decay—
As tired of baffled hoping—
As you of trifling play.

So leave the table, others
The feverish joy may court;
And—the woman count the cost, dear;
The man find fresher sport.

MY PARTNER'S LOVE AFFAIR.

YOU know Esty Corday, my partner, don't you? No? why I thought every body knew Esty. His real name is Billy, but we all call him Esty because it isn't his name. Even old Flindtpelt, the broker, calls him "Hon Esty," and the old fellow thinks it the best joke out.

You see, one day Flindtpelt drew a check for a few thousand, and in a moment of temporary insanity made it payable to bearer. Now, when a man, as a rule, never does a thing, and then breaks his rule, he is sure to come to grief; so what must old Flindtpelt do but forget to put the paper-weight on the check, and so of course the moment his back was turned away it went out at the window, and was blowing about among the feet of stock-jobbers and sharpers, when who should spy it but Esty? He picked it up, glanced at it, and went right up into Flindtpelt's office, where the old chap was just sitting down at his desk after a short absence, and hadn't yet discovered the loss of his check. It happened that just three days before Flindtpelt had given us lots of trouble about some notes, and lost us a matter of three hundred dollars, without any reason in the world. So I suppose his conscience bothered him a little when he saw Esty coming in. At any rate he looked as forbidding as a deputy-collector while my partner was marching up to his desk.

"Morning, Sir," says Esty, holding out the check, back up.

"No, Sir," says Flindtpelt; "I don't want any of your paper. I see it isn't indorsed."

"But this is payable to bearer, Mr. Flindtpelt."

"So much the worse, Sir. I never issue, much less take, paper payable to bearer."

At this the old fellow remembered the check he had just drawn, and putting down his hand to hide it found it wasn't there. Such a way as he was in Esty says he never saw. He made one boy run to the bank, and set another to look under all the furniture, and was in such a stew that for eight minutes by the clock Esty could not get in a word edgewise (not that he tried very hard, either), and then to cap the climax back comes the boy from the bank, saying that the check had been cashed three minutes before he got there. By this time old Flindtpelt was too tired to do justice to the occasion, and simply sat down; so up steps Esty and says: "Mr. Flindtpelt, I'd have given it to you before, but you wouldn't let me. I just found this in the street." Then he laid the check down, and walked off without another word. Old Flindtpelt didn't have time to say so much as "Thank you," but from that day we began to notice that business took a turn our way, and we have gone on nicely ever since. Flindt told the check story every where, and from some circumstances we have been convinced that all our business didn't come by chance.

Well, I started to tell you that Esty had fallen desperately in love, but as you didn't know him I wanted to give you an idea of what sort of a fellow he was. Every body believes in him, even I who am his partner; and I wonder he has not before now fallen in with some one of the other sex who suited him. To get on with my story. We managed between us to buy tickets to a course of Dickens's readings, and were intending to go on alternate nights. I went the first night and was awfully bored, for I could not hear very well, and, in short, did not have a good time at all; so when I saw Esty at the office next morning I gave him a most gloomy account, and told him to go all the remainder of the course if he wanted to, for I declared that I would not be hired at any price to sit out another such evening. Well, Esty said he would try it for once at least, so off he went, with his opera-glass in his pocket, rather expecting to have a very stupid time. I wished him joy as we parted, and went up for an evening at the club. The next morning Esty made his appearance late at the office, looking preoccupied and melancholy to the last degree. When I asked him if he had a good time at the reading his face lighted up with a gleam of evanescent brightness, and he declared, with enthusiasm, that he never passed a pleasanter evening in his life; heard and saw perfectly, only he had to use his opera-glass all the time, and that was the reason why his eyes were so red this morning. After getting off this eulogium, with something of an effort, he subsided into his previous dilapidated condition, becoming at once absent-minded, nervous, and restless. He fidgeted round, wanted to go out to lunch at a quarter before eleven, was on the point of lighting his cigar with a ten-dollar greenback, and finally made such a muddle of a business-letter, which he tried to write, that I lost patience and made him sit down and do nothing. Of course I made up my mind that he was carrying a load on his conscience, and I chaffed him about it till he evidently didn't hear me, and sank into a brown study, poking the fire, meanwhile, with his new silk umbrella. Then I looked up the paper of the previous day to see what Dickens's programme had been. He had read the trial scene from "Pickwick" and the "Christmas Carol," so I turned suddenly to Esty and asked him what Dickens read last night. No answer.

"I say, Esty, what did Dickens read last night?"

"Eh? oh, he read—read Norma."

I, with difficulty, smothered my laughter and asked him if the speech of Marley in the trial scene was well rendered. Esty said it was admirably done, and then I questioned him further in the same strain, until finally, when I asked him how Mrs. Bardell sang the Mira Norma and Esty replied that she did it capitally, my mirth refused to be longer controlled, and as soon as I could see for laughing, I became aware that Esty with a very red face was asking me what was the matter. "Why, man alive," said I, "here you have been telling me that Dickens read Norma last night, and that Mrs. Bardell sang Mira in the trial scene." Esty stoutly denied having said any thing of the kind; but admitted that he must have been absent-minded when I showed him how he had poked the fire with his umbrella. Well, things on Esty's desk were all at sixes and sevens, and I naturally concluded from various symptoms that he had fallen in love and would be standing on his head for some days at least, so I quietly determined to make the best of it, and run the machine as well as I could without his assistance. I soon discovered that he was anxiously looking forward to the next Dickens's night, and I bothered him considerably about it, threatening to claim my right to go, seeing that he had such a good time. Esty was so worried about it that at last I had no heart to plague him any longer and gave him the ticket. At the earliest reasonable moment he was off up town like a shot. After dinner I was in my room, when in came Esty in the most gorgeous array imaginable, his neck-tie and gloves wonderful to behold, and his boots so painfully tight that he was afraid to come near the fire.

"Ned," said he, "I wish you would lend me your field-glass, I can see h—I mean Dickens so much better than with my small one." I of course lent him the glass, and as soon as he was gone I stepped over to the Browns (I knew they were going to Dickens's) and asked Charley to take a look at Esty occasionally. Esty's seat was in the forward part of one of the galleries, so that he could be seen as well as see. Charley promised to look out for him, although I would not tell why I wanted him looked after, and I went back to my room.

The next morning Esty came down looking so sadly changed from his evening grandeur that I could hardly recognize him for the same individual. I dropped in at Charley's in the course of the forenoon, and learned that Esty had gone to the verge of impertinence in the use of a huge double-barreled telescope, which he continually directed to a particular part of the audience. Who he was looking at Charley had been unable to discover, but he did not believe that Esty had ever once looked in the direction of the maroon screen through the whole evening. As Charley never allowed himself to tell a story smaller than it happened, I overlooked the libelous description of my faithful field-glass, and did not feel much concerned for Esty's behavior.

On re-entering the office, I caught my most prosaic partner shoving something that looked very like a rough draft of verses, under some papers on his desk; and his conduct in various particulars was so absurd, that even the office-boy (ordinarily so obtuse as at times to help himself to our cigars, thinking that they were intended for general use) detected his condition, and I strongly suspect rescued some of the discarded verses from the scrap-basket, for I discovered him in an agony of suppressed mirth over a crumpled bit of paper, which he hastily concealed when he became aware of my observation.

As the day passed and the afternoon drew near its end Esty's restlessness increased, and at three and a half precisely he was off, while the office-boy performed a derisive pantomime as he strode frantically through the door.

It seems that, as I guessed, Esty met his fate at the first reading which he attended. He went on that evening, clothed and in his right mind, and took his seat, which, as I have said, commanded an excellent view of the audience, and presently became aware of an especially bewitching head on a graceful pair of shoulders, which belonged to a lady in one of the seats on the floor of the hall. Now Esty is the last man in the world who ever thinks of noticing ladies' dresses, but he says that although this aforesaid head was turned from him when he first discovered it, yet the color and general style of bonnet and dress caught his eye and riveted his attention before he had seen a feature of the face that was destined so unceremoniously to upset his bachelor heart. When she did turn and look toward the stage, Esty felt that something gave way under his left ribs; and he has told me confidentially that he has never felt quite sound there since. So there the foolish fellow sat all the evening, and, using his opera-glass as much as he dared, made out to fall most completely in love with a very sweet profile, which, with a gray bonnet, is all that he can recollect of that evening's entertainment. When the audience rose, Esty made a frantic rush for the door, but could not get out in time, owing to an enormously long dress which went down stairs in front of him, and which he mentally anathematized as he caught a vanishing glimpse of the gray toilette, leaning confidently on the arm of a good-looking young man, and disappearing through the outer door. I have already told you of Esty's condition after this, his first encounter. His experience during the second reading was much the same, for the enchantress was there, and the slight change in dress and head-gear made her if possible more irresistible than before. This time, alas, the demon of jealousy began to develop himself, and Esty's feelings toward the good-looking young man, who was still the favorite escort, may be described as savage. Esty glanced at them through my field-glass all the evening, and took the precaution to go out just before the reading ended, thereby drawing upon himself the "Sh-sh-sh" of the vicinity, and even became the object of an indignant glance from the pretty eyes of his enslaver. He, however, had a good look at her as she went out, and then, heartily despising himself for doing so, followed the trim little figure until he saw the good-looking young man help her into an up-town stage and ride off.

Esty went to the hall on the last evening of the course with painful doubts, for he could hardly count with certainty on her being there, and even if she were there, was it not his last evening? and very possibly it might be his last sight of that fair face which had so fixed itself on his memory. In due time, however, he was relieved by seeing her enter and take the old seat, and it was with fiendish satisfaction that he remarked the absence of the former escort, and the substitution of a mild-looking youth, evidently a younger cousin, pressed into service as escort. Esty made the most of his time, and at last, with his heart sinking into his boots, heard the unheeded voice of the reader cease, and saw the audience rise. Of course he pushed for the door with might and main, and this time the fates took the management of the affair in their own hands, as I am going to tell you.

Esty went down stairs, feeling as if he had lost all interest in life, just in time to see the lady of his thoughts and her escort pushed into separate exits—she into the one toward Irving Place, and her escort into the one toward Fourth Avenue. He saw the mild youth make one or two feeble efforts to rejoin his charge, while she was of course carried on with the crowd. Now, it so happened that a check took place in the right-hand exit, and an acceleration in the left-hand one, so that the lady and Esty, and Esty a little behind her, reached the street first, and the mild youth on arriving at his door went immediately to the other door, and waited in vain for his charge to appear.

Esty meanwhile had contrived to keep the bonnet of his choice in sight, and saw it carried by the crowd, which was very dense, toward Irving Place. Fourteenth Street was, of course, full of carriages and shouting drivers, and poor Bessy—for that was her name—knew not where she was until she found herself well away from the glare of light about the entrance to the hall, and then she became aware that a strange man was standing close to her and saying, "You've lost your party, haven't you, my dear?" She thought it a rather familiar way of addressing her, but answered timidly, "Yes, Sir."

"Where do you live?" said the strange man, edging a little nearer. Bessy instinctively moved a little away from him as she answered, and then with another question the man was close to her again, and so on until by the time he had asked half a dozen questions he had imperceptibly pushed Bessy to the curb-stone, just where there was a dark vacant space between two carriages. Then for the first time Bessy caught a sight of his face and eyes. The dear child had never looked into such eyes before, and she half shrieked as she turned to run away, but it was too late. She felt herself rudely seized about the waist, and whirled off the sidewalk in between the carriages. The strange man who a moment before had asked such friendly questions had, with an adroit hand, taken her bracelets and watch, and was just detaching the brooch from her pretty throat when Esty, who had been watching the interview, and was under the impression that Bessy had found her escort, awoke to a sense of the situation.

When I state that I am one of the best amateur sparrers in town, and that Esty and I often practice together, it will be readily understood that such a facer as the strange man received right between the eyes was a thing not to stand up before, so over he went under the wheels of the carriages, and Esty had his arm around the slender little waist, for the poor girl was half dead with fright, and set her tenderly on the sidewalk, and contrived to walk her along toward Broadway in such a manner that no attention was attracted to them until presently Bessy had time to catch her breath, and then Esty drew her arm through his, and spoke big brotherly words to her (for the nonsense was all gone out of his head at the time), and assured her that he would take her home safely. But she, little frightened thing, hardly knew whether she was out of the hands of the Philistines yet, and could not answer a word for sobbing, though she could not choose but lean on the arm of her knight, the tones of whose voice had something comforting in them.

Esty was just going to take a carriage, but an instinctive delicacy stopped him, and he hailed an up-town stage, put his trembling charge in, and was rather astonished on seating himself beside her to have her grasp his arm again with both hands and hold on as if for dear life. He began to feel a little foolish, but remembered that he must pay his fare, and in that act discovered that his right-hand glove was split from wrist to knuckles, and dyed a very fashionable but not wholly satisfactory color. He asked somebody to "ass up the change, wrapped his handkerchief around his hand, and sat still, for (as he has since confessed) he would not for the world have loosened the clasp of those little hands.

After a while the trembling ceased, and Esty, choosing a time when the stage stopped for a passenger, asked where he should take her, and could just make out the whispered number of a cross-street, where accordingly he stopped the stage, and had the happiness of half carrying poor Bessy to her father's door, where he left her in the charge of the astonished servant, and then hurried to the nearest physician's to have his hand cared for. The fellow had actually broken one of the small bones of his hand by the force of his blow; and Kenny the detective tells me that one of the most notorious and daring thieves in town has been laid up for three weeks with a broken nose and eyes that are only just beginning to be useful again.

Esty could not find it in his heart to resist the inclination to call on the next day but one and inquire after the health of his protégée, and so, of course, had to leave his card, Bessy being entirely prostrated by the nervous agitation she had gone through. The morning after who should come into our office but old Flindtpelt, his face all in a glow, and getting Esty by the hand, nearly shook him out of his shoes; and I was on the point of sending the boy for a policeman when it somehow came out that Bessy was no other than old Flindtpelt's daughter. Flindtpelt would not leave till we both promised to dine with him that day; so we both went—Esty with his hand in a sling.

Bessy was quite pale, and had evidently made a great effort to come down stairs; but looked so sweetly that I felt wildly in love myself, and should have lost my heart completely if I had not seen how things were going. Esty, of course, had to take her in to dinner; and it was one of the prettiest things you can imagine to see her take care of him at table, for, you know, he could only use one hand. The evening passed delightfully. The good-looking young man turned out to be a brother; and there was no end of fun at the expense of the mild young cousin; and old Flindtpelt proved to be the jolliest old gentleman in the world; in short, every thing was as pleasant as possible.

Well, you will not be surprised to learn that two or three days ago Esty left an order at Tiffany's for a very pretty little piece of jewelry with full consent of all parties; and, moreover, that he is totally incapable of business, is never disengaged of an evening, has left off smoking; and, taking every thing into consideration, I conclude that he and Bessy have made a match of it.

OUR FIRST BABY.

IT is a doubtful question which felt the most utterly helpless of the three, my wife, I, or the inhabitant of the flannel blanket which the nurse laid in my arms with the assertion, "Very fine baby; weighs just eight pounds and three ounces, Sir."

We were a young couple, a poor couple, and an extremely inexperienced couple, my wife and I; and when this baby made its début, our gratitude to Heaven for the gift was toned down and kept within bounds by the anti-joy query, "What shall we do with it?"

The stranger seemed to have a realizing sense of the awkward predicament he had placed us in, and expressed his sympathy for our quandary by keeping as still as possible, and taking care of himself as much as circumstances would allow; still there were times when his patience (like that of older philosophers) would give way, and he would give specimens of musical talent which bid fair to make him celebrated in the future.

When such crises occurred (and they were usually nocturnal) my wife and I might have been seen in undress toilette, wildly meandering to and fro, like unquiet ghosts—she frantically rushing from bedroom to hall, from hall to nursery, from thence to bedroom again, bearing the screaming child, and I as frantically rushing after, striving to induce her to stop long enough to pour down the throat of the "well-spring of joy in the household" some of the contents of the bottles I held in my hands as I ran. Lucky for the "well-spring" that he could scream louder than I, for Prussic acid looked remarkably like cordial, and I was not apt to be discriminating under the pressure of circumstances.

It is a mystery to me to this day, and always will be, what was the motive which prompted the heart of that baby to give us so many concerts free gratis, and at such unprecedented hours. Then he would waken just when Matilda and I were dreaming over our sparking days, and commencing on simple strains would go on from ballad to chorus, and so on up to the sublimest heights of operatic execution, beating a vigorous accompaniment with fists, arms, and legs, while we, like other poor bewildered listeners to foreign operatic music, vainly strove to find out what all the racket was about. It never got an encore, that child didn't, and why it fancied such a musical course either necessary or agreeable it passes my philosophy to fathom. The strangest of it all was to see how he would kick and scream from one to two hours, and after we had thumped his back, shook him upside down, given him cordial, walked, sung, ran, and cried over him with no visible effect, he would suddenly nestle down and drop to sleep in the twinkling of an eye, as if he had sung his good-night song, and dropped the curtain. We fancied when the baby, or in other words, Mortimer Frederick Johns, had arrived at that stage of manhood when his juvenile weight could be supported on his own pink foundations, that the trials and cares incident to baby-raising were over. But alas! for the hopes of young parenthood, we found that the faster Master Johns could walk the faster he could trot into mischief, and the ways and means he would adopt to invent and find it out were wonderful to see. He seemed to have an especial spite against himself, and be fearfully determined to put an end to his own existence, and in spite of maternal care and paternal supervision the pins he swallowed, the carpet tacks he found to chew, the pails of hot water he longingly investigated, were a constant source of terror and surprise. Three times he fell down the back-stairs, five times out of bed, and twice into the duck-pond, once he ran across the path of a runaway horse, and at this time Master Johns is a living miracle—a monument of Providential care. As he advances in physical power he begins to show symptoms of a mental development which threatens to be more perplexing than any peculiarity we have met with in his composition, and we are often at our wit's end how to follow the proverb, "Train up a child in the way he should go," etc.

The greatest trouble seems to be that he possesses many traits which will be very laudable when he arrives at the years of discretion, but which are extremely unhandy during his minority; and it not only seems cruel but inconsistent and dastardly to punish, whip, or otherwise correct him for making use of those qualities which we shall most wish him to possess by-and-by. For instance, he has a remarkable faculty for telling the truth, and on more than one occasion has mortified us beyond endurance by the injudicious use of this characteristic. One day I was walking out with him when we met the clergyman whose church I attended, who, after the weather had been discussed, inquired the reason for my non-attendance the preceding Sabbath. Before I could reply my well-beloved son spoke up eagerly, "Cos he had a big hole in his coat, Sir; that's what 'twas." You can imagine my feelings; yet how could I punish the little youngster as he looked up in my face with such a confident assurance of duty done.

His great desire for knowledge and investigation is another embarrassing though essential virtue. On one occasion we had invited guests to dinner, and as the potatoes were being served his sharp eyes spied a black speck on one of them, and he earnestly called out, "Mamma, mamma, ain't that one of the taters Ann dropped in the ashes?" Of course Matilda's pleasure for the day was spoiled by this mistimed inquiry, yet Master Mortimer could not be made to see any impropriety in his query, therefore nothing could be done to guard against similar contretemps in the future.

The little rascal has a remarkable development of the bump of benevolence, as I found to my cost one day when I missed my gold-headed cane from its stand in the hall. It was a present from a favorite uncle, and I cherished it as I did the apple of my eye. What was my horror on inquiring its whereabouts, to hear from the lips of my Don Quixote, Jun., the following interesting tale: "Oh, papa, there was a poor old man doin' by, and his tane broke, and he felled right down on de sidewalk, and when he dot up I runned rite into de hall and dot your tane, papa, and went and div it too im, and he looked just as glad!" It is perhaps unnecessary to add that I never saw my cane again.

With all his good qualities he runs to mischief as naturally as ducks take to water; not a book in the house that he has not made his mark in, either with pencil, charcoal, or dirty fingers; of the three cats that grace our dwelling not one can boast that her tail hasn't been singed by Master Johns; and the morning when he sent Rover to my room, clad in my best dressing-gown, with my Sunday gaiters tied on his fore-paws, and my new velvet smoking-cap perched jauntily over his ears, is only one specimen of his daily pranks.

I have only given you a sample of the idiosyncrasies of my little son, and is it surprising that to us inexperienced young people this growing development of character creates a more formidable sense of responsibility than did the presentation of that bundle of flannel inhabited by "our baby?"

The important question in our household just now is, What shall be done with Mortimer Frederick Johns? and my wife and I have decided to bring the question before the public, hoping that some one who has had experience in rearing children will interest themselves sufficiently in our behalf to give us the benefit of such experience, and aid us in training up this moral changing in the way he should go.

All communications on the subject should be addressed to Allan Johns, Box 200, New York.

MRS. TYPESET'S DIARY.

Monday.—Some change of plan has taken place within a year or two past in the Cooper Institute School of Design for Women. The last annual report states that "the effort to produce pictures for exhibition, and the attempt to graduate artists, will henceforth be abandoned for the more feasible, sensible, and profitable aim of fitting young women of the requisite ability to earn a respectable livelihood in the honorable occupations of engravers, designers, colorers, and teachers." There are about two hundred pupils, some of whom are amateurs in independent circumstances, but the majority are expecting to make a practical use of the knowledge they obtain in earning their own livelihood. The cost of tuition varies from two to two and a half dollars a week, and materials are furnished at cost. Those unable to pay receive gratuitous instruction—and this instruction is of the best and most practical kind. The School of Design is doing a great work in disseminating the principles of art, and also in making it easy for woman to fit herself for pleasant, honorable, and lucrative employment.

The passion of the French for theatrical amusements, and the patience with which they will wait at the door of theatres for the sake of obtaining a good seat, is illustrated by the following incident. At a crowded French theatre a woman fell from the gallery into the pit, and was picked up by one of the spectators, who, hearing her groaning, asked her if she was much injured. "Much injured!" exclaimed she, "I should think I am. I have lost the best seat in the very middle of the front row."

The Boston Journal of Chemistry gives some special cautions about the use of benzine, which is so frequently applied to silk and woolen articles to remove stains. It is a highly volatile and inflammatory substance, and when the vapor is mixed with air, explosive. Consequently it should not be used in close proximity to a lamp or a gas-flame. If a bottle of it is left uncorked the vapor escaping from it will, as it were, attract a flame several feet distant.

Tuesday Eve.—It is said—noticed an article on the subject this morning—that it is an expensive mistake to put a thick layer of fresh coal upon a fire of ignited coal. It is recommended that no more coal should be put on a fire at one time than will readily ignite and give off a pure white flame—not a blue flame, as that denotes the presence of unconsumed gases. A quantity of unburnt coal, covered with ashes, is almost always found on clearing the grates in the morning. Often this is thrown away, whereas the fact is that these lumps are only burnt on the outside, and are in a better condition for igniting than fresh coal. By giving a little attention to the matter a good deal may be saved in the course of a winter.

How curious—and economical too!—it must be to travel in Spain, and Portugal, and Mexico—according to Bayard Taylor's account. He says that a very hospitable custom prevails in those countries of paying the bills of a stranger at a hotel or restaurant. For instance, a Spaniard, on entering a café where he is accustomed to take his refreshments, notices a stranger, possibly a foreign traveler, present. Calling one of the waiters to him, he quietly pays the stranger's bill, takes his own ice or chocolate, and goes away, without ever having spoken to the man he has so surreptitiously entertained. When the unconscious stranger calls for his bill he is astonished to find that he owes nothing. The same traveler remarks that he found it impossible to pay for meals at the hotels on the road from Mexico to Vera Cruz, as some one of his fellow-passengers had always done it in advance. The point is, could one always depend upon being thus taken care of by a generous public?

We—I mean, we as a city, for we are individually slow to learn any thing good from foreign sources, excepting fashions—we might obtain many excellent ideas from the Japanese. Foreign customs need not be adopted in toto, but they are often very suggestive. For example, it is said that in Japan every street has its magistrate, who is elected by the popular voice of the inhabitants of the street, and he is responsible for the good conduct of the residents. He is expected to settle disputes, to know the most minute details of the private and public affairs of every creature within his jurisdiction, and keep an accurate record of births, marriages, and deaths. Americans might object to having magistrates or any body else prying into the "minute details" of their private affairs; but it would be pleasant to have some one in authority responsible for the order and cleanliness of the street, who would "settle disputes," and keep rude boys from snow-balling windows and overturning ash-barrels.

A writer from Paris predicts that the old fashion of powdering the hair is about to return. Reason, because "a certain great lady's hair is beginning to show the inevitable thin streaks of gray." What a pity! Can't we have hair à la naturel a little while?

Prying neighbors and inquisitive visitors are a nuisance. In the city you can sometimes escape them, but seldom in a country village. Every thing you ever have done and said, and every thing you expect to do and say for the remainder of your natural life, is likely to be ferreted out by some village gossip and retailed from house to house. Happy is that individual who, without wounding Truth, can baffle such inquisitorial investigators of private matters. A very neat answer a certain young lady once gave in a case of this kind. A prying old lady had kept her on the rack for some time, but could not learn what she desired. At last she put the question thus: "I've been asked a good many times if you are engaged to Mr. —. Now if folks inquire again whether you are or not, what shall I tell 'em I think?"

"Tell them," answered the young lady, fixing her calm blue eyes in unblinking steadiness upon the inquisitive features of her interrogator, "tell them that you are sure it's none of your business."

And the mortified and disappointed inquirer had nothing fresher than this to report to her neighbors.

Wednesday.—A Mississippi physician, while compounding some medicinal wash, has accidentally invented a golden ink. This brilliant chemical writing fluid gives a letter the appearance of having been powdered with gold dust, and the color is permanent. It will become popular for writing love-letters.

Came across the following recipe this morning. May be useful in an emergency:

How to make Tattlers.—Take a handful of Runabout, the same quantity of Nimbletongue, a sprig of the herb Backbite, a tea-spoonful of Don't-you-tell-it, six drams of Malice, and a few drops of Envy. Stir well together, and simmer half an hour. Add a little Discontent and Jealousy, then strain through a bag of Misconstruction, cork it up in a bottle of Malevolence, and hang it upon a skeln of Street-yarn. Shake it occasionally for a few days, and it will be fit for use. Let a few drops be taken before walking out, and the desired result will follow.

A French agency for matrimonial alliances concludes an advertisement with: "Happiness guaranteed for one year." The time might safely be lengthened a trifle, if there were only half as many "codes of morals" for husbands as there are for wives. A "good wife"—so books and papers oracularly say—is one who does this, and that, and the other. Very little valuable instruction given to husbands! A great pity to leave them in ignorance! However, since the "codes" are all for wives, 'tis well to know about them. This is the latest—to be put in practice as soon as the frost is out of the ground: "Make up your beds early in the morning; sew buttons on your husband's shirts; do not rake up any grievances; protect the young and tender branches of your family; plant a smile of good temper in your face, and carefully root out all angry feelings, and expect a good crop of happiness."

Thursday.—Cousin A. writes that the latest novelty in Paris etiquette is a visiting card which tells the hour of the call. It is a card of rather large size, with scalloped edges, so cut that the scallops leave 12 rounded projections (including the corners), and each projection bears on the back a figure of the series from 1 to 12. By folding over any projection the figure it bears is brought to view on the face of the card, and the visitor can thus leave a record on the card of the hour nearest which it was left, and save the mistress of the house the vain task of cross-questioning the servants on this point.

An appendix to Webster's Unabridged Dictionary will speedily be necessary. New words are being coined every day. "Fightist" is the latest out. It is fresh from the Western mint. In Detroit, divorce is termed "unhitchment." What is the vernacular in Chicago for the same process I don't know; but at a recent trial there the jury "verdicted not guilty." A new paper was recently announced in this city as "the mouth-piece of the female 'suffragettes.'" (As if any woman ever needed any other "mouth-piece" than her own!) "Dickensese" is, I suppose, applied to a particular style of reading, or writing. And the little girl who, on approaching a crowd, when walking in the streets with her father, said, "Papa, now look out that you don't get pick-pocketed," has made a valuable contribution to our language.

Saturday.—Of all bad aches I think the ear-ache is the worst, and a child suffering with it should have unbounded sympathy, and such relief as is possible. When a child I remember enduring untold agonies with it; and once, when comfortingly assured by somebody who knew nothing about it that it "couldn't be so bad as the tooth-ache," indignantly replied, "Yes, it is; for you can have your tooth pulled out, but you can't pull out your ear!" Have just clipped from a newspaper a new remedy for ear-ache. Hope there will be no need of testing it in my family; but it is worth preserving against a time of need:

"Take a small piece of cotton wool, making a depression in the centre with the end of a finger, and fill it with as much ground pepper as will rest on a five-cent piece; gather it into a ball and tie it up; dip the ball into sweet oil and insert it into the ear, covering the latter with cotton wool, and use a bandage, or cap to retain it in its place. Almost instant relief will be experienced, and the application is so gentle that an infant will not be injured by it, but experience relief as well as adults."

Have seen it stated somewhere that by using molasses for mixing mustard plasters they will keep soft and flexible, and not dry up as when mixed with water. Of course, a thin muslin should come between the plaster and the skin; and the strength of the plaster may be varied by adding flour.

Diphtheria does not appear to be so fearfully prevalent and fatal as it was a few years since. Yet it is well to know that its approach is usually indicated by two marked symptoms: the sensation of a hard substance in the throat, making swallowing difficult, and an unpleasant breath. Gum camphor is said to be often efficacious in warding off the disease if taken in season. On the first appearance of the symptoms the patient should take a small piece of gum camphor, the size of a pea, and let it dissolve slowly in the mouth. Repeat this once an hour, a few times, and the pain and difficulty in swallowing is usually removed.

What a flexible language we have! At an examination of pupils for an Illinois high school, a short time ago, written exercises were called for, by which fifty different methods of spelling the word "kerosine" were developed! About two-thirds of the spellings began with the letter C. In other respects the scholars passed a good examination. This reminds us of a statement recently made that the University at Pekin, China, has examined 14,000 students at one time, but that the low state of education among the pupils may be inferred from the fact that not one of them can spell so simple a word as cat. What can they do then? Or does it only mean that they have not studied the English language!

An Ohio paper relates a little love story which, in brief, is something as follows: A young lady went from Toledo to Logansport, Indiana, to visit friends. Became acquainted with a fine appearing man. Acquaintance ripened into friendship—friendship into love—love into proposal—proposal into acceptance. Christmas-day was the time set for marriage. Place—a church in Toledo. Time arrived—bride ready—friends assembled—minister waiting—bridgework cometh not. More time passed—lover came—said that he had just received word that a very dear friend was lying at the point of death—must go at once—lover's wife and two children also came—stopped at hotel—sent word to the young lady—mutual explanation—would-be bigamist still absent, visiting the "dying friend"—young lady still living, and not so miserable as she might have been.

A new kind of oil has been invented. It possesses a most marvelous faculty of transudation. Placed on the palm of the hand, it almost immediately appears on the back, and traverses the entire thickness of the body, even when covered with linen. The inventor asserts, therefore, the possibility by its aid of making local applications of iodine to diseased lungs.

FANCY COSTUMES.—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]

GENTLEMEN'S FASHIONS.—[See Page 250.]

GENTLEMEN'S FASHIONS.

LITTLE change has been made in gentlemen's fashions this winter beyond shortening the over-coat. The veston, or short coat, on the contrary, is somewhat lengthened, though it still maintains its place in spite of the cold weather. Vests and pantaloons remain as they were. Our illustration gives examples of the styles most in vogue.

Fig. 1.—STREET DRESS. Hat somewhat low, with brim of average width turned up at the sides. Coat-collar rolling, very low, with notch; sleeve of average size, without trimming. Double-breasted vest, with metal buttons. Scarf-cravat of mauve silk, with turned-down collar. Straw-colored gloves. Demi-tight pantaloons of light Havana cloth, with a stripe at the side.

Fig. 2.—STREET DRESS. Low hat, with medium-sized brim. Sack over-coat, half-long, of light brown cloth, with collar rolling high, and closed in front with four buttons. Slanting breast-pocket on the left side; transverse pocket on the right side at the waist, and two other transverse pockets lower down in the skirt just within reach of the hand, all with lapels. Sleeve somewhat full, finished with cuff, and bound, like the rest of the coat, with wide galloon. Blue scarf-cravat, fastened with gold pin. Turned-down collar. Fawn-colored gloves. Demi-tight pantaloons of light olive cloth, with a black stripe at the side.

Fig. 3.—HOUSE DRESS. Greek cap of black velvet, very low, with a large gold button in the middle of the crown. Dressing-gown of iron-gray cloth, of the sack shape, and rather long, with rolling collar. The belt, front, and bottom are edged with a broad bias fold of cherry-colored silk, with two rows of buttons in a Greek figure made by the trimming at the bottom of the skirt. Blue vest, with standing collar. Pantaloons of the same stuff as the dressing-gown, narrowing at the ankle, and ending in yellow kid slippers.

Fig. 4.—Dress for a little boy nine years old. Round hat with low crown, and flat, narrow brim; short sack over-coat, of maroon cloth, with standing collar and cuffs of Astrakhan cloth, and trimmed round the edge with Astrakhan. The top of the coat is trimmed with an olive Brandenburg, the ends of which form little chains falling over either shoulder. Black tie with standing collar. Demi-tight pantaloons of bright blue cloth. Straw-colored gloves.

Fig. 5.—WINTER DRESS. Low-crowned hat, with average brim, turned up at the sides. Over-coat of olive cloth, with standing collar, buttoned by means of a small lapel. Cape falling halfway to the bottom lined with silk of the same color, and fastened at the top with a single button. The body of the coat is buttoned all the way up the front, and furnished with large pockets. Tight-fitting coat under the over-coat. Striped garnet pantaloons. Pearl-gray gloves.

Fig. 6.—STREET DRESS. Hat of average size, turned up slightly at the sides. Full suit of wood-colored cloth, in diagonal stripes. Short single-breasted coat, with straight front, and high rolling collar; vest buttoning to the throat, and demi-tight pantaloons, with a black stripe at the side. Violet cravat and standing collar. Fawn-colored gloves. Sack over-coat of pearl-gray cloth, carried on the arm.

ABOUT DRESSES AND THINGS.

IF I have not said much in my favorite department lately, do not think that it is because I had little or nothing to say. On the contrary, I have had too much; my mouth has been full—I was choked. Behold a clear case of l'embarras des richesses. I have seen more good clothes lately than ever I saw before in my life; than I ever expect to see again. I have been in society; I have attended parties, balls, receptions, masquerades, dinners, petit-soupers, and nearly every thing else which is my neighbor's.

Evening parties are my favorite. I like to see ladies in full dress. Why the dress worn on these occasions is called "full dress" I do not exactly know unless it be because it is too full for utterance. Low the poor Indian—muslin! But if the dress be comfortable who cares, and whose business is it? If it sets in cold, a lady can always put a string of pearls on, or retire behind a diamond cross or a breast-pin.

There is nothing like being provided against sudden changes of the weather when one goes out to spend a sociable evening!

As for the fuss that is made about this style of dress by fathers and brothers and husbands and such who really have no business to interfere, it is supremely ridiculous. When the dear creatures tell them, hour after hour, and day after day, and week after week, that they have nothing to wear—how can they blame them if they wear it? It is their own fault, surely, if their wives and daughters and sisters have no clothes. What were husbands, brothers, and fathers made for? What is the chief end of man? I guess I know; I've not been married for nothing. The Catechism gives a different answer; but I tell you that man was created an intelligent and reasoning animal, cast in the mould of his Maker, and endowed with speech and certain inalienable rights—chief among which is the pursuit of happiness under difficulties—simply that he might pay the bills of his wife and daughter, or any strange female that happens to be within his gates. Eve ate the apple and passed the core over to Adam. Evidently the first woman was a liberal Christian. As a matter of cores, when it was discovered that dress was necessary, it was Adam who had to climb the tree and pull down the leaves. In that particular if man has not been up a tree ever since you may consider my whole writing a pleasing figment. He furnished the material for the first dress on record, and he's got to see the thing through, no matter what it costs. The best he can do is quietly to accept the situation, and understand that if he pays his addresses to a young woman successfully he must expect to pay for her dresses thereafter. Matrimony is not one of those enterprises in which it is only the first step that costs. Each and every step is expensive, and one must expect to find the conjugal stares no fancy flight. That's wisdom.

Let me confess that the other evening I got on a train—in fact, I stepped on one. The coupling broke, and the lady slipped on with accelerated speed, like a railway engine without a car to its back. So far was she from the place where the accident occurred that it took me some time to overtake her and offer a suitable apology. With my customary grace, I remarked to her that it was the first time I ever regretted being on the same train with so fair a lady, and hoped that she would pardon my awkwardness with the fare, since so far from being a conductor, I was the most complete non-conductor that ever was. But she did not so much as smile; train-oil was all insufficient to assuage the ruffled waves, and I could not forbear the mental reflection that it was not strange that one who so easily lost her temper should also lose the train.

When a woman stands on one side of the room with nothing on her shoulders, how is a man to know that the bundle of dry-goods lying on the other side of the room belongs to her, and is a part of her dress? Still I have no prejudice against low necks and short sleeves, though I don't wear them myself.

Masquerades are nice. It is pleasant to be devoted to a lady a whole evening through, and discover when the time for unmasking comes that you have been making love to your own wife or your mother. Besides being pleasant for you, it is pleasant for all parties, you see, and greatly adds to the harmony of one's domestic relations.

I attended a charming little masquerade up town the other evening, and went in two characters. Neither of them being my own, I can truthfully and without egotism say that both were good. My first was that of a monk—I aped austerity, and there you have a key to the character—do you see? It seemed to me well to go as a friar rather than as a broiler. Besides, in such a character one is held blameless for any sell in which he may indulge. There were many other characters there, but not a single bad one. I remember one—a woman with two faces—a sort of double-ender, so to speak. This attracted attention on account of its novelty; it is so seldom that we see women with two faces.

Then there was Pocahontas, as charming a squaw as ever one saw, but not well posted in chronology. She accounted for the fairness of her complexion by stating that her mother was white. Having a white mother, it seems rather strange that with a woman's love for change Pocahontas had not married a black Smith. She complained that John didn't use her well, notwithstanding that she saved his life. There you have the moral that wives should never stand between their husbands and the club—especially if it be the Union Club.

There was a Chinese lady with a most Chinese look—at least she had an easy movement of the chin. She had beads around her neck, and was smart; for when I asked her if there she counted her sins or her lovers, she replied, her lovers, adding "You see, holy father, how I get them on a string." To that I replied, "Benedicite, daughter, but to keep them thou shouldst tie a beau-knot." She declined my offer of a little mouse for lunch, saying that she had rats in her hair—it was thence she drew her rations, rash one! I declared myself her father-confessor, and asked her could she love her father, to which she replied yea, but not a grandfather. I then asked might I tarry by her side the evening through; but she made answer, "Nay, you may go, father, and fare worse." Very few women see my fascinations in the same light in which I myself regard them. This is fortunate, perhaps, since were it otherwise all would be as much in love with me as I am with myself. As the thing at present stands, I have no rival.

My second character was that of a Turk—if you knew what we had for dinner that day, you would have another key to my character. The dress was gorgeous; red trowsers, baggy about the knees and elsewhere, covered with gold lace, jacket, vest, sash, jeweled dagger, and turban—nothing was wanting to fit me out for a private ear but turban water-wheels. If you want to see how I looked, just turn to page 248, and see the scene as sketched by our artist specially on the spot. I am sitting at the feet of the Chinese lady, asking her conundrums about Confucius, while she plays "Rock Me to Sleep, Mother," and inquires if Ball wrote it. The girl with the tambourine replies that he could not possibly have written such a pretty thing, being a Jerseyman. The fellow leaning on the pillar, being in reality a Jerseyman disguised as a gentleman, resents the insinuation, and there is prospect of a row. Sergeant Fritz, being charged with keeping the piece, comes up with it at shoulder arms. I sit quiet and composed, as a Turk should. Standing up is not the national amusement of that sensible people: sitting down is their strong suit. My attitude, it will be observed, is graceful and appropriate; something thus turkeys sit on eggs. The costume, by-the-way, is excellent for the man of memory. Any number of things may be said with an air of freshness. Asked to dance, you can answer that in your country you hire others to dance for you—the servants do it. You can express a hope that any remarks you may make will not be considered in Sultan. You can say that the present assemblage can boast its coarse men, but you're a corsair. That you must take your bark, and if any one can be trapped into asking what bark, reply Peruvian. You can display one of the sabres which some years since were fashionable as hair ornaments, and after stating that you have two wives who share one toilette, shout voici le sabre de mon pair. Taking off your turban and clapping it under a lady's nose (this is a very delicate joke), you can ask her if she does not admire the scent, and on her asking what scent, reply Crescent. In short, there is no atrocity which may not be perpetrated if you only go as a Turk and hang out the legend of INIGO.

WHAT OUR ARTISTS ARE DOING.

THE public awaits with interest the result of the rival experiments of the weekly receptions of the artists of Tenth Street and the monthly openings of the studios in Dodsworth's Building. "Every Saturday" has a cheerful sound, is easily remembered, and has the advantage of offering four probabilities against one for a pleasant day. But the atmosphere in the Dodsworth rooms is independent of the sun. It is the most social, and cozy, and chatty, and sunny that can be imagined, suggesting such a contrast with the pervading presence of the Tenth Street rooms as between the dignified generation of the last century and the quick magnetic generation of this. It might suggest a reason for this, perhaps, to add that there are ladies among the artists occupying the Fifth Avenue Studios.

The halls and rooms, at least of the higher floor, are cheery and homely, not up to what one imagines as the classical standard in height, and gloom, and general grandeur; and we find the artists not Byronic, but decidedly gay and cheerful, apparently enjoying their holiday with all their hearts, flitting about from room to room, congratulating each other, and bringing friends to admire and to be introduced. We grew quite melancholy at feeling ourselves only a stranger guest in such a happy, cheerful circle, and wished we were artists at once. But all doors were opened with the widest welcome; and seeing an absorbed group in the studio of G. W. and Jas. Smillie we entered. It was overflowing with pictures—views of the Highlands on the Hudson; an elaborate painting of a scene among the Catskills; the White Hills, from some of the finest points of view; in fact, a somewhat bewildering array of views without the artists' courteous explanation.

Mr. James Hart's is a very agreeable room—not of the Bohemian character in the least, but a cool, quiet retreat, or a warm, comfortable one, as you are inclined to prefer. The pictures on the walls, among which a few old friends greeted us, are pleasantly suggestive of many lovely spots. Noticeable among the studies was the painting of a stark, ghostly tree, with snow-white bark, dead or dying, whose giant height and girth the artist had made more striking by the figure sitting at its base. Upon one easel was a large picture showing a group of cattle awaiting the coming of a storm, gazing with alarm at the heavy clouds that are gathering blacker and more thunderous every moment. In others, also, of Mr. Hart's pictures, cattle are so prominent as to divide the attention with the landscape. Without being anatomical critics we enjoyed looking at their glossy sides and warm colors, perhaps a shade too sleek and clean. Against the wall opposite this picture is another, also large, a pleasing subject, with woods and rustic bridge and cattle, and a river, clear and beautiful. Mr. Hart's last studies indicate his summer home to have been among the White Mountains.

Next door to Mr. Hart's is Mr. Ward's room, filled with studies in clay. But a colossal model of Colonel Perry, for the Newport people, tyrannizes over the studio to the blotting out from the memory of all else—with the notable exception of a small clay model of a negro half liberated. One arm is free, but a chain clasps the other wrist. Standing beside this work a photograph recalls to the memory of the visitor the fine marble carving of the Indian Hunter—a reminder quite unnecessary to all who saw and enjoyed the truth and success of that statue.

Sculptors' studios, utterly colorless, with clay-stained floors, and rows and groups of human form, livid and deathly in clay, or cold and white in marble, strike one with a vague feeling of awe and dread; and to find such fresh, and cheerful, and youthful men as Launt Thompson, and Ward, and Rogers, presiding over these rooms seems incongruous. It is therefore unexpectedly cheering to be greeted by shelves of very familiar acquaintances, not mystical, nor gloomy, nor buried fathoms deep in silence, but in attitude, and expression, and face, interested in most everyday pursuits. Indeed, the one strange group to which Mr. Rogers introduced us told a cheerful and familiar tale.

Not far from Mr. Rogers's, the door of Mrs. Greatorex's home-like studio stands open inviting entrance; and the artist herself, with strikingly dignified presence, courteously shows to the visitor her port-folios of pen-and-ink sketches representing, as far as we had time to look at them, scenes abroad—among the Alps, in Southern Italy and Rome, over which one might linger long.

Mr. Brevoort, grand in stature, and patriarchal in beard and in hospitality, shows us many interesting pictures; among them, one of an early autumn day, with the sun sinking toward the horizon, and lying with a soft, golden light along the tops of the trees that form a group of woods in the middle distance, and making the deep red foliage of the tree at the left glow above in fine contrast with the gathering gloom below. Along the summits of the distant range of hills the same soft light falls, leaving the shadows down the clefts and on the lower slopes. It is a lovely hour of the day—such an hour, and such a scene as must charm the most stolid man, plodding along his daily path, to some wondering glances.

Among the canvases upon the walls are many sweet, quiet views of river and valley—subjects that are more intimately connected than any other with this artist's name. One study was especially attractive, representing an old farmhouse, with the long, steep roof sloping down to the lean-to at the back, a deep shadow falling over the side and down the slopes of the hills from the trees picturesquely grouped at the right and left, and past the hollow which the slopes have made far beyond—a calm, pleasant distance—a scene not tempting the artist to any rearrangement. Still another picture of an autumn view kept us lingering in this studio. The trees are yet in full leaf, with deep, rich foliage, that in the morning or evening sun would glow and burn with intense color, but under the hopeless chill of the slow, heavy clouds covering the sky are dark and solemn. Whatever may be the technical merits of the pictures of Mr. Brevoort, they suggest much that is lovely and full of power over the soul.

Neighbor to Mr. Brevoort is Mr. S. C. Coleman, who is not patriarchal in appearance, as one might unreasonably infer, seeing the new star of the same name already risen above the horizon. Upon an easel well-placed under a good light rested a painting of a sea view, whose effect was to make us forget the subject in a soft, golden light, the whole picture being very pleasant and harmonious in tone. Upon the opposite wall was placed the artist's picture of the Hill of the Alhambra, exhibited by the Academy in 1865. Mr. Coleman's permanent residence in the country is an earnest to his friends that his pictures will never degenerate into studio work, but will contain more truth and more knowledge each year.

Miss Wenzler, in her cheerful room, shows walls hung with careful flower and fruit painting, varied with the landscapes of her brother. Some of these paintings of Miss Wenzler we remember to have seen in exhibitions past, upon the Academy walls, and wonder to see now still in the artist's possession.

Mr. Ferguson has been among many lovely scenes during the last summer.

In leaving the last studios we found ourselves walking mournfully down the stairs and through the halls, almost with a feeling of going from a merry, cheery family circle into a heartless, hurrying crowd of strangers.

In a somewhat brief visit to the studios at 1267 Broadway we failed to find the room of the Misses Granberry, whose flower and fruit painting at the annual exhibitions has often attracted us.

We discovered, however, a group of studios opening into each other in a very sociable way. Entering that of R. Swain Gifford first, we found ourselves surrounded by paintings of the seashore—yellow sand, gray rocks, and the waves breaking in foam over them—studies made upon Grand Menan Island.

Mr. Kunze has again been modeling Puck. Leaving his war-horse—the mammoth grasshopper—on foot and alone he meets his adversary. Astonishment and terror are in his face as this horrible and inconceivable enemy rises straight before him, so near that the fearful horns would touch his flesh, but that he involuntarily shrinks back. We are in full sympathy with Puck; but from our view, this magnified worm of the moth Regalis is altogether comical. He is the ass in the lion's skin—a worm putting on the terrible aspect of the dragon, and stiff and erect as he holds himself, we are very sure he lacks that undoubted essential—a backbone. A child's head and bust just finished looks calmly on the encounter from the same table.

Entering Miss Walter's room from Mr. Kunze's we have entered a new atmosphere, and on every side are looking into tangled mountain forests, at mossy rocks, and tree stems, in deep woods, wonderfully Durand-like in rendering. Mr. Cranch remains still devoted to Venice, and a city more beautiful surely no artist could find. His most important piece, Venice in tri-colors, has already been exhibited.

On the same floor we found the studio of Gilbert Burling, who has several drawings in the new water-color exhibition.

Opposite is the name of T. C. Farrer, in peculiar vermilion letters. Among much to interest in the studio of this artist, one picture seemed to us especially beautiful and successful. There has been a long storm, and the clouds have had their own will. But the sun has his own will also, silently, and his moment has come. He has kindled the thick masses of cloud, and they are burning with intense flame. It is but a momentary victory, but it is glorious. The earth reflects none of this glory, but is revealed to us by it. The low slope of a hill folds down upon the rising slope of the next, and through the hollow where they meet we see distant ranges fast losing their blue. The green is not gone from the woods. In front of them a level line of mist clings to the ground, and a long procession of wheat-stacks, approaching from the base of the hills, passes away at the left of the picture. In the twilight in which we are looking at them they seem a troop of sad ghosts, the last generation of humanity. For another troop is approaching from the right of the picture, quite distinct, almost gay in the falling darkness. One leads, and alone or in pairs the rest follow, some with bowed heads, some erect, some lingering and holding back, some pressing eagerly on.

Among Mr. Farrer's summer's work there are two pictures of Canaan Falls. In the larger the spectator is at the very base of the nearer side of the fall, getting the grandeur of the mass and the feeling of its plunge. A rainbow curves over the face of the cliffs and the spray of the falls, ethereal yet vivid. A small painting of corn-sheaves standing in a sunny field is quite pretty and attractive. The sun is low, and they are half in shadow. Golden pumpkins lie upon the ground. Hills and woods in the distance dimly show the bright tints of fall through the light haze. Studies of the same fall tint are upon the wall. One small study among them, of the White Mountains, not in fall but in early summer, seemed to us very noble in drawing and lovely in its delicate color.

Mr. Kensett, Mr. Baker, and Mr. Louis Lang have rooms also on Broadway, but quite imposing in the space they display compared to the narrow yet cozy limits in which the artist-souls of many of their brethren are confined. In the gathering twilight we entered their rooms, and it may have been the transforming effect of the hour that made their picture-filled galleries, Mr. Lang's painting and modeling rooms for his pupils, their charming Lilliputian kitchen, so bright and clean, with the benign head of this tiny realm so proud and pleased to show it, quite enchanting.

CHILDREN'S CORNER.

THE OLD GRAY CAT.

"PLEASE take me in your lap, auntie," said little Alice.

"Jump!" said Aunt Mary; and she helped the little girl up into her lap.

"Now tell me about your old gray cat."

"My old gray cat had two bright, yellow eyes, and a long, bushy tail. She was very good to catch mice; but she was very mischievous. She could open the doors. She would jump up and put her paw on the latch of the door and press it down. It was not a round latch like ours, but went up and down, so."

Aunt Mary took one of Alice's little fingers and pressed it up and down to show her how the latch moved.

Alice laughed as her finger went up and down, and she said, "Was that the way?"

"Yes, she would press down the latch of the door with her paw, and open came the door. But she could not shut the door."

"Why?" asked Alice.

"Because she had no hands," said Aunt Mary.

"I have got two hands—I can shut the doors," said Alice.

"Yes, you can shut the doors nicely; but my old gray cat had no hands, and she could not. One day grandmamma had some nice milk which she wanted to keep for supper. So she put it in a tin pan, and carried it down cellar, and set it on the table. By-and-by my old gray cat came in from the garden. She had been playing in the garden. She was hungry, and she looked around for something to eat; but she could not find any thing. So she said to herself, 'I wonder if there is not something for me to eat down cellar. I will go down and see.' So she went softly to the cellar door, jumped up, and put her paw on the latch, and pressed it down—"

"So," said Alice, pressing down one of her plump fingers.

"Yes," replied Aunt Mary, "so, and open came the door. Then she went down the stairs. In a minute she saw the pan of milk. So she jumped upon the table and put her tongue into the milk, and began to lap it up. My old gray cat had not any hands to hold a spoon, so she had to lap up the milk with her tongue."

"I can hold a spoon and eat with it," said Alice, making motions as if eating.

"Yes, but my old gray cat had no hands; so she had to lap up the milk with her tongue. After she had eaten as much as she wanted she went up stairs. But she could not shut the door. Pretty soon Grandmamma came into the dining-room, and she saw the cellar door open. So she said to herself, 'I wonder who has left the cellar door open. I am afraid that the old gray cat has opened the door, and gone down, and eaten up my nice milk.' Then she went down cellar, and found that almost all of her nice milk was gone. And she was sorry."

"After a while the old gray cat came into the house again. And Grandmamma called, 'Pussy, Pussy, come here.' Pussy ran up to Grandmamma. 'Now, Pussy,' said Grandmamma, 'you have done very wrong to go down cellar and eat up all my milk without asking. When you are hungry you must come to me, and say "Meow," and I shall give you something to eat. But you must not take any milk without asking.' So the old gray cat said 'Pur-pur,' and went away."

"The next morning, when Grandmamma was getting breakfast in the kitchen, the old gray cat came to her and said 'Meow, meow,' very loud. So Grandmamma knew that she was hungry; and she went and got her some milk, and put it into a saucer, and set it on the floor, and Pussy lapped it all up."

"With her tongue," said Alice.

"Yes, with her tongue," replied Aunt Mary.

GASTRONOMY.

POTTED BEEF.—Take six pounds lean beef (the brisket will do), cutting off the fat. Cut it in several pieces, place in a jar with a little salt and pepper, one small carrot, one onion, and one small turnip; fill up with water; bake three hours, having covered the mouth of the jar with a paste of flour and water. Turn it into a dish, take out the vegetables. Pound the meat with a pestle in the chopping-bowl till it is very fine. Add half a tea-cup of tomato catchup, a small cup of the juice in which it is baked, a glass of claret wine, a tea-spoonful of ground allspice, pepper and salt to the taste. Press into small cups, melt some sweet butter, and turn over them. This will keep two months. It is a delicious relish for luncheon or supper, and spread on bread makes a nice sandwich.

COFFEE CAKE.—One cup of butter, one ditto of molasses, one ditto of good, strong coffee, four ditto of flour, one nutmeg, two eggs, one tea-spoonful of cloves, one ditto of cinnamon, one ditto of soda, and one pound of seeded raisins.

CHOCOLATE MOSS.—Beat the whites of eggs with powdered sugar, flavored with rose or vanilla, to a stiff foam; make water chocolate, very thick, and when cold beat it up with the eggs and sugar. Use the white of one egg and one stick of chocolate for each person.

PRESERVED ORANGES.—Take any number of oranges, and rather more than their weight in white sugar. Slightly grate the oranges, and score them round with a knife, but not cut very deep; then put them in cold water for three days, changing the water two or three times a day; afterward tie them up in a cloth, and boil them till they are soft enough for the head of a pin to penetrate; while they are boiling put your sugar on the fire, with rather more than half a pint of water to each pound; let it boil for a minute or two, and then strain it through muslin; then put the oranges into the sirup till it jellies, and is of a nice yellow color. You can try the sirup by putting some to cool—it must not be too stiff. The sirup need not cover the oranges, but they must be turned so that each part gets thoroughly done.

CORD AND CREESE;

OR,

THE BRANDON MYSTERY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE DODGE CLUB."

CHAPTER XXV.

THE BYZANTINE HYMNISTS.

MORE than a year had passed since that visit to Thornton Grange which has already been mentioned. Despard had not forgotten or neglected the melancholy case of the Brandon family. He had written in all directions, and had gone on frequent visits.

On his return from one of these he went to the Grange. Mrs. Thornton was sitting in the drawing-room, looking pensively out of the window, when she saw his well-known figure advancing up the avenue. His face was sad, and pervaded by a melancholy expression, which was noticeable now as he walked along.

But when he came into the room that melancholy face suddenly lighted up with the most radiant joy. Mrs. Thornton advanced to meet him, and he took her hand in both of his.

"I ought to say, welcome back again," said she, with forced liveliness, "but you may have been in Holby a week for all I know. When did you come back? Confess now that you have been secluding yourself in your study instead of paying your respects in the proper quarter."

Despard smiled. "I arrived home at eleven this morning. It is now three P.M. by my watch. Shall I say how impatiently I have waited till three o'clock should come?"

"Oh no! don't say any thing of the sort. I can imagine all that you would say. But tell me where you have been on this last visit?"

"Wandering like an evil spirit, seeking rest and finding none."

"Have you been to London again?"

"Where have I not been?"

By this time they had seated themselves. "My last journey," said Despard, "like my former ones, was, of course, about the Brandon affair. You know that I have had long conversations with Mr. Thornton about it, and he insists that nothing whatever can be done. But you know, also, that I could not sit down idly and calmly under this conviction. I have felt most keenly the presence of intolerable wrong. Every day I have felt as if I had shared in the infamy of those who neglected that dying man. That was the reason why I wrote to Australia to see if the Brandon who was drowned was really the one I supposed. I heard, you know, that he was the same man, and there is no doubt about that. Then you know, as I told you, that I went around among different lawyers to see if any thing could be done. Nearly all asserted that no redress was possible. That is what Mr. Thornton said. There was one who said that if I were rich enough I might begin a prosecution, but as I am not rich that did me no good. That man would have been glad, no doubt, to have undertaken such a task."

"What is there in law that so hardens the heart?" said Mrs. Thornton, after a pause. "Why should it kill all sentiment, and destroy so utterly all the more spiritual qualities?"

"I don't think that the law does this necessarily. It depends after all on the man himself. If I were a lawyer, I should still love music above all things."

"But did you ever know a lawyer who loved music?"

"I have not known enough of them to answer that. But in England music is not loved so devotedly as in other countries. Is it inconceivable that an Italian lawyer should love music?"

"I don't know. Law is abhorrent to me. It seems to be a profession that kills the finer sentiments."

"Why so, more than medicine? The fact is, where ordinary men are concerned any scientific profession renders Art distasteful. At least this is so in England. After all, most depends on the man himself, and one who is born with a keen sensibility to the charms of art will carry it through life, whatever his profession may be."

"But suppose the man himself has neither taste, nor sensibility, nor any appreciation of the beautiful, nor any sympathy whatever with those who love such things, what then?"

Mrs. Thornton spoke earnestly as she asked this.

"Well," said Despard, "that question answers itself. As a man is born, so he is; and if nature denies him taste or sensibility it makes no difference what is his profession."

Mrs. Thornton made no reply.

"My last journey," said Despard, "was about the Brandon case. I went to London first to see if something could not be done. I had been there before on the same errand, but without success. I was equally unsuccessful this time."

"I tried to find out about Potts, the man who had purchased the estate, but learned that it was necessary to go to the village of Brandon. I went there, and made inquiries. Without exception the people sympathized with the unfortunate family, and looked with detestation upon the man who had supplanted them."

"I heard that a young lady went there last year who was reputed to be his daughter. Every one said that she was extraordinarily beautiful, and looked like a lady. She stopped at the inn under the care of a gentleman who accompanied her, and went to the Hall. She has never come out of it since."

"The landlord told me that the gentleman was a pale, sad-looking man, with dark hair and beard. He seemed very devoted to the young lady, and parted with her in melancholy silence. His account of this young lady moved me very strangely. He was not at all a sentimental man, but a burly John Bull, which made his story all the more touching. It is strange, I must say, that one like her should go into that place and never be seen again. I do not know what to think of it, nor did any of those with whom I spoke in the village."

"Do you suppose that she really went there and never came back?"

"That is what they say."

"Then they must believe that she is kept there."

"Yes, so they do."

"Why do they not take some steps in the matter?"

"What can they do? She is his daughter. Some of the villagers who have been to the Hall at different times say that they heard her playing and singing."

"That does not sound like imprisonment."

"The caged bird sings."

"Then you think she is a prisoner?"

"I think it odd that she has never come out, not even to go to church."

"It is odd."

"This man Potts excited sufficient interest in my mind to lead me to make many inquiries. I found, throughout the county, that every body utterly despised him. They all thought that poor Ralph Brandon had been almost mad, and by his madness had ruined his family. Every body believed that Potts had somehow deceived him, but no one could tell how. They could not bring any direct proof against him."

"But I found out in Brandon the sad particulars of the final fate of the poor wife and her unfortunate children. They had been sent away or assisted away by this Potts to America, and had all died either on the way out or shortly after they had arrived, according to the villagers. I did not tell them what I knew, but left them to believe what they chose. It seemed to me that they must have received this information from Potts himself, who alone in that poor community would have been able to trace the fortunes of the unhappy emigrants."

There was a long silence.

"I have done all that I could," said Despard, in a disconsolate tone, "and I suppose nothing now remains to be done. When we hear again from Paolo there may be some new information upon which we can act."

"And you can go back to your Byzantine poets."

"Yes, if you will assist me."

"You know I shall only be too happy."

"And I shall be eternally grateful. You see, as I told you before, there is a field of labor here for the lover of music which is like a new world. I will give you the grandest musical compositions that you have ever seen. I will let you have the old hymns of the saints, who lived when Constantinople was the only civilized spot in Europe, and the Christians there were hurling back the Mohammedans. You shall sing the noblest songs that you have ever seen."

"How—in Greek? You must teach me the alphabet then."

"No; I will translate them for you. The Greek hymns are all in rhythmical prose, like the Te Deum and the Gloria. A literal translation can be sung as well as the originals. You will then enter into the mind and spirit of the ancient Eastern Church before the days of the schism."

"Yes," continued Despard, with an enthusiasm which he did not care to conceal, "we will go together at this sweet task, and we will sing the καθ' ἑκάστην ἡμέραν, which holds the same place in the Greek Church that the Te Deum does in ours. We will chant together the Golden Canon of St. John Damascene—the Queen of Canons, the grandest song of 'Christ is risen' that mortals ever composed. Your heart and mine will beat together with one feeling at the sublime choral strain. We will sing the 'Hymn of Victory.' We will go together over the songs of St. Cosmas, St. Theophanes, and St. Theodore; St. Gregory, St. Ananias, and St. Andrew of Crete shall inspire us; and the thoughts that have kindled the hearts of martyrs at the stake shall exalt our souls to heaven. But I have more than this. I have some compositions of my own; poor ones, indeed, yet an effort in the right way. They are a collection of those hymns of the Primitive Church which are contained in the New Testament. I have tried to set them to music. They are: 'Worthy is the Lamb,' 'Unto Him that loved us,' 'Great and marvelous are thy works,' and the 'Trisagion.' Yes, we will go together at this lofty and heavenly work, and I shall be able to gain a new interpretation from your sympathy."

Despard spoke with a vehement enthusiasm that kindled his eyes with unusual lustre and spread a glow over his pale face. He looked like some devotee under a sudden inspiration. Mrs. Thornton caught all his enthusiasm; her eyes brightened, and her face also flushed with excitement.

"Whenever you are ready to lead me into that new world of music," said she, "I am ready to follow."

"Are you willing to begin next Monday?"

"Yes. All my time is my own."

"Then I will come for you."

"Then I will be waiting for you. By-the-way, are you engaged for to-night?"

"No; why?"

"There is going to be a fête champêtre. It is a ridiculous thing for the Holby people to do; but I have to go to play the patroness. Mr. Thornton does not want to go. Would you sacrifice yourself to my necessities, and allow me your escort?"

"Would a thirsty man be willing to accept a cooling draught?" said Despard, eagerly. "You open heaven before me, and ask me if I will enter."

His voice trembled, and he paused.

"You never forget yourself," said Mrs. Thornton, with slight agitation, looking away as she spoke.

"I will be back at any hour you say."

"You will do no such thing. Since you are here you must remain and dine, and then go with me. Do you suppose I would trust you? Why, if I let you go, you might keep me waiting a whole hour."

"Well, if your will is not law to me what is? Speak, and your servant obeys. To stay will only add to my happiness."

"Then let me make you happy by forcing you to stay."

Despard's face showed his feelings, and to judge by its expression his language had not been extravagant.

The afternoon passed quietly. Dinner was served up. Thornton came in, and greeted Despard with his usual abstraction, leaving his wife to do the agreeable. After dinner, as usual, he prepared for a nap, and Despard and Mrs. Thornton started for the fête.

It was to be in some gardens at the other end of Holby, along the shore. The townspeople had recently formed a park there, and this was one of the preliminaries to its formal inauguration. The trees were hung with innumerable lamps of varied colors. There were bands of music, and triumphal arches, and gay festoons, and wreaths of flowers, and every thing that is usual at such a time.

On arriving, Despard assisted Mrs. Thornton from the carriage and offered her arm. She took it, but her hand rested so lightly on it that its touch was scarce perceptible. They walked around through the illuminated paths. Great crowds of people were there. All looked with respectful pleasure at Mrs. Thornton and the Rector.

"You ought to be glad that you have come," said she. "See how these poor people feel it! We are not persons of very great consequence, yet our presence is marked and enjoyed."

"All places are alike to me," answered Despard, "when I am with you. Still, there are circumstances about this which will make it forever memorable to me."

"Look at those lights," exclaimed Mrs. Thornton, suddenly; "what varied colors!"

"Let us walk into that grotto," said Despard, turning toward a cool, dark place which lay before them.

Here, at the end of the grotto, was a tree, at the foot of which was a seat. They sat down and staid for hours. In the distance the lights twinkled and music arose. They said little, but listened to the confused murmur which in the pauses of the music came up from afar.

Then they rose and walked back. Entering the principal path a great crowd streamed on which they had to face.

Despard sighed. "You and I," said he, stooping low and speaking in a sad voice, "are compelled to go against the tide."

"Shall we turn back and go with it?"

"We can not."

"Do you wish to turn aside?"

"We can not. We must walk against the tide, and against the rush of men. If we turn aside there is nothing but darkness."

They walked on in silence till they reached the gate.

"The carriage has not come," said Mrs. Thornton.

"Do you prefer riding?"

"No."

"It is not far. Will you walk?"

"With pleasure."

They walked on slowly. About half-way they met the carriage. Mrs. Thornton ordered it back, saying that she would walk the rest of the way.

They walked on slowly, saying so little that at last Mrs. Thornton began to speak about the music which they had proposed to undertake. Despard's enthusiasm seemed to have left him. His replies were vague and general. On reaching the gate he stood still for a moment under the trees and half turned toward her. "You don't say any thing about the music?" said she.

"That's because I am so stupid. I have lost my head. I am not capable of a single coherent idea."

"You are thinking of something else all the time."

"My brain is in a whirl. Yes, I am thinking of something else."

"Of what?"

"I'm afraid to say."

Mrs. Thornton was silent. They entered the gate and walked up the avenue, slowly and in silence. Despard made one or two efforts to stop, and then continued. At last they reached the door. The lights were streaming brightly from the window. Despard stood, silently.

"Will you not come in?"

"No, thank you," said he, dreamily. "It is rather too late, and I must go. Good-night."

He held out his hand. She offered hers, and he took it. He held it long, and half stooped as though he wished to say something. She felt the throbbing of his heart in his hand as it clasped hers. She said nothing. Nor did Despard seem able to say any thing. At last he let go her hand slowly and reluctantly.

"You will not forget the music?" said he.

"No."

"Good-night."

He took her hand again in both of his. As the light shone through the windows she saw his face—a face full of longing beyond words, and sadness unutterable.

"Good-night," she faltered.

He let go her hand, and turning away, was lost amidst the gloom. She waited till the sound of his footsteps had died away, and then went into the house.

On the following morning Despard was walking along when he met her suddenly at a corner of the street. He stopped with a radiant face, and, shaking hands with her, for a moment was unable to speak.

"This is too much happiness," he said at last. "It is like a ray of light to a poor captive when you burst upon me so suddenly. Where are you going?"

"Oh, I'm only going to do a little shopping."

"I'm sure I wish that I could accompany you to protect you."

"Well, why not?"

"On the whole, I think that shopping is not my forte, and that my presence would not be essential."

He turned, however, and walked with her some distance, as far as the farthest shop in the town. They talked gayly and pleasantly about the fête. "You will not forget the music," said he, on parting. "Will you come next Monday? If you don't, I won't be responsible for the consequences."

"Do you mean to say, Sir, that you expect me to come alone?"

"I did not hope for any thing else."

"Why, of course, you must call for me. If you do not I won't go."

Despard's eyes brightened.

"Oh, then, since you allow me so sweet a privilege, I will go and accompany you."

"If you fail me I will stay at home," said she, laughingly.

He did not fail her, but at the appointed time went up to the Grange. Some strangers were there, and Mrs. Thornton gave him a look of deep disappointment. The strangers were evidently going to spend the day, so Despard, after a short call, withdrew. Before he left, Mrs. Thornton absented herself on some pretext for a few moments, and as he quitted the room she went to the door with him and gave him a note.

He walked straight home, holding the note in his hands till he reached his study; then he locked himself in, opened the note, and read as follows:

"DEAR MR. DESPARD,—How does it happen that things turn out just as they ought not? I was so anxious to go with you to the Church to-day about our music. I know my own powers; they are not contemptible; they are not uncultivated; they are simply, and wholly, and irretrievably commonplace. That much I deem it my duty to inform you.

"These wretched people, who have spoiled a day's pleasure, dropped upon me as suddenly as though they had come from the skies. They leave on Thursday morning. Come on Thursday afternoon. If you do not I will never forgive you. On that day give up your manuscripts and books for music and the organ, and allot some portion of your time to, Yours,

"T. T."

On Thursday Despard called, and Mrs. Thornton was able to accompany him. The church was an old one, and had one of the best organs in Wales. Despard was to play and she to sing. He had his music ready, and the sheets were carefully and legibly written out from the precious old Greek scores which he loved so dearly and prized so highly.

They began with the canon for Easter-day of St. John Damascene, who, according to Despard, was the best of the Eastern hymnists. Mrs. Thornton's voice was rich and full. As she came to the ἀναστάσις ἡμέρα—Resurrection Day—it took up a tone of indescribable exultation, blending with the triumph peal of the organ. Despard added his own voice—a deep, strong, full-toned basso—and their blended strains bore aloft the sublimest of utterances, "Christ is arisen!"

Then followed a more mournful chant, full of sadness and profound melancholy, the τελευταῖον ἄσμασμα—The Last Kiss—the hymn of the dead, by the same poet.

Then followed a sublimer strain, the hymn of St. Theodore on the Judgment—τὴν ἡμέραν τὴν φρικτὴν—where all the horrors of the day of doom are set forth. The chant was commensurate with the dread splendors of the theme. The voices of the two singers blended in perfect concord. The sounds which were thus wrought out bore themselves through the vaulted aisles, returning again to their own ears, imparting to their own hearts something of the awe with which imagination has enshrouded the Day of days, and giving to their voices that saddened cadence which the sad spirit can convey to its material utterance.

Despard then produced some compositions of his own, made after the manner of the Eastern chants, which he insisted were the primitive songs of the early Church. The words were those fragments of hymns which are imbedded in the text of the New Testament. He chose first the song of the angels, which was first sung by "a great voice out of heaven"—ἰδοὺ, ἡ ἀκροῖα τοῦ Θεοῦ—Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men!

The chant was a marvelous one. It spoke of sorrow past, of grief stayed, of misery at an end forever, of tears dried, and a time when "there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying." There was a gentle murmur in the flow of that solemn, soothing strain which was like the sighing of the evening wind among the hoary forest trees; it soothed and comforted; it brought hope, and holy calm, and sweet peace.

As Despard rose from the organ Mrs. Thornton looked at him with moistened eyes.

"I do not know whether your song brings calm or unrest," said she, sadly, "but after singing it I would wish to die."

"It is not the music, it is the words," answered Despard, "which bring before us a time when there shall be no sorrow or sighing."

"May such a time ever be?" murmured she.

"That," he replied, "it is ours to aim after. There is such a world. In that world all wrongs will be righted, friends will be reunited, and those severed here through all this earthly life will be joined for evermore."

Their eyes met. Their spirit lived and glowed in that gaze. It was sad beyond expression, but each one held commune with the other in a mute intercourse, more eloquent than words.

Despard's whole frame trembled. "Will you sing the Ave Maria?" he asked, in a low, scarce audible voice. Her head dropped. She gave a convulsive sigh. He continued: "We used to sing it in the old days, the sweet, never-forgotten days now past forever. We sang it here. We stood hand in hand."

His voice faltered.

"Sing," he said, after a time.

"I can not."

Despard sighed. "Perhaps it is better not; for I feel as though, if you were to sing it, my heart would break."

"Do you believe that hearts can break?" she asked gently, but with indescribable pathos.

Despard looked at her mournfully, and said not a word.

CHAPTER XXVI.
CLASPED HANDS.

THEIR singing went on.

They used to meet once a week and sing in the church at the organ. Despard always went up to the Grange and accompanied her to the church. Yet he scarcely ever went at any other time. A stronger connection and a deeper familiarity arose between them, which yet was accompanied by a profound reverence on Despard's part, that never diminished, but as the familiarity increased only grew more tender and more devoted.

"AND THEIR BLENDED STRAINS BORE ALOFT THE SUBLIMEST OF UTTERANCES, 'CHRIST IS ARISEN!'"

There were many things about their music which he had to say to her. It constituted a common bond between them on which they could talk, and to which they could always revert. It formed a medium for the communion of soul—a lofty, spiritual intercourse, where they seemed to blend, even as their voices blended, in a purer realm, free from the trouble of earth.

Amidst it all Despard had so much to tell her about the nature of the Eastern music that he wrote out a long letter, which he gave her as they parted after an unusually lengthy practice. Part of it was on the subject of music, and the rest of a different character.

The next time that they met she gave him a note in response.

"DEAR MR. DESPARD—Why am I not a seraph, endowed with musical powers beyond mortal reach? You tell me many things, and never seem to imagine that they are all beyond me. You never seem to think that I am hopelessly commonplace. You are kind in doing what you do, but where is the good where one is so stupid as I am?

"I suppose you have given up visiting the Grange forever. I don't call your coming to take me to the church visits. I suppose I may as well give you up. It is as difficult to get you here as if you were the Grand Lama of Thibet.

"Amidst all my stupidities I have two or three ideas which may be useful in our music, if I can only put them in practice. Bear with me, and deal gently with

"Yours, despondingly, T. T."

To this Despard replied in a note which he gave her at their next meeting, calling her "Dear Seraph," and signing himself "Grand Lama." After this they always called each other by these names. Grand Lama was an odd name, but it became the sweetest of sounds to Despard since it was uttered by her lips—the sweetest, the most musical, and the tenderest. As to himself he knew not what to call this dear companion of his youth, but the name Seraph came into use, and grew to be associated with her, until at last he never called her any thing else.

Yet after this he used to go to the Grange more frequently. He could not stay away. His steps wandered there irresistibly. An uncontrollable impulse forced him there. She was always alone awaiting him, generally with a sweet confusion of face and a tenderness of greeting which made him feel ready to fall on his knees before her. How else could he feel? Was she not always in his thoughts? Were not all his sleeping hours one long dream of her? Were not all his waking thoughts filled with her radiant presence?

"How is it under our control
To love or not to love?"

Did he know what it was that he felt for her? He never thought. Enough that he felt. And memory of this bright being, and cherished his undying fondness, not knowing what that fondness meant. He had returned to find her married, and severed from him forever, at least in this life. When he found that he had lost her he began to understand how dear she was. All life stood before him aimless, pointless, and meaningless without her. He came back, but the old intercourse could not be renewed; she could not be his, and he could only live, and love, and endure. Perhaps it would have been wiser if he had at once left Holby and sought out some other abode. But the discovery of his love was gradual; it came through suffering and anguish; and when he knew that his love was so intense it was then impossible to leave. To be near her, to breathe the same air, to see her face occasionally, to nurse his old memories, to hoard up new remembrances of her words and looks—these now became the chief occupation of his hours of solitude, and the only happiness left him in his life.

One day he went up with a stronger sense of desolation in his heart than usual, going up to see her in order to get consolation from the sight of her face and the sound of her voice. Their former levity had given place to a seriousness of manner which was very different. A deep, intense joy shone in the eyes of each at meeting, but that quick repartee and light badinage which they had used of old had been dropped.

Music was the one thing of which they could speak without fear. Despard could talk of his Byzantine poets, and the chants of the Eastern Church, without being in danger of reawakening painful memories. The piano stood close by, and always afforded a convenient mode of distracting attention when it became too absorbed in one another.

For Mrs. Thornton did not repel him; she did not resent his longing; she did not seem forgetful of what he so well remembered. How was it with her who had given her hand to another?

"What she felt the while Dare he think?"

Yet there were times when he thought it possible that she might feel as he did. The thought brought joy, but it also brought fear. For, if the struggle against this feeling needed all the strength of his nature, what must it cost her? If she had such a struggle as he, how could she endure it? Then, as he considered this, he thought to himself that he would rather she would not love him than love him at such a cost. He was willing to sacrifice his own heart. He wished only to adore her, and was content that she should receive, and permit, and accept his adoration, herself unmoved—a passionless divinity.

In their intercourse it was strange how frequently there were long pauses of perfect silence, during which neither spoke a word. Sometimes each sat looking at the floor; sometimes they looked at one another, as though they could read each other's thoughts, and by the mere gaze of their earnest eyes could hold ample spiritual communion.

On one such occasion they stood by the window looking out upon the lawn, but seeing nothing in that abstracted gaze. Despard stood facing her, close to her. Her hand was hanging by her side. He stooped and took that little slender hand in his. As he did so he trembled from head to foot. As he did so a faint flush passed over her face. Her head fell forward. Despard held her hand and she did not withdraw it. Despard drew her slightly toward him. She looked up into his face with large, eloquent eyes, sad beyond all description, yet speaking things which thrilled his soul. He looked down upon her with eyes that told her all that was in his heart. She turned her head away.

Despard clung to her hand as though that hand were his life, his hope, his joy—as though that alone could save him from some abyss of despair into which he was falling. His lips moved. In vain. No audible sound broke that intense stillness in which the beating and throbbing of those two forlorn hearts could be heard. His lips moved, but all sound died away upon them.

At last a stronger effort broke the silence.

"Teresa!"

It was a strange tone, a tone of longing unutterable, a tone like that which a dying man might use in calling before him one most dear. And all the pent-up feeling of years rushed forth in concentrated energy, and was borne to her ears in the sound of that one word. She looked up with the same glance as before.

"Little playmate," said he, in a tone of infinite sweetness, "have you ever forgotten the old days? Do you remember when you and I last stood hand in hand?"

His voice sounded like the utterance of tears, as though, if he could have wept, he would then have wept as no man wept before; but his eyes were dry through his manhood, and all that tears can express were shown forth in his tone.

As he began to speak her head fell again. As he ended she looked up as before. Her lips moved. She whispered but one word:

"Courtenay!"

She burst into a flood of tears and sank into a chair. And Despard stood, not daring even to soothe her, for fear lest in that vehement convulsion of his soul all his self-command should give way utterly.

At length Mrs. Thornton rose. "Lama," said she, at last, in a low, sad voice, "let us go to the piano."

"Will you sing the Ave Maria?" he asked, mournfully.

"I dare not," said she, hastily. "No, any thing but that. I will sing Rossini's Cujus Animam."

Then followed those words which tell in lofty strains of a broken heart:

Cujus animam gementem
Contristatam et flebentem
Pertransivit gladius!

BUTTERFLEE'S GHOST.

BUTTERFLEE'S GHOST.

IT is a great many years ago, but I have still a most vivid recollection of the terrible fright that "Butterflee's Ghost" gave me. We were living at the period of the awful event in a very old, rambling house on the coast of Cornwall. The place had been so altered and added to by successive tenants that it bore a curious resemblance to one of those strange organizations of the insect world which increase by buds and offshoots, have promiscuously two heads to one stomach, or two stomachs to one head, and whose heads and tails are interchangeable, and "do duty" in either capacity, just as may be found convenient, pleasant, or profitable.

The whole building was a mass of passages and rooms with little or no apparent arrangement—steps up here, steps down there, passages leading to rooms, and passages leading to nowhere in particular; pantries and parlors, bedrooms and larders, kitchens and cellars, all jumbled up together. But it was in passages, cellars, and concealments of all sorts that the house was most remarkable. There was, however, a method in all the seeming confusion, for it had been the head-quarters of a notorious smuggler and wrecker, and was admirably suited for the concealment of his contraband wares, and the plunder acquired by wrecking, and various other not less villainous practices.

At that time, and in that part of the country, every one had a nickname by which, and frequently by which only, he or she was recognized. There was always some reason for the sobriquet, generally a ridiculous, often a disreputable one: why, I never understood, but far and wide this old rascal was called "Butterfly," or, according to the Cornish pronunciation, "Butterflee;" his real name was Leity, but few knew him, and no one ever spoke of him, by that name. It was the universal belief that "old Butterflee" had sold himself to the evil one for a thousand pounds and a miraculously inexhaustible keg of brandy.

Butterflee had been dead for a score or two of years; and the thousand pounds, and many more, the produce of smuggling and plunder, had long ago been dissipated in riot and debauchery by his heir; but the "devil's brandy-keg" had never been seen since his death, and was still concealed, so it was gravely asserted, in some mysterious recess or corner of the old house, and over which the ghost of Butterflee had been condemned to keep watch and ward.

If any one had pluck enough to face the ghost, and luck enough to find the miraculous keg, he would become lawfully possessed of the wonderful vessel, which would yield to him, as it had done to Butterflee, a continual supply of the strongest and most exquisitely-flavored brandy.

Whatever may be the case now, at that time teetotal doctrines were utterly unknown in "those parts," and total abstainers were indeed few; I doubt whether a single live specimen could have been found in a long day's march. Brandy was therefore in universal favor, and many an adventurous and thirsty soul had rummaged the old house from top to bottom in search of the magic brandy; none had found it, but some who had fortified their courage, before proceeding on the adventure, by a goodly supply of spirits obtained from a more legitimate source, had, much to their discomfiture and fright, encountered the veritable ghost of Butterflee himself, wrapped in a fiery sheet, and glaring on them, not with "lack-lustre eyes," but with orbs which resembled two saucers of burning brandy.

To express a disbelief in the ghost of Butterflee was, in the eyes of every man, woman, and child in the village, to be worse than a heathen.

I had heard the story of Butterflee's Ghost over and over again, and though I pretended to laugh at what I was pleased to call the "uneducated ignorance of the rustic mind," I was in heart much more than half a believer.

On the eventful night of my ghostly encounter it was blowing a terrific gale; indeed, the weather had been so bad that it had kept us all indoors the whole day. Tea was just over, and the family-party had settled down to their various occupations—my father to his pipe, my mother and sister to their sewing, and I to my book, which was Mrs. Crowe's "Night-side of Nature"—an edifying production certainly, but just then the "new book." The conversation had taken a ghostly turn—my father relating many stories of the superstitions of the neighborhood, and others which he had picked up in his travels.

The southwester roared in the chimneys, and whistled through the crevices of the shutters, shaking every window in the old house, and making the very tiles rattle again on the lofty roof.

"By George, how it blows!" said my father, breaking off in the middle of his lecture on the supernatural. "Go to the kitchen, Jack, and tell Benjamin to take some of the lads down with him to the cove and haul the boat further up the beach; if she remains where we left her she will be knocked into toothpicks at high-water!"

I rose from my seat to do as I was bidden, and was taking a candle from the table, when my father, who was about to light his pipe at it, said, "Never mind the candle, Jack; surely a fellow who wants to be a sailor can find his way in the dark." Though much disconcerted by this remark, I made no reply, but put down the light and was going out of the room, when my sister said, somewhat maliciously, "Take care of Butterflee's ghost, Jack!"

Now I may as well candidly confess that I did not feel at all comfortable. The passage leading to the kitchen happened to be Butterflee's favorite cruising-ground. It was a long, rambling place, here bulging out almost into the size of a room, and there contracting to such narrow dimensions as hardly to leave room for two people to pass. Various cross-passages branched from it, leading to cellars and disused lumber-rooms of all sorts and sizes. To keep out damp and cold the passage was cut off from the parlor and divided into compartments, by more than one door.

"No man is wise at all times," says the proverb, and no man is brave at all times, say I. To tell the truth, I felt unusually nervous, and experienced a very unpleasant sensation in the indefinite apprehension that I might "see something"—I knew not what.

I had a mind to turn back, but I dreaded my father's jokes and my sister's laughter. I well knew my mother, dear soul! would "stick up" for me, but that would not influence the other two, so I screwed up my courage and went on, carefully feeling my way by the wall. On reaching one of the doors, just mentioned, I cautiously threw it open. Heaven and earth, there stood Butterflee! Yes, there was no mistake about it this time; there he was, the veritable, dreaded Butterflee, in all the awful horrors of ghostly majesty! His whole body glowed like a red-hot mass of iron; he appeared to float in the air; his head, brighter and more vivid than the rest of his body, touched the ceiling; his feet were some way, but not far, from the floor; his eyes, oh dear! oh dear! their burning, fiery expression was altogether too much for me. I stood motionless, transfixed with terror and amazement, my soul well-nigh "harrowed up," and "each particular hair," no doubt, standing on end!

I had no sooner beheld the terrible apparition than my ears were saluted with a dull, screaming groan, which sounded through the passage. There was a rush, as of a stormy wind, and the ghost of Butterflee swung himself toward me, as if to clasp me in his hideous embrace. I cried with a loud voice, and fled in frantic haste in the direction of the parlor, into which I rushed, exclaiming, as I fell into my mother's arms, "Butterflee's ghost! Butterflee's ghost!"

My mother looked as frightened as I was, so did my sister, who straightway showed signs of "going off" into a real faint; but my father, as he snatched up a candle, and went hastily out of the room into the passage, merely said, "What an ass that boy is!"

No doubt, good reader, you quite agree with my father; but, allow me to ask, did you ever see a ghost? Or (what is just the same thing, so far as the fright goes), did you ever think you saw a ghost? Did you ever stand face to face with one, close on board of you, hear his awful groan, and see him advance, as you verily thought, to seize you in his arms? If you never did, then you know nothing at all about it, and are not entitled to "write me down an ass," or even to give an opinion on so important a point.

My father and the light soon cleared up this terrible mystery.

The dreadful ghost was nothing more than a gigantic ood-fish, suspended from the roof in that part of the passage which was used as a larder. It had been caught a few days previously, and was rather stale and very phosphorescent, and, consequently, brightly luminous in the dark!

The other phenomena were the joint production of Thomasina (called Tammy for shortness) the house-maid, our man Joseph, and my own imagination. Tammy and Joe were a loving couple, and if you went to look for one you were pretty sure to find the other not far off. Their story was that they had been to the cellar to draw some cider for supper—they had taken a candle with them, but somehow or other it had gone out—blown out by the wind, as they said, and every one, of course, believed them. The groan was the complaint of the rusty hinges of the cellar-door—the rushing sound was—well, I don't think that was ever satisfactorily explained; but the "dash" of Butterflee into my arms was occasioned by Miss Tammy, who very cleverly contrived to fall over Joseph, and, clutching at the great fish to save herself, sent it swinging through the darkness in the direction of myself.

I have been east and west many a long mile since then, and in many a far-distant country, and have seen many a sight, not only of "wonder," but of horror, too; I have faced perils by land, and perils by water, but I can safely say that none ever gave me "such an awful turn" as the terrible apparition of Butterflee's Ghost!

THE TOAD.

By HANS CHRISTIAN ANDERSEN.

THE well was deep, and so the rope was long, and the wheel went heavily round, before one could hoist the bucket over the side of the well. The sun could not reach so far as to shine upon the water, however clear the day might be; but as far as it could shine there were green weeds growing between the stones.

A family of the toad race dwelt here. They were emigrants; indeed, they had all come plump down in the person of the old toad-mother, who was still alive. The green frogs who swam in the water had been at home here ever so much longer, but they acknowledged their cousins, and called them "the well-guests." The latter, however, had no thoughts of ever flitting: they made themselves very comfortable here on the dry land, as they called the wet stones.

Dame Frog had once traveled riding in the bucket as it went up; but the light was too much for her, and gave her spasm in the eyes; luckily she got out of the bucket. She fell with a frightful splash in the water, and lay up for three days with the back-ache. She had not much to tell about the upper world, but one thing she did know, and so did all the others now—that the well was not the whole world. Dame Toad might have told them a thing or two more, but she never answered any questions, and so they left off asking any.

"Nasty, ugly, squat, and fat she is!" said the young green frogs; "and her brats are getting just like her."

"May be so!" said Dame Toad; "but one of them has a jewel in its head, or else I have it myself."

The green frogs listened and stared, and as they did not like to hear that they made faces and went to the bottom. But the young toads stretched their hind-legs out of sheer pride. Each of them thought it had the jewel, and so they all kept their heads quite still: but at last they began to ask what sort of thing they had to be proud of, and what a jewel was exactly?

"It is something so splendid and so precious," said Dame Toad, "that I can not describe it; it is something that one wears to please one's self, and that others fret to death after. But don't ask questions; I shan't answer them."

"Well, I have not got the jewel," said the smallest toad, which was as ugly as ugly could be. "How should I have any thing so splendid? and, if it vexed others, why, it could not please me. No; all I want is to get up to the well-side, and have one peep out: that would be glorious!"

"Better stay where you are," said the old one. "Here you are at home, and you know what it's like. Keep clear of the bucket, or it may squash you. And even if you get safe into it you may fall out again, and it is not every one that can fall so luckily as I did, and keep legs and eggs all safe and sound."

"Quack!" said the little one; and that means the same as when we men say "Alack!"

It did so long to get up the well-side and look out; it felt quite a yearning after the green things up yonder. And so next morning as the bucket was going up, when it happened to stop for an instant before the stone where the toad sat, the little creature quivered through and through, and edged into the bucket. It sank to the bottom of the water, which was presently drawn up and poured out.

"Phuh, botheration!" said the man when he saw it; "it is the ugliest I have ever seen." He kicked with his wooden shoe at the toad, which was near being crippled, but managed to escape into the middle of some tall stinging-nettles. It saw stalks side by side around it, and it looked upward too. The sun shone on the leaves; they were quite transparent. For the toad it was the same as it is for us men, when we come all at once into a great forest, where the sun is shining between leaves and branches.

"It is much prettier here than down in the well! One might well stop here for one's whole lifetime," said the little toad. It lay there one hour; it lay there two. "Now, I wonder what there is outside; as I have gone so far I may as well go further." And it crawled as fast as it could crawl till it came out into the full sunshine, and got powdered with dust as it marched across a high-road.

"This is something like being on dry land," said the toad; "I am getting almost too much of a good thing; it tickles right into me."

Now it came to a ditch; the forget-me-not grew here, and the meadow-sweet; beyond it was a hedge of white-thorn and elder-bushes, and the convolvulus crept and hung about it. Here were fine colors to be seen! And yonder flew a butterfly. The toad thought that it was a flower, which had broken loose, in order to look about it in the world; it really seemed so very natural.

"If one could only get along like that!" said the toad. "Quack—alack, oh, how glorious!"

For eight days and nights it lingered by the ditch, and felt no want of food. The ninth day it thought, "Further—forward!" But was there any thing more beautiful to be found then? perhaps a little toad, or some green frogs: there had been a sound in the wind last night, as if there were "cousins" in the neighborhood.

"It is a fine thing to live! to come out of the well; to lie in stinging nettles; to creep along a dusty road, and to rest in a wet ditch! But forward still! let us find out frogs or a little toad; one can not do without them, after all; nature, by itself, is not enough for one!" And so it set out again on its wanderings.

It came to a field and a large pond, with rushes round it: it took a look inside.

"It is too wet for you here, isn't it?" said the frogs, "but you are quite welcome. Are you a he or a she?—not that it matters, you are welcome all the same."

And so it was invited to a concert in the evening—a family concert; great excitement and thin voices! we all know that sort of thing. There were no refreshments, except drink; but that was free to all—the whole pond, if they pleased.

"Now I shall travel further," said the little toad. It was always craving after something better.

It saw the stars twinkle, so large and so clear; it saw the new moon shine; it saw the sun rise, higher and higher.

"I think I am still in the well, in a larger well; I must get higher up! I feel a restlessness, a longing," and when the moon had grown full and round, the poor creature thought, "Can that be the bucket which is being let down, and which I must pop into if I wish to get higher up? Or is the sun the great bucket? How great it is, and how beaming! It could hold all of us together. I must watch for my opportunity. What a brightness in my head! I do not believe that the jewel can shine better. The jewel! I have it not, and shall not cry after it. No; higher still in glitter and gladness! I feel an assurance, and yet a fear; it is a hard step to take, but it must be taken! Forward! right on along the high-road!"

And it stepped out, as well as such a crawling creature can, till it came to the great thoroughfare, where the men lived. Here there were flower-gardens and cabbage-gardens. It turned aside to rest in a cabbage-garden.

"What a number of different beings there are, which I know nothing about! and how great and blessed is the world! But one must keep looking about one, instead of sitting always in the same corner." And so it sidled into the cabbage-garden. "How green it is here! how pretty it is here!"

"That I know well enough!" said the caterpillar, on the leaf. "My leaf is the largest here; it covers half the world—but as for the world I can do without it."

"Cluck! cluck!" said somebody, and fowls came tripping into the cabbage-garden. The foremost hen was long-sighted; she spied out the worm on the curly leaf, and pecked at it, so that it fell to the ground, where it lay, twisting and turning. The hen looked first with one eye and then with the other, for she could not make out what was to be the end of all this wriggling.

"It does not do this of its own accord," thought the hen, and lifted her head for a finishing stroke. The toad grew so frightened that it crawled right up against the hen.

"So it has friends to fight for it!" said she; "just look at the crawler!" and the hen turned tail. "I sha'n't trouble myself about the little green mouthful; it only gives me a tickling in the throat." The other fowls were of the same opinion, and away they went.

"I have wriggled away from her," said the caterpillar; "it is good to have presence of mind, but the hardest task remains, to get up on to my cabbage-leaf. Where is it?"

And the little toad came forward and expressed its sympathies. It was glad of its own ugliness that had frightened away the hen.

"What do you mean by that?" asked the caterpillar. "I got rid of her myself, I tell you! You are very unpleasant to look at! Mayn't I be allowed to get back into my own? Now I smell cabbage! Now I am near my leaf! There is nothing so beautiful as what is one's own. I must go higher up still."

"Yes, higher up!" said the little toad, "higher up! it feels just as I feel; but it is not in good-humor to-day; that comes of the fright. We all wish to get higher up." And it looked up as high as it could.

The stork sat in his nest on the farmer's roof; he clattered, and the stork mother clattered.

"How high they live!" thought the toad. "Pity that one can't get up there!"

There were two young students lodging in the farm-house: one of them was a poet, the other a naturalist. The one sang and wrote in gladness of all that God had created, even as its image was reflected in his heart; he sang it out short and clear, and rich in resounding verses. The other took hold of the thing itself; ay, and split it up, if necessary. He treated our Lord's creation like some vast piece of arithmetic; subtracted, multiplied, wished to know it outside and inside, and to talk of it with reason; nothing but reason; and he talked of it in gladness too, and cleverly. They were good, glad-hearted men, both of them.

"Yonder sits a fine specimen of a toad," said the naturalist; "I must have it in spirit."

"You have two already," said the poet; "let it sit in peace and enjoy itself."

"But it is so beautifully ugly!" said the other.

"Yes, if we could find the jewel in its head!" said the poet, "then I myself might lend a hand in splitting it up."

"The jewel!" said the other. "Much you know about natural history!"

"But is there not something very fine, at least, in popular belief, that the toad, the ugliest of creatures, often hides in its head the most precious of all jewels? Is it not much the same with men? Was there not such a jewel hidden in Æsop, and Socrates too?"

The toad heard nothing more; and even so far, it did not understand half of it. The two friends went on; and it escaped being put into spirit.

"They were talking about the jewel, too," said the toad. "I am just as well without it; otherwise I should have got into trouble."

There was a clattering upon the farmer's roof. Father Stork was delivering a lecture to his family, while they all looked down askant at the two young men in the cabbage-garden.

"Man is the most conceited of creatures!" said the stork.

"Hark, how they are going on—clatter, clatter—and yet they can not rattle off a regular tattoo! They puff themselves up with notions of their eloquence—their language! A rare language, indeed; it shifts from one jabber to another, at every day's journey. Our language we can talk the whole world over, whether in Denmark or in Egypt. As for flying, they can't manage it at all. They push along by means of a contrivance which they call a 'railway,' but there they often get their necks broken. It gives me the shivers in my bill when I think of it. The world can exist without men. What good are they to us? All that we want are frogs and earth-worms?"

"That was a grand speech, now!" thought the little toad. "What a great man he is! and how high he sits, higher than I have ever seen any one before! and how well he can swim!" it exclaimed, as the stork took flight through the air with outstretched wings.

And Mother Stork talked in the nest. She told of the land of Egypt, of the water of the Nile, and of the first-rate mud that was to be found in foreign parts; it sounded quite fresh and charming in the ears of the little toad.

"I must go to Egypt," it said. "Oh, if the stork would only give me a lift! or one of the young ones might take me. I would do the youngster some service, in my turn, on his wedding-day. I am sure I shall get to Egypt, for I am so lucky; and all the longing and the yearning which I feel! surely this is better than having a jewel in one's head!"

And it had it—the true jewel; the eternal longing and yearning to go upward, ever upward! This was the jewel, and it shone within it, shone with gladness, and beamed with desire.

At that very moment came the stork. He had seen the toad in the grass, and he swooped down and took hold of the little creature, not over tenderly. The bill pinched; the wind whistled; it was not quite comfortable. But still it was going upward, and away to Egypt, it knew; and that was why its eyes glittered, till it seemed as if a spark flew out of them.

"Quack!—ack!"

The body was dead, the toad was killed. But the spark out of its eyes, what became of that?

The sunbeam took it; the sunbeam bore away the jewel from the head of the toad. Whither?

You must not ask the naturalist; rather ask the poet. He will tell it you as a fairy-tale; and the caterpillar will take a share in it, and the stork family will take a share in it. Think! the caterpillar will be changed, and become a beautiful butterfly! The stork family will fly over mountains and seas far away to Africa, and yet find the shortest way home again to the Danish land, to the same spot, the same roof! Yes, it is all nearly too much like a fairy-tale—and yet it is true. You may fairly ask the naturalist about the truth of it; he will admit that: and, indeed, you know it yourself, for you have seen it.

But the jewel in the toad's head? Look for it in the sun; look at it if you can.

The splendor is too strong. We have not yet eyes that can look into all the glories which God hath revealed; but some day we shall have them, and that will be the most beautiful fairy-tale of all, for we ourselves shall take a share in it.

PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

PARIS, January 4, 1868.

ONE of the picturesque sights of the Hudson River is afforded by the long inclined planes and lofty spiral slides constructed for ice upon the Rockland bank, along which huge cakes from the lake ice-houses, hundreds of feet above, come sailing and circling down to reach the barges in the river below. Any one who has watched those ponderous blocks descend would be amused to see the ice gathered in the ponds about Paris. It is worth seizing here when it is between one and two inches thick; and the labor of fishing it out would be fine sport for a troop of school-boys.

The beautiful lakes in the Bois de Boulogne, which on summer evenings, with their illuminated islands, cafés, pleasure-boats, and open-air balls, seem like the shores of fairy-land, have on these cool, clear mornings the more commonplace appearance of pretty ponds, broken by islets, encircled by level woodland, and skirted by a fine broad road with branching paths. Here and there the quiet, gray scene is enlivened by moving figures—a father taking his boys out to see what is the prospect for skating, or a nurse with an infant in her arms, buried up in warm robes; or a governess accompanying three or four children, who have come out after the morning lessons for a walk, and who amuse themselves with great glee by throwing bits of bread out upon the glassy ice, and watching the hungry ducks and swans waddle, tumble, and slide after them, in ludicrous attempts to run upon the slippery surface; and, occasionally, some fine equipage rolls by over the frozen drive.

Workmen, sent by the city authorities to gather the ice, appear at various points on the shore of the lake, in groups of about thirty men, each wearing the flat cap and blue cotton blouse of the Paris ouvrier, and directed by clacked and muffled officers wearing the municipal uniform. A low, level spot is selected for each gang, and platforms made of boards are thrust under the edge of the ice, and laid sloping gently up to the crest of the bank. The ground behind these is spread with hurdles of wicker-work, which serve to drain the ice and keep it from the ground. Two men sent out in a boat, and aided by a long rope from the shore, break the ice across the pond and around the edges within the region assigned to this group; and the men upon the platforms, wielding long boat-hooks, work away at the edge of the vast sheet thus gradually pushed toward them. They break off fragments and pull them up the sloping platforms and slide them back upon the hurdles, whence they are loaded in wagons and carried to the ice-houses of the city of Paris.

A group of spectators gradually gathers on either hand watching this scene, to which the slippery nature of the subject dealt with seems to give all the interest of an exciting game. In the garden of the Palais Royal the ice on the fountain pool is collected for the benefit of one of the restaurants. A waiter, bareheaded and in white apron, takes two wooden chairs, breaks a hole in the ice, cracking it quite across the pool, puts his chairs into the water, and steps upon them, the seats being just above its surface. With one foot and one hand on each chair he wades out like a boy on stilts, and crowds the ice toward the opposite kerb, while two other waiters, with a market basket lashed to a pole, ladle out the fragments in a sort of slush, which they carry to the caves of the "Trois Frères Provençaux."

If the cold weather continues it is expected that the lakes in the Bois de Boulogne will be thrown open to the public for skating. Already the Skating Club, who have exclusive use of one of the smaller ponds there, are enjoying a brilliant season. They gave an evening fête the other night, at which the élite of Paris assisted to the number of nearly two thousand persons, including representatives of the English, American, Austrian, Swedish, and Norwegian fashionable world. A city editor, who is certainly sufficiently imbued with a sense of the general superiority of Parisian things over the rest of the world, pays the following compliment to the American ladies:

"Paris boasts a number of renowned skaters; but it must be confessed that in this sport she is outdone by the English, and above all by the Americans. As for the American ladies they excel all their rivals on the ice."

The United States is scantily and often badly represented in the French Press, but one sees indications in many business channels that the old world is copying some of the notions of the new. The American horse-railroad is conspicuous among the public conveyances of the city. Hair-cutting in American style, American paper collars, American leather trunks, sewing-machines on the American model, American shirts, one sees placarded in many windows; and half the fancy-goods shops of Paris have been commending the style of narrow silk neck-ties, in black and various colors, that are every where exposed for sale as "Cravates Américaines."

A gentleman from New York, having completed the tour of Europe, went the other day into a famous tailor's to stock his trunk with garments of Parisian style before he should return home. Judge of his surprise when the salesman produced, as his most recherché novelties, what he declared were the latest New York styles, just received! Possibly this was an artistic compliment to supposed national predilections. But here is another instance which can not bear such a construction:

The other day I was requested to purchase for a little American child, who is staying in Paris, some primary English reader. After considerable search I found a stock of such books in the Rue de la Paix. Many of the best stores in Paris are concealed, as it were, in court-yards. Passing along the street you see a little square tablet, bearing the name of the establishment you seek for, hanging upon the side of a great archway; and looking in through the passage, which is broad enough for a carriage to enter, you see a little paved area within, and upon the further side of it a house-front of yellow stone, which, though adorned perhaps with ivy, and possibly a statue or little fountain, bears some indication of being a place of business. In such a little retreat as this, just removed from the great fashionable thoroughfare of the Rue de la Paix, is the repository of the English Religious Tract Society, where many other English publications also are sold.

While I was looking over their counter of "juveniles" the salesman brought me a pretty volume full of pictures, and bearing a London imprint, which he recommended as the best thing out. A glance at the reading-lessons confirmed his praise, and I carried it to the little girl; but on opening it she exclaimed to her mother with delight, "Why, mamma, this is just like the book I have at home, which came from Harper's!" I had not before recognized the author's name, spelled as it was, Mark Wilson. It was pleasant to find an American book, reprinted in England, even thus disguised, and imported into France to be commended as the best of its kind for the education of English children in Paris.

But far deeper than any such gratification is the satisfaction that a citizen of the Republic feels, as he is constantly reminded of his liberties and the free spirit of his home, by the contrasts afforded here. I feel like a witty fellow-countryman, whose words were quoted to us a short time ago in Edinburgh, but whose name is unknown to me. The sweet-faced and sweet-voiced old matron who seats strangers in the galleries of the old kirk of St. Giles pointed out to us the chairs of state in either gallery, which are occupied by the judges and the lord provost and council, in official wigs and robes, and then, at the end of the church, opposite the pulpit, the canopied inclosure with armorial decorations, which constitutes the royal pew, and which has been occupied once by Queen Victoria, and annually by the regent commissioner, who comes in her name to inspect the quality of the service for which Government is responsible. She said, in that symmetrically undulating tone which is characteristic of the Scotch, whose sentences have not varying inflections, but proceed like a series of festoons, "There was an American here the other day, and he said that he was a member of the royal family in his own country, and he had a crown, and it was his hat."

I should like to know that man.

LIFE IN CHICAGO.

NELLIE ELLSWORTH;
OR,
THE LOVER FIEND.

A TALE OF LIFE IN CHICAGO.

BY EDWARD MINTURN.

In producing this startling and thrilling composition, by an author who seems alike at home on land and sea, and to possess a knowledge of the realities of life enjoyed by but few romancists, the publishers of THE NEW YORK WEEKLY have again struck a wave of the popular tide of sentiment which for months past has been steadily carrying them forward to fame and fortune.

NELLIE ELLSWORTH;

OR,
THE LOVER FIEND.

In originality of plot and characters, as well as in startling effects and points, is far ahead of any of this author's previous efforts. Exhibiting the power of weak innocence to struggle with and to conquer villainy, in high and low life, showing the blackness of human depravity in contrast with angelic, yet mortal purity, it teaches throughout a lesson which the most fastidious can but pronounce good, pure, and ennobling.

In the opening scene the villain, of the life-drama exposes a part of his plot to a wretch weaker than himself; but for several chapters the mystery, which is only unveiled at the close, is merely hinted at, leaving the reader in a condition of tantalizing wonderment and uncertainty.

Alphonse Germaine rescues the brother of the heroine from suicide and want, having no nobler aim in so doing than to ruin and possess the heroine. To this end he aids in their migration from New York to Chicago, furnishing funds and pretending disinterested friendship. To carry out his plans he employs mercenary wretches to aid in their execution, and finally has the artist, brother of Nellie, thrown into prison for passing counterfeit money, which his confederates have placed in his hands and room without his knowledge.

But this villain finds a powerful opponent in an eccentric but gifted young man, a kind of Jack-of-all-trades, whose specialty is "playing on a harp of a thousand strings."

A broken-down lawyer, whose necessities have made him a tool in the hands of Germaine, is the principal actor in fixing the charge of felony on Pierce Ellsworth; and while doing so the lawyer discovers a mysterious connection which satisfies him that the Ellsworths are heirs to an immense property; and Germaine having also discovered the secret, designs to possess himself of the estate.

But it would be unjust to the reader to farther anticipate the events of this thrilling story; to be properly appreciated the story must be perused as it came from the author's hand. The chapters are full of rapidly changing events, in which a brother of the eccentric Soundway, a takes a foremost part. The close is dramatic in the extreme, and from a chaos of dark mystery and feverish uncertainty the principal characters come out in joyous light and happiness.

Mr. Minturn has in this work gone beyond his previous efforts, and gives token of holding a lofty literary position hereafter.

THE NEW YORK WEEKLY, now rapidly advancing to a circulation of 200,000 COPIES, will feel the demand for this story more palpably than it has yet felt the call for other works by the same easy, vigorous, and versatile writer. The literary sensation of the day is EDWARD MINTURN'S LAST AND BEST STORY,

NELLIE ELLSWORTH;

OR,
THE LOVER FIEND,

which will be commenced in No. 14 of the
NEW YORK WEEKLY,

FRENCH BREAKFAST and DINNER COFFEE, which we sell at the low price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 50 cents to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St., (Post-Office Box 5643), N. Y.

To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea Trade (previous to the establishment of the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,) we will start with the American Houses, leaving out of the account entirely the profits of the Chinese factors.

First. The American House in China or Japan makes large profits on their sales or shipments—and some of the richest retired merchants in this country have made their immense fortunes through their houses in China.

Second. The Banker makes large profits upon the foreign exchange used in the purchase of Teas.

Third. The Importer makes a profit of 30 to 50 per cent. in many cases.

Fourth. On its arrival here it is sold by the cargo, and the Purchaser sells it to the Speculator in invoices of 1000 to 2000 packages, at an average profit of about 10 per cent.

Fifth. The Speculator sells it to the Wholesale Tea Dealer in lines at a profit of 10 to 15 per cent.

Sixth. The Wholesale Tea Dealer sells it to the Wholesale Grocer in lots to suit his trade at a profit of about 10 per cent.

Seventh. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail Dealer at a profit of 15 to 25 per cent.

Eighth. The Retailer sells it to the Consumer for ALL THE PROFIT HE CAN GET.

When you have added to these EIGHT PROFITS as many brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, and add the original cost of the Tea, it will be perceived what the consumer has to pay. And now we propose to show why we can sell so very much lower than small dealers.

We propose to do away with all these various profits and brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, with the exception of a small commission paid for purchasing to our correspondents in China and Japan, one cartage, and a small profit to ourselves—which, on our large sales, will amply pay us.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city. Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a Club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a Club say how much Tea or Coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price-List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete, send it to us by mail. We will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost—so that there need be no confusion in their distribution: each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the Club can divide equally among themselves.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford.

We send no complimentary package for clubs of less than thirty dollars.

COUNTRY CLUBS, Hand and Wagon Peddlers, and small stores (of which class we are supplying many thousands, all of which are doing well), can have their orders promptly and faithfully filled, and in case of Clubs, can have each party's name marked on their package and directed, by sending their orders to Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey street.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than thirty dollars had better send post-office drafts, or money, with their orders, to save the expense of collecting by express; but larger orders we will send by express, to collect on delivery.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third by sending directly to

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.

Beware of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are

BOGUS or IMITATIONS.

We have no branches, and do not in any case authorize the use of our name.

Post-Office Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

From Mrs. E. Fitzgerald, East Sanborn, Belknap Co., N. H.—"It is with great satisfaction and pleasure I have studied your AMATEUR'S GUIDE. I have esteemed it highly. Its pages are full of valuable information, reliable, plain, and practical, and attractively conveyed—just what every new beginner wants."

From T. Hill, Oakland Cottage, Yonkers, N. Y., March 2, 1867.—"It is without exception the best arranged, useful, and instructive work I have seen, for amateurs especially."

From Miss D. W. Miller, Winchester, Randolph Co., Ind.—"I have received your Guide for the Flower and Kitchen Garden, for which you have my sincere thanks. It is very valuable for all who wish to cultivate Flowers and Vegetables. But praise from me is needless; it must recommend itself to any one."

From Mr. E. F. Stanley, Greenville, S. C., March 17, 1867.—"Thanks for your AMATEUR GUIDE. It is indeed pleasant, useful, and instructive."

PRANG'S AMERICAN CHROMOS

Are pronounced by distinguished Painters, Poets, and Critics the best that are now made. We challenge the most critical examination of our Chromos in Oil such as Tait's Groups, Britcher's Landscapes, Lemmen's Poultry Pictures, Correggio's Magdalena, the Flower Bouquet, or the Kid's Play-Ground.

Our CHROMOS after WATER-COLORS are equally artistic. They are:

WOOD MOSSES & FERNS. By Ellen Robbins. $1 50
BIRD'S NEST & LICHENS. " " " 1 50
(Companion Pictures.)

THE BABY. (After Bouguereau.) $3 00
THE SISTERS. " " " 3 00
(Companion Pictures.)

THE BULFINCH. By William Cruikshank. $3 00
THE LINNET. " " " 3 00
(Companion Pictures.)

Of the last pictures George L. Brown, the celebrated American painter (unrivaled as a colorist and painter of atmospheric effects), says:

"I admire them much. I saw some splendid specimens in Europe, which were wonderful; but never supposed that even finer ones were executed in Boston. What particularly excites my admiration is the tender and delicate half tints, the high finish, and the finesse and richness of tone. I think they must do much to educate the public in the way of color. How far superior to the hideous color lithographs we have been so shocked in seeing so long a time! I congratulate you on your success." GEORGE L. BROWN.

Our Chromos are sent free to any address on receipt of price. Our Journal of Popular Art, explaining how Chromos are made, mailed free. Send for a copy.

RISE AND FALL OF CRINOLINE

THE RISE AND FALL OF CRINOLINE.

VII.

ANNO 1854-1866.—I fear I shall be accused of exaggeration in this sketch; but I protest that I am not guilty. This crinoline actually existed; the lady still exists; and I am only sorry that I am not allowed to clear myself by naming her. This much, however, I may say. Twelve years ago, when I thought of marrying, and crinoline began to be in the ascendant, my prudent father said: "My son, wait a while, until this extravagant fashion dies out, or you will find marriage too costly." And my sagacious mother observed: "It is horrible! Dresses twelve and fifteen yards wide!" I did not wait, however, because I should have become an old bachelor meanwhile. But as the evidence of relatives is not worth much in the courts, let me adduce statistics to prove, ladies, that you have for twelve years wasted much material, and that this waste has been the cause of broken engagements, bankruptcies, and suicides. In these twelve years you have used more than 900,000 cwt. of steel wire, or enough to have encircled the earth 56,000 times. Narrow coach-doors, box-doors, pew-doors could tell awful stories of the extremity to which you have driven their openers. You have required three chairs to make one of you comfortable; while your escort—father, or husband, or cousin—has perched near you on a fourth, a heap of misfortune, peering up over your skirts, like the pennon of a sunken ship rising just over the waves. I pass over your wrongs against the poor, whose nakedness might have been covered with an eighth part of your superfluity—against the crossing-sweepers, with whom you entered into competition—against little children and dogs, whom you often fairly buried. But, thank Heaven! the day of these awful excesses is over; we enter upon more innocent times; and you will soon see that a nearer approach to the natural shape of the human form is far more beautiful than the vast surroundings of a Pompadour.

FACETIÆ.

CONTRARY TO EXPECTATION.—It is rather disappointing at a party, when you have been told that a girl is pretty certain to come, to find when she arrives that she is certainly plain.

Why has a clock a bashful appearance?—Because it keeps its hands before its face.

Mr. X—lost his wife, who was well known as a shrew. A few days after her burial, chancing to meet an author of his acquaintance, he asked him, pretending to wipe away a tear, if he would not write an epitaph for her monument. "I would like to have something short but good," said he. "Very well," answered his friend, "why not put 'At last!'"

What is the difference between perseverance and obstinacy?—One is a strong will, and the other is a strong won't.

THE LIKELIEST FISH TO LAUGH—The trout, it is so easily tickled.

What is that which people wish to have and then wish to get rid of?—A good appetite.

1. If she won't sew those buttons on, seize the opportunity some evening when she has visitors to sew them on yourself.

4. If she be given to affectation concerning delicate health, summon at once all the doctors of your acquaintance. "No excitements, theatres," etc.

HOW TO MANAGE A WIFE.

2. If she come to breakfast in deshabille, do the same yourself. "Could we but see ourselves as others see us," etc.

5. If she be given to extravagant expenditure, dis- close to her the results to which she is tending by ac- companying her on promenades seedily attired.

3. If she be disposed to scold, practice music when- ever she does so. Unfailing!

6. If she won't see to the servants, invite your maiden aunt to officiate as housekeeper.

What is that which no one wishes to have, yet when he has it would be very sorry to lose it?—A bald head.

EAR-RINGS.—If you want your ears pierced, pinch the baby.

To learn the value of money, try to borrow it.

A FALL NONE OF US OBJECT TO—A wind-fall.

How TO FIND HAPPINESS—Look in a dictionary.

"Drunk and disorderlies" saw the city wood in Minneapolis. Could not sober and orderly people see it also?

A teacher asked a bright little girl, "What country is opposite us on the globe?" "Don't know, Sir," was the answer. "Well, now," pursued the teacher, "if I were to bore a hole through the earth, and you were to go in at this end, where would you come out?" "Out of the hole, Sir," replied the pupil, with an air of triumph.

What do we often drop and never stop to pick up?—A hint.

There was a man so intensely polite that, as he passed a hen on her nest, he said, "Don't rise, ma'am."

A DESPERATE CASE.

DICK.—"Frightful Tie, did you say, Mother? Perhaps it is; but I'm so awfully Poor, I've lost all Pride in my Personal Appearance."

[Mother recollects an odd Ten-Dollar Note in her Work-box.]

HARPER'S BAZAR.

VOL. I.—No. 17.]

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1868.

[SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS.
$4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1868, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

Visiting and Reception Toilettes.

FIG. 1.—Suit of bright blue poplin, composed of skirt and redingote. The skirt is trimmed with a bias fold of black satin, forming a Greek figure, with a black and white galloon set zigzag between the narrow interstices. The broad sash is trimmed in the same manner, and is confined at the top by three jet sash rings, fastened together with black and white cords. The redingote is trimmed round the edge with a bias fold of black satin. Black velvet bonnet, trimmed with blue satin and blue velvet flowers.

FIG. 2.—Dress of mauve satin, trimmed with bias folds of a darker shade, finished at each end with a button covered with the same satin as the fold. On each side of the front breadth, nearly under the arm, these folds simulate broad sash ends, ending in lozenges, and the end of which is trimmed with buttons and fringe. The high waist is trimmed with a simulated bertha of bias folds and net fringe; the bottom of the sleeves has a similar bias fold, running up toward the elbow, and finished with fringe. Coral comb and pin.

Winter Street Costumes.

See illustration, page 264.

FIG. 1.—Gentleman's Dress. Sack over-coat, of dark brown beaver, with fur collar, cuffs, edge, and lining. The over-coat is fastened in front with three loops of heavy silk cord. Pantaloons, nearly tight, of olive-green cloth. Brown scarf-cravat and standing collar. A white Cashmere cache-nez is seen above the over-coat, confined with a gold pin. Dark brown kid gloves, edged with fur.

FIG. 2.—Walking suit of purple poplin, trimmed with black lace and narrow black velvet. The redingote is trimmed en tablier in front, with bias folds of the same material as the dress, edged on one side with small velvet points, and bordered with black lace; similar bias folds, bordered with lace, simulate scallops on the under-skirt. Purple velvet bonnet, trimmed with black satin folds, velvet rose and leaves, and white feather.

FIG. 3.—Dress of Mentana red gros grain, with train skirt, high corsage, and close sleeves. Shawl-shaped paletot, of black velvet, cut in large points at the bottom, and trimmed with satin leaves, surmounted by a row of jet nail-heads, and bordered with two rows of heavy chenille fringe. The sleeves and shoulders are trimmed in the same manner, except that the fringe is omitted on the bottom of the sleeve. Fanchon of white satin and lace, trimmed with quilled pinked satin between puffs of lace and white satin strings.

Evening Dresses and Coiffures.

See illustration, page 264.

FIG. 1.—Black lace skirt over black silk. Corsage low, with short sleeves, covered with rich lace. Rich necklace and bracelets of antique workmanship. Hair arranged with gold diadem and chains. Front composed of three bandeaux—two waved and one smooth—the upper bandeau being made from the bottom upward, and the others from the top downward. The diadem is easily put in place; the chain, however, is to be wound between each bandeau, so as to give lightness to this ornament.

FIG. 4 shows the back of this coiffure, which is a chignon, mounted on a comb, and accompanied with long curls. Over-skirt of lilac silk, cut open at the sides, and embroidered round the edge, which is also bordered with crystal grelots. Under-skirt of white silk, trimmed with three rouleaux, which also fasten the over-skirt at the sides. Low corsage, with loose sleeves, trimmed with a deep frill of lace. White silk belt, with bow behind, without ends. Lilac kid gloves and white fan.

FIG. 2.—Over-skirt of mauve silk, with train, and looped in front with roses. Under-skirt of white silk, trimmed with several narrow flounces. Low corsage with short sleeves, of mauve silk, with a rose at the belt. Lace under-waist. Hair adorned with roses and ribbons. Part the hair about four inches from the front, wave it slightly, and make a double puff, on which set a small postiche, in a triangular form, composed of three rows of light curls, the small ones being made on a stick the size of a small penholder. A ribbon is passed under the second row of curls. Rich enameled necklace, earrings, and bracelets. Mauve fan, of the same shade as the dress. Mauve sash, with long, broad ends. White kid gloves.

FIG. 3 represents the back of the same coiffure. Part the hair in a circle on the top, make two rolls of the lower part, then with the ends and the upper part make puffs, surmounted by a bow. On each side is a puff and a long curl. A rose on each side, and a rosette of ribbon on the left side complete this coiffure, which is only suited to blondes. Fourreau of blue silk, with low corsage and short sleeves, trimmed with festoons of pearls. The fourreau is open in front, with train, and is edged with two frills of rich white lace. Under-skirt of white satin, trimmed with satin rouleaux. Under-waist and sleeves of puffed lace, edged with point lace. Pearl necklace and bracelets.

THE FOOT.

IT may be doubted whether there exists throughout the whole civilized world a well-formed foot. Many exquisites of both sexes claim admiration for their pedal extremities, but it is the boots and shoes which cover them which we are called on to admire. Their feet, if bared, would present a very great divergence from the classical ideal of beauty. The firmly-planted foot, neither too large nor too small, but justly proportioned to the height and weight it sustains, the smooth surface and regularly-curved lines, the distinctness of the divisions and the perfect formation of each toe, with its well-marked separateness, and its gradation of size and regularity of detail, to the very tip of the nail, are now to be seen only in art. In Greek nature they were found, for the ancient sandal, which left the foot unfettered, gave freedom to the development of its natural grace and proportions. The modern boot or shoe, with the prevalent notion that every thing must be sacrificed to smallness, has squeezed the foot into a lump as knotty and irregular as a bit of pudding-stone, where the distorted toes are so imbedded in the mass and mutilated by the pressure that it is impossible to pick them out in the individuality and completeness of their original forms.

The process of our dames hardly differs from that of the Chinese women, whose feet, from the early age of five years, are so firmly bandaged that, as they say themselves, they become dead. The extremity below the instep is forced into a line with the leg, and two of the toes are bent under the sole, and the whole kept in this unnatural and painful position by leathern thongs. "The Chinese women, rich and poor, are all," says the traveler Huc, "lame; at the extremity of their legs they have only shapeless stumps, always enveloped in bandages, and from which all the life has been squeezed out."

Young Chinese girls who have not been properly brought up, and acquired the accomplishment of lameness by means of a diligent torture of their feet from the earliest childhood, find it no easy matter to get married. This fashion of little feet is unquestionably most barbarous, absurd, and injurious to the development of the physical strength. "But what means," asks the despairing Huc, "are there of putting a stop to the deplorable practice? It is decreed by fashion, and who would dare to resist her dictates?" He thinks the Europeans have no right to be very severe upon the Chinese. We may say the same in regard to our American dames, for do they not daily torture and deform their feet with tight shoes, and resemble in this respect—with a difference only in degree—their goat-hoofed sisters of the Flowery Kingdom?

As our coarse climate forbids the sandal, and renders the shoe necessary, care should be taken to adapt it as perfectly as possible to the natural conformation of the foot. It should be long and wide enough to admit of a free play of the toes; the space between the heel and sole of the shoe should be firm and of a curve the same height as the natural arch of the foot, while no part of the artificial covering should be so binding as to prevent the free action of the muscles and the circulation of the blood.

The female shoe or boot now in vogue is, in some respects, very faulty. It has but one good quality, the square or broadly-rounded tip, which is conformable to the natural shape of the end of the foot; and if not made, as it generally is, too tight, would be favorable to the free action so essential to the ease and beauty of the toes. The arch of the shoe is too high, and, pressing strongly upward, weakens and distorts that of the foot. This defect is increased by an inordinately high and narrow heel—which is, moreover, brought too far forward, with a view of giving an artificial appearance of shortness to the extremity. This position of the heel toward the centre of the foot has the same effect as if the buttress of an architectural arch was removed from the end to its middle. It takes away the strength of its natural prop, and makes it a weakness. It is thus that our dames in walking have a hobbling gait, as if their feet were poised upon stilts.

The natural arch of the foot is a distinctive mark of what we are pleased to call ourselves—a superior race. The African has scarcely any arch at all, and "wid de hollow of his foot he makes a hole in de ground" of the Ethiopian song is hardly an exaggerated description of the negro's peculiar structure. Fashion, with its usual tendency to exaggerate natural beauty, adopts the high and forward heel with the view of heightening the instep, or increasing the arch of the foot which is so much coveted. This attempt to force a grace beyond the intention of nature is followed by the usual result of distortion and disease. The high and misplaced heel, and the other vices of construction of the fashionable shoe or boot in vogue, force the toes forward, constrict them violently, and not only deform the foot but torture it with various painful affections.

The growing of the nail to the flesh of the toe is one of the common results of wearing a fashionable or ill-made shoe. This is one of the most painful of affections. In its earliest stage it can be easily remedied by paring the nail always in the centre of its free end, without touching the angles, until it becomes of a semi-lunar shape, with its concave looking outward. The tight and high-heeled shoe, however, must be at the same time abandoned. If the disease is too severe for this simple remedy recourse must be had to the surgeon, who will remove it by an operation which is considered, though not dangerous, the most painful of his art. He will pass with all his force the sharpest blade of his scissors between the nail and the flesh of the toe down to the very quick, and having severed it in two, will, with strong pincers, wrench out each half from the ulcerated flesh in which it is embedded. Before the discovery of chloroform it was customary for the surgeon to tighten with all his might a bandage about the root of the toe, in order to deaden somewhat the excessive torture of this operation.

The corn and bunion come from an enlargement of the natural papillæ which exist every where in the skin, and the thickening and hardening of the integument which surround and cover them. They are produced solely by ill-fitting shoes. They can be easily relieved by cutting, but can only be effectually got rid of by the removal of the cause. A corn or bunion should be dug out in the centre, and never pared on the edges. The professional pedicure always operates in this way; but with a shrewd, though dishonest, compliance with vulgar error, he pretends to take out a root which does not exist, notwithstanding that he often exhibits one in the form of a hog's bristle, which he has ever ready at hand to confirm the public credulity.

Next to the knife—which is dangerous in a clumsy hand—the best remedy is the application, by means of adhesive plaster, of a piece of wash-leather, or amadou—or spunk, as it is commonly called—cut so as to cover the whole corn, and pierced in the centre with a hole corresponding to the size of its summit. This diffuses the pressure, and removes the particular friction which has created the excrescence.

The comfort of the foot is only to be secured by a properly-made shoe, and its beauty preserved by a freedom from unnatural constraint. Where is the modern beauty who would venture to uncover her feet before a royal admirer, as we are told Madame de Pompadour did not hesitate to do? "That which especially astonished the king," says her biographer, "was a pair of pretty bare feet, worthy of marble and the sculptor, in a pair of the most rustic-looking wooden shoes. By a coquetry that was almost artless the pretty milkmaid (the marchioness was thus disguised) placed one of her feet upon the outside of one of the wooden shoes. The king recognized the marchioness, and confessed to her that for the first time in his life he felt the desire to kiss a pretty foot."

GENII GONE WEST.

A LADY-TRAVELER who was recently at Baalbec pointed to one of the grand ruins and asked a stone-mason, "Why do you not do some work like that?" "Ah," said the mason, "that kind of work can not be done now; it was done by the genii." "But why," urged the lady, "can not the genii do such work now?" The mason replied: "They long ago left this part of the world; they are in the West now, building great palaces and bridges, and boring through mountains."

All history verifies the truth of the stone-mason's philosophy. Not only have the genii of Art gone West to find a field of exertion, but all the activities of mind—social, political, and religious—have followed the same line of movement. Why the grand old ideas of the race should migrate from one section to another, and still another, pressing on toward the farthest West, and drawing the pilgrim crowds after them in steady and continuous flow, is a mystery none can solve. The fact, however, is plain enough: Ideas are the foremost emigrants; they are the pioneers, and the moving masses are only followers.

The stone-mason's idea is worth remembering in another respect. We are very fond of contemplating our supposed originality, and of priding ourselves upon the wonders of the age as very definite characteristics of our wisdom and energy. Unfortunately, however, for this complacent theory, all our best ideas—such, for instance, as the domestic sentiments and brotherhood and common rights—were taught long ago in Judea, and were given in such perfection as to admit of no change for the better. Our apostles of progress may as well confess their obligations to the genii. Originality is only safe when it humbly and reverently acknowledges its indebtedness to the past. And original thinkers and actors are mainly serviceable to the world by their fine capacity to man-age the forms and shapes of things so as to give the soul of the race better accommodations and secure a fuller play to its divine instincts. After all, our inventions for the most part are big toys, helps for childish amusements, charming invitations to kill time and weaken character; a few excepted, like the steam-engine and the telegraph, the others only show how great we are in little things. Jack Horner, over his pie, understood the matter exactly—"What a great boy am I!"

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Another Letter to Epicurus.

MY DEAR EPICURUS,—I observe so growing an interest in the question of dinner that I feel justified in returning to the subject, and treating a little further of our proper manners in the preparation and eating of food. I am the more inclined to it because to-day as I sat at dinner at a public table in what is called a "first-class" hotel, and where certainly the prices deserve that distinction, my neighbor said to me:

"Look at that mutton! no fat; no gravy; nothing but a tough slice of leather, cold and indigestible. I believe there is more food wasted in this house than is consumed."

Then came a half of a quail upon a piece of hard toast saturated with butter, and cold as a clam. It was attended with some Lima beans immersed in a very questionable whitish liquid or sauce; a little half-spoiled canned tomato, and some succotash. If you saw venison upon the bill and hopefully asked for it, its coming undeceived you, for it was a thin slab of red flesh, so cold and so forlorn that you had not the heart or the stomach to devour it. The peroration of this lamentable repast was a thin layer of sour apple upon a thick white solid paste, called apple-pie, a melancholy Charlotte Russe, and thin ice-cream.

For this banquet what did we not pay? The charge, I think, was a dollar and a half! But even this sorry feast came very slowly and very sloppingly. We waited long and long; then there was a rush, a hasty dump of little dishes and the full horror was revealed. The American goes through life eating such dinners, and they serve to help him through very swiftly. He pays enormous sums of money for such a wanton misuse of the generous bounty of nature, and such assaults upon his own comfort and welfare. The truth, my dear Epicurus, was forced upon me with renewed impressiveness that we buy less for our money than any people in the world.

The difficulty is that we do not insist upon applying our real knowledge and good sense. Last week, for instance, as I was traveling by the Great North and South Midland Junction Road the car was crowded with intelligent men. There were probably fifty of us in that car. The day was not very cold, and yet we sat hermetically sealed up in the awful box until a lady, a way-passenger, opened a window and respited us a little. All the vents were closed. It was a cruel experiment. Now I suppose there were very few persons indeed in that car who did not know perfectly well that it was a violation of the simplest law of health. We were breathing typhus; we were really shortening our lives, and yet, when the intrepid lady opened the window—and it is generally a woman who is the good angel in these extremities—every body looked as if she had designs upon our lives, and were a mild type of assassin.

Now, if sensible men will deliberately immerse themselves in a black hole, and positively refuse to be succored, the hotel-keeper knows very well that they will not quarrel with clamorous leather called by the name of various meats. Don't tell me that it is painful to see a man of my years thinking so much of his dinner. How can I help thinking of it when you give me a stone for bread? I naturally expect that my dinner will be so cooked as to whet appetite with pleasure. I say that I naturally expect it, and every man has a right to indulge that expectation. Do I anticipate as of course that my shoes will pinch me when the shoe-maker sends them home? Do I submit to them if they cramp my feet, and then blandly pay Crispin as if he had done me a high favor? Or when my tailor sends me trowsers and coats (excuse the plural, it sounds better) that I can not wear because they do not fit me, do I keep them merely because I can get them on?

Why do I submit to a dinner that does not fit me? Why does the throng of busy men in New York submit to what is called dinner at almost every public eating-house in the city? Some two or three years ago my occasions used to call me to the neighborhood of Tammany Hall, and I was several times taken to lunch at a vast feeding-trough called—well! no matter for the exact name. But, great Heavens! what a spectacle for civilized man! Standing or sitting upon high stools at a long counter sat a solemn line of my fellow-beings cramming food. They ate against time. It was the naked, gross, sensual act of eating. It was eating as animals eat; and all the benefit which is derived even to that function from our humanity was wholly lost. I went into other places of the kind. I became painfully interested, and made the tour of the eating-houses in the lower part of the city, to which so many thousands of New Yorkers daily resort. My dear Epicurus, I no longer wondered why we submit so patiently to the thirteenth passenger in the omnibus, or to the horrors of the air-tight car, or to the bland impositions of the hotel.

It is an uncomfortable reflection, but we are a pusillanimous people in these respects. For think of the sums of money that we daily expend down town for what is called dinner! I don't mean at Delmonico's. There you pay a good price, and you get a good dinner. But I speak of the dining-rooms for the many, and upon the whole, with exceptions, which we will all gratefully acknowledge, what general nastiness! Yet it is perfectly possible to have a restaurant of a simplicity and neatness which no gilded "establishment" suggests, at which shall be eaten honest joints plainly and well cooked with all the skill of Carême, and bread light and nutritious, and all things shall be simple and neat to correspond.

Why, dear youth, when I was upon my travels, and had reached England in the grand tour, I made one of the most charming and familiar excursions of the traveler in that country to see the noble estate of Chatsworth. At the edge of evening we stopped at the little inn where we were to pass the night, and were shown into the parlor, dingy yet perfectly clean, and with an air of quiet domesticity which instantly suggested the good old phrase of Falstaff's. But how, tell me, could any body ever dream of taking his ease in the wonderful "saloons" of our great hotels? I don't depreciate them. But there is a certain comfortable coziness which they do not have, and which we found in the pleasant country inn at Chatsworth.

By-and-by it was tea-time. Oh, happy hour after a day's travel! The arrival at a famous place, and the delightful sense of impending pleasure, and the cheerful refreshment of the person, the appetizing expectation, and at last tea in its highest sense—a blending of the great banquet of the day with the evening repast—a dinner in undress—this is among the sunny memories. I know men who remember particular cigars smoked long years ago, a certain bottle of wine, a lunch or a dinner, and they have become integral parts of noble scenery, so to say—of the Lake of Geneva, for instance, or of the Col de Balme. Must I confess it, dear friend—that Chatsworth tea is one of those memories? There was some tender cold meat, some transparent jelly and toothsome jam, the whitest and best of bread, with butter that seemed churned in a butter-cup, and relays of brown, soft, crisp toast, and delicate tea made strong with boiling not with simmering water. And such a snowy table-cloth, and such fine, snowy napkins—tell me, beloved Telemachus and traveler, hast thou ever found the snowy linen in the country inns of our native land?

The answer is, I know, that in a country where every body travels you can not expect the advantages of that in which few persons, and they generally rich, are travelers. Are we then to agree that the price of improved travel in every respect is cleanliness, neatness? I insist that if this be the price it is extravagant, outrageous, impossible, and should be stoutly resisted. But it is not true that such is the price. I know some of the best hotels where every man who washes his hands before dinner takes a fresh towel from the pile. So far, good. Let us only go further. Let this same spirit pervade and transform the whole house; for even in such houses there are unclean horrors of which nothing is to be said; they are unmentionable.

Now, I understand that the dinner reform is to be attempted in the city of New York. The great prices paid for poor dinners have at last aroused enough interest to promise the establishment of a club under the management of that friend of humanity, M. Pierre Blot. I have not the pleasure of his acquaintance, but I have often reflected that he was one of the most useful travelers who ever came to these shores; and I have read with tranquil satisfaction the menus, a French word which I hope you will pardon for the sake of association, and which, roughly Englished, is the bills of fare, which he composes and prints in his brief, and, if I may use the expression, succulent, articles upon dinners. Indeed, with a nimble fancy, you can dine, or at least lunch, very acceptably off one of these charming compositions of M. Blot. And now he proposes to give us the sequel of the Barmecide feast of his pages; to make his dinners real. I wish him success.

The other day the beautiful Gwendoline Smith, who is engaged to the young assistant of the Reverend Doctor Chimes, a young woman whom you know perfectly well, wrote to ask me, as an old friend of the family, whether I advised her to join the class to hear lectures upon Chaldaic antiquities, which was forming by Mrs. Tilbury, and the price of which for the winter term would be twenty dollars. I answered Gwendoline that I advised her rather to pay the moderate sum which would admit her to Professor Blot's lectures. First, let Gwendoline, who is to marry a poor young man, know how to direct her cook to get a proper dinner, and then she will have time enough for Chaldea. Good-by, my dear Epicurus; if you would like to try the new Blot dinner, I am at your service.

Your friend,
AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

GENTLEMEN'S COSTUMES.

THE illustrations of costumes for gentlemen given in the last number of the Bazar have been so extensively copied that we are convinced that some further details on the subject will be acceptable to our readers. The prevailing style for evening wear is a black cloth dress-coat cut to roll very low and faced with silk. The vest may be of the same material, or of silk, either white or black. It should be cut with low, rolling collar. Three buttons in front. Black pantaloons fitting the form closely.

Street suits are double-breasted sack-coats of medium length with easy, graceful-fitting shoulders. Sleeves slightly full. Vest without collar. Suits of this kind are usually bound with fine silk binding. Black pantaloons, made close-fitting. English cloths and cassimeres are in favor.

Business suits are of plain and mixed materials. The coat is single-breasted and cut away to roll low. Short waist with skirt flaps at the waist. Vest buttoning to the throat without collar. Pantaloons of hair-line stripes with broad stripe on the outside seam, or light mixed cassimere, made demi-tight. English sacks are also worn, cut very short, single-breasted, and with small collar.

NECK-TIES, COLLARS, AND SHIRTS.

Neck-ties, or scarfs, for opera and balls are of white silk, satin, or muslin ornamented with medallions of embroidery and lace at the ends. Black lace barbes and bows of fine thread lace with pendants are also fashionable. For ordinary wear there are satin scarfs of every shade, in plain colors and striped, and the Louis Quatorze brocaded patterns.

Turned-down collars are not so deeply pointed as the Shakespeares. A new and pretty style has the points rounded. The standing collar most worn has small points turned over at the throat.

Pleated shirt-fronts for general use have three or four pleats each side of the centre pleat. For full dress the neatest patterns are made of double line with embroidered medallions around the studs, and occasionally a row of needle-work on each side of the box pleat. An elaborate design in linen cambric has a wide hem-stitched pleat for studs, and the whole bosom formed of tiny diamonds, of alternately thin and thick material. The puffed and blouse bosoms so popular at the South are seldom worn here.

Handkerchiefs of fine linen cambric for full dress have the monogram embroidered in a corner above a hem two inches wide. Colored monograms and stripes are only suitable for morning use. When prettily needle-worked on fine material these are sold at from $24 to $36 a dozen. With one embroidered initial they vary from $18 to $30.

ROBES DE CHAMBRE AND SMOKING-JACKETS.

Comfortable dressing-gowns, suitable for invalids, are made of printed flannels of quiet colors, trimmed with crimson or blue, and in gay cashmere patterns. These range from $26 to $35, according to the quality of material used and the work on them. A breakfast robe of medium length is of light French cloth, faced with scarlet silk quilted in diamonds. Silk cord and tassel. A gorgeous robe of soft Haytienn silk is a palm-leaf pattern of brilliant Persian colors. Ornamental loops in front and heavy cords and tassels. Price $95.

Short smoking-jackets are of cloth and of silk-fabrics. One of brown silk, lined with mazarine blue, may be worn on either side. It is quilted throughout in diamonds, and trimmed with a band of corded silk. Price $45. Another at the same price is of thick gray beaver, braided and bound with black. Plainer styles are sold at $20, and others as low as $12.

JEWELRY.

A novel design in scarf-slides represents a kennel with projecting roof of Etruscan gold. A dog's head of amethyst peers from beneath, striving to break loose from a golden rope. Another is a sagacious-looking animal of Oriental topaz, with a golden basket in his mouth. The willow braids in the basket are perfectly imitated. There are Zouaves of pink coral and Chasseurs d'Afrique, amethyst poodles, and hounds with diamond collars, horse-shoes, and a sheep's head with golden horns, a coral squirrel on a golden branch, and a rose with a diamond dew-drop in the heart. Massive rings of Roman gold are enameled with black, and studded with diamonds. Monograms and initials are engraved on others, and again there are those ornamented with scarabæi and doves, and cherubs in Byzantine mosaics.

A most grotesque pin from the Paris Exposition is a skull with helmet. The heavy lower jaw and green eyes of emeralds are made to move about by galvanism from a battery concealed in the vest pocket. Others are of crystallized quartz over painted heads, grimalkins, and terriers. A medieval-shaped pin of the pure green chrysoprase is very handsome. A large garnet is incrustated with diamonds. A huge fly is of the Mont Blanc ruby, with colors as varied as an opal. A golden screw holds the scarf most securely, and a white topaz dog, with a cane in his mouth, is beautifully mounted in Etruscan gold.

Sleeve-buttons are worn very large. There are antique cameos, a different profile on each button. A skating set, pin and buttons, is of pale yellow gold with platina skates on each piece. A hunting set is of black onyx, set with diamonds to represent a horse and jockey leaping a hurdle. Another onyx has diamond figures dancing the German.

The spiral stud is preferred to all others. It is always small and neat, and requires only an eyelet in the shirt-bosom instead of a button-hole. Tiny diamonds, Naples coral, emeralds, opals, and plain gold are the favorite styles. There are some beautiful square studs of topaz, with diamond butterfly and onyx cup, displaying three different strata of color. A diamond is in the centre of the cup.

LADIES' FASHIONS.

BALL DRESSES.

Some tasteful ball dresses for very young ladies have just been completed. They are made of white tulle and should be worn over silk. The first we will describe has three skirts. A thick roll or piping of white satin surrounds the edge of the long rounded train. A box-pleated ruche of tulle is notched on either side above the roll. Three wide puffs finish the trimming of the lowest skirt, reaching almost to the knee in front. The second skirt is bordered by a puff over satin ribbon. The gathering is an inch from the edge at the top and bottom, forming a ruffle on both sides. Deep Vandykes are cut out around the upper skirt. These are bound with corded silk headed by a narrow feather trimming. White acorns are pendent from each point. Low round corsage laced at the back over white silk. Puffs and ruches of illusion, in which corded fringe with crystal drops is introduced, form the bertha and sleeves. Belt with sash of white silk, corded and fringed with crystal.

Another tulle dress has a low waist, trimmed about the neck with tulle leaves, bound in satin and edged with fringe. Roman pearls set in silver button the corsage in front. A satin band two inches wide surrounds the skirt, above which are fine box-pleated ruffles, and puffs of tulle half a yard deep. The long tunic of tulle is bordered with satin like the skirt, and wide silk fringe. The right side of the tunic is pointed. On the left it is looped up by a crescent-shaped band of satin, from which falls a wing-like sash trimmed with fringe. An outlay of $110 will cover the expense of either of these dresses.

A handsome dress for a brunette is of capucine satin, of a superior quality, sold at $15 a yard. The trained skirt is very wide, gored to fit plain over the hips. The two widths at the back are gauged. A tunic with round apron-front is simulated by a white satin fold covered with a passementerie of Cluny lace and gilt, fringed with bunches of pearl berries. A ladder trimming of folds of the dress satin, piped with white, are arranged perpendicularly on the front and side widths following the line of the tunic. On the waist are Grecian folds of white illusion, strapped with satin. Inside of the neck is a blonde edge and insertion, through which are three rows of narrow velvet the shade of the dress. The short sleeves are concealed by the Greek bertha. Belt bound with white. Bow in front without sash ends.

A most elegant evening dress for half mourning is made of white gros grain. The trained skirt two yards and a quarter long is trimmed with leaves of Chambery gauze alternating with others of gros grain bound with black satin. The tunic of Chambery striped with satin has a gros grain apron-front surrounded with folds of satin with black piping in the centre. Two wide flounces of Chantilly lace adorn the tunic. High corsage and tight sleeves. A Pompadour square trimming is formed on the waist by narrow Chantilly. Pointed trimming of leaves in the back. Lace on the cuffs. White satin buttons with black velvet stars in the centre. The waist of this dress and the others described before it is lined with silk. The best modistes use silk instead of linen, as it does not stretch out of shape, fits more neatly to the figure, and is not so cold to the touch.

KID GLOVES.

Late importations of kid gloves display some new and graceful designs. The handsomest style has a wristband fastened with two studs of gilt or silver. A dozen similar studs and a silk cord with tassels of crimped silk headed with gilt ornament the back. The stitching and embroidery are neatly done in a contrasting color. The wristband is welted and bound with kid to match the embroidery. Brown gloves are still fashionable, ranging from light tan to beurre and cream-color for evening and full dress, through all the yellow shades to the golden Bismarck and Vesuvius. Lavender, mauve, church purple, and Mentana red are stitched on the back with black silk in a Greek pattern and bound with black kid. Gilt ornaments. Black is bound with white and fastened with silver studs. Straw color, pistache, and a rosy, flesh-like tint are embroidered with black and drawn together by tirittes and tassels.

A pretty fashion among the seamless gloves is a white kid with puffed cuffs fitted to the wrist by elastic cords. A scalloped edge falls on the arm. Rows of tiny gilt eyelets on the puff are interlaced with silk cords. On others are embroidered monograms, true-love knots, bows, butterflies, birds, and bees. Rows of feathered stitching on the back. Dark kid gauntlets for traveling and morning dress are neatly made with bias cuffs, welted with white tirittes inside, and three silver buttons on the back of the cuff.

VARIETIES.

A Merrimac print of an ingenious and intricate design is called the Devil's Dream. At the first glance you see only a plain purple calico of an ordinary pattern, spotted with white and black. On looking at it longer a transformation takes place, innumerable figures appear—beasts, birds, clowns, skeletons, harlequin, fiends, goblins, and all the demons of Pandemonium are before you.

A pretty lace camisole is made of black guipure, with rows of scarlet velvet ribbon, inserted at intervals of an inch down the whole garment.

Wide guipure lace around the sacque and sleeves, under which is scarlet fringe of crimped silk.

It is predicted that outside garments with sleeves are to be abandoned for shawl-shaped and circular wrappings. Capes and fichus, lapped on the breast, are to be made of the material of the dress and worn with walking dresses.

Cotton goods, it appears, reached their lowest price about the time we chronicled the last reduction. They have advanced two or three cents on the yard within a week. Merchants say they will continue to increase.

Striped silks and satins are in vogue for evening dresses—rose-color or blue, with white in alternate stripes an inch wide. They are usually made with double skirts, the upper one trimmed with a silk ruche and fastooned. Lace fichus are worn with them. Wide sashes of lace form a pretty addition to evening toilets.

For courtesies extended, thanks are due to Madame DIEBEN; Messrs. BROOKS & Co.; W. R. BOWNE; UNION ADAMS; A. T. STEWART & Co.; TIFFANY & Co.; BROWNE & SPAULDING; HARRIS and others.

PERSONAL.

THE PRINCESS ROYAL of Prussia, being in epistolary mood, wrote to her bright little sister BEATRICE, of England, asking what she would like as a birthday present. The reply was: "Send me BISMARCK's head in a charger." We expect the young person wouldn't have written thus if she had remembered how HERODIAS (who was the first to solicit that style of favor) went to the bad and died in exile, and how the pretty dancer SALOME, her daughter, whom she put up to make the wicked request, falling through the ice, had her head separated from her body. If the Princess BEATRICE really wants BISMARCK's caput, and would avoid SALOME's fate, she must be careful when she goes a-skating.

We see it noticed in one of our exchanges that ROBERT TYLER, Esq., son of ex-President TYLER, is editing the Montgomery (Alabama) Advertiser, and his daughter setting type in the office. She is simply doing what forty respectable, intelligent young ladies are doing in one of the composing-rooms of HARPER & BROTHERS. They occupy a spacious room by themselves, earn good wages, and like the occupation. Why not? What employment more appropriate or agreeable for women than setting type?

—MR. HENRY VINCENT, the "English orator," as he is termed, has been to Newburyport, Mass., to visit the tomb of GEORGE WHITFIELD, the great divine who crossed the Atlantic thirteen times to preach the gospel to our forefathers. He describes it thus: "We descended into a cellar, through a trap-door behind the pulpit; and removing a padlock from an upright door, we entered the tomb of the great preacher. The coffin is placed across the other two, and the upper part of the lid opens upon hinges. We opened the coffin carefully, and by the light of our lamp saw all that was mortal of WHITFIELD. The bones are blackened, as though charred by fire. The skull is perfect. He died 98 years ago."

—MR. MARTIN, who edited the Queen's diary, is to be knighted. He is the husband of HELEN FAUCIT, formerly an eminent actress.

—MISS BECKWITH is the name of the charming young American who has skated herself into the good graces of Paris by the grace and agility with which she does all sorts of pretty things on the Seine. She executes with her skates letters not exceeding one foot and a half in length, the words thus cut being perfectly legible. Their majesties watch Miss BECKWITH's evolutions with great interest. The young lady is considered to be one of the prettiest and most accomplished of the American colony in Paris.

—AT Sparta, Mississippi, "two tough old hearts have just been joined in one," the two membranes belonging respectively to the Rev. T. YOUNG, aged 86, and Mrs. G. MIXON, aged 83. Their united family foots up over 100 children and grandchildren. The present one is Y.'s 5th better 1/2.

—DR. D. H. JONES, of Brooklyn, has just recovered a verdict of $2000 against the New Haven Railroad Company for assault. The Doctor accompanied some ladies to the dépôt, and endeavored to escort them to seats in the car, when he was assaulted by the employes who were enforcing the rules of the Company. The ladies living on the line of the road say that was a good thing for a jury to do.

—If the Empress EUGENIE really said what is written in the following paragraph, she has a fine power of worrying people:

"The Empress met M. LEVERRIER at Court, and, ignorant that praise of another astronomer, M. DELAUNY, was disagreeable to him, said: 'We were delighted by M. DELAUNY's clear lecture.' M. LEVERRIER, forgetting the respect due to the Empress, angrily replied: 'Mon Dieu, Madame, where did you acquire patience enough to listen to the stupidities DELAUNY drivels?' The Empress coldly replied: 'At your lecture, M. LEVERRIER,' and walked away. M. LEVERRIER never appeared at Court again."

Good anecdote. Probably untrue.

—The three youngest members of the House of Representatives are HAIGHT (29), of New Jersey, ADAMS (30), of Kentucky, and WASHBURN (35), of Indiana. The oldest is THADDEUS STEVENS (75). ALLISON, of Indiana, and POMEROY, of New York, are among the handsomest. In the Senate, SPRAGUE (37) is the youngest, and ROSCOE CONKLING the handsomest and most imperious. The latter married a sister of Governor SEYMOUR, of Utica.

—The large sums of gold Mr. DICKENS is accumulating by his readings, independently of his copyrights, recalls the fact that up to the time of Sir WALTER SCOTT no author in the United Kingdom had been able to "retire" on the proceeds of his literary labors. SHAKESPEARE was the first, POPE the second, and Sir WALTER the third who realized very large sums from their writings. SHAKESPEARE speculated considerably and successfully in real estate. In France, VOLTARE was the first to realize a fortune from his pen, it is said; though a large part of it was due to government contracts.

—Rev. NEWMAN HALL, on getting back to his people in London, said he had not received a dollar for any of his sermons or lectures; but, somehow, his railroad fares and hotel bills were always paid by somebody without his knowledge. He had preached before several universities, and by some of them been D.D., but he told them that NEWMAN HALL was his name, and N. H. it would remain to the end of the chapter.

—GARIBALDI takes Whittier's Poems whenever he feels a little dispirited; knows most of them by heart, and thinks Mr. W. one of the best poets on the planet. The Emperor of Brazil's poetical feelings run in the same direction, and he has done himself the honor of translating a few of Mr. W.'s lines.

—The late Professor FARADAY started in life as a bookbinder, and while a journeyman went to hear Sir HUMPHREY DAVY's lectures on chemistry. He immediately "cut" paste-pot and skivers, went in for science, and placed himself at the top of the ladder.

—Mrs. J. H. RIDDELL, the author of several clever novels, will in April next assume the editorship of the St. James Magazine.

—Do any of our lady readers know Mrs. AUGUST SLUGER, of Illinois? Her husband is very anxious about her. He says: "Every body who knows something about my wife's residence, which I lost three years ago, is herewith requested to call at the office of the Westlich Post."

—EDGAR HOWLAND, Esq., formerly of the historical firm of HOWLAND & ASPINWALL, is residing in elegant ease and tasteful luxury in the Boulevard Haussmann, Paris.

—It may interest those of our readers who are Masons to know, that the present Grand Master of the Masonic Fraternity in Great Britain is the Earl of Dalhousie, who is the sixth of his family who has filled that position. Just one hundred years ago his grandfather was made Grand Master.

—There were present and assisting at a musical party in town, a few evenings since, OLE BULL, CAMILLE URSO, and ALICE TOPP. The Urso Major remarked to the little TOPP: "You play beautifully, my child, but you can't do the greatest music; no woman can; it takes the biceps of a man." The young pianiste replied: "My arm is strong enough; I break my pianos as well as a man could, and STEINWAY has to send me a new one every week." "You see," responded BULL, turning to Madame Urso, "you see how these people treat their pianos. They bang them, they beat them, they kick them, they smash them to pieces; but our fiddles! how we love them!"

—A London journal tells us that Mr. ANDERSON, the London correspondent of the New York Herald, has a telegraphic apparatus in his bedroom, in Princess Square, by means of which he can talk with Mr. BENNETT in his library at Fort Washington.

—A gentleman of the printing persuasion in Texas, who is legally designated JONES, has named his first-born BREVIER FULL-FACED JONES; and as such the young man will go down into history.

—Another little romance—lady in it, of course—has just occurred over in Russia. Prince GORTSCHAKOFF, a very opulent widower, had a pretty niece with whom the Duke of Leuchtenberg, the nephew of the Czar, was madly in love. Fearful that the young couple might cut off and get wedded, the Czar suggested to the Minister that he had better marry his niece himself. Old gentleman did it. Young gentleman disgusted.

—The private libraries of Boston gentlemen are just now the topic of talk among the book folk of that town. The collection of the late EDWARD EVERETT, containing about 7000 volumes, is now in the hands of his son, WILLIAM EVERETT. The library of the late WILLIAM H. PRESCOTT, the historian, contained a thousand or two less than that of Mr. EVERETT. It is still in the house in which he lived and died, and now occupied by his widow. The library of the late ABBOT LAWRENCE contained about 10,000 volumes. It had been given away and sold. The library of the late DANIEL WEBSTER, consisting of 5000 volumes, including law books, remained, as it ought to, at the family residence in Marshfield. The private library of the late THOMAS DOWSE, of Cambridge, the learned leather-dresser, was given by him to the Massachusetts Historical Society. It is very rich in the best volumes of English literature, in superb binding. It contains some 4000 volumes. The private library of the late GEORGE LIVERMORE, of Cambridge, was very rich in Bibles and biblical works, and contained about 4000 volumes. The late THEODORE PARKER had a very large and rare collection of books, some 10,000 in number, that have become the property of the Boston Public Library. The private library of our present Minister to England, CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS, contains about 18,000 volumes, or more than any one in New England. It embraces his own collection, together with that of his father, JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, and his grandfather, JOHN ADAMS. The late RUFUS CHOATE had about 7000 volumes, rich in ancient and modern literature.

—Curious style of man just died in Paris; name, GOSIER; age, 87; cause, guillotine fever; was son of a servant of the unfortunate Louis XVI.; revolution burst out when he was ten years old; father was beheaded; mother escaped with son to Germany; gave him good education, and got him appointed private secretary to an eminent Austrian; patrimony allowed him to live comfortably; purchased house from which he never went out since 1831; only two friends were received in his house; through them his eccentricities were known; house consisted of five rooms; had devoted the largest one to the perfection of the guillotine; that room was full of beams, ropes, and head-choppers. Every time he improved the deadly instrument to his satisfaction he bade his friends bring him cats and dogs, which he beheaded with his machine. During these trials he was so incited to kill that once he threw himself on one of his friends, with the intention to cut his head off; that friend escaped, thanks to his superior strength. He left his bed only during two hours daily, from three to five in the afternoon. Those two hours he devoted to his experiments. As soon as five o'clock struck he went to bed again. He ate, read, and wrote in bed. On Friday last he was making some experiments with his guillotine, when he fell ill; he rang the bell, but when his servant-maid came in he was a corpse. He had been struck by an attack of apoplexy. He always used to say, "My father would not have suffered at all had he been beheaded by my own guillotine." What do you say of that retrospective filial affection?

YOUTHFUL INDUSTRY.

CROCHET TATTING.

HITHERTO tatting has been done only by means of a shuttle. We give herewith descriptions and illustrations by means of which it can be done with a crochet needle. The use of the latter is so generally understood that the new method will be more quickly and easily learned. It is also less trouble than tying the knots with a shuttle, and requires less time and labor; the work is firmer and more even, and is more easily the first; 7 ch.; then a figure consisting of 9 plain stitches. Turn the work; fasten to the 11th stitch of the first 17 ch. by putting the needle through the upper part of the stitch; close the figure by drawing a loop through the 11 loops on the needle; 7 ch.; 1 sc. in the 4th stitch of the same chain row; 3 ch.; a ring like the first, fastening it to the former ring after making 5 ds.; 7 ch. Turn the work; 1 figure like the former small figures, fastened to the 8th ch. (this is the chain row preceding the last ring); 7 ch., which are washed. The principal superiority, however, consists in the fact that it can be used in a much greater number of designs and arrangements than can be made by the other method.

As the figures show, it is adapted to making lace, rosettes, insertion, pieces for figured designs, etc., all of which are in precisely the same style as the ordinary tatting. It can also be unraveled and worked over in case of any imperfection in the work, which, as is known, is impossible in tatting. The materials consist of a crochet hook and cotton—either the twisted crochet cotton, or spool thread of a size corresponding to the work; the hook must be about half as coarse as the cotton. The whole length of the needle must be of equal size, and either fastened to a wooden or bone handle or screwed into a holder; the hook must be smooth and blunt at the point, and from one to two inches in length, as the entire row of loops is taken on it at once. In order to make the instruction clear, the stitches in Figs. 1, 5, 11, and 12 are magnified. The work can, of course, be made in any quality of cotton desired.

into a ring; retain the loop on the needle and crochet 6 ds.; draw the thread through these 6 stitches, and again retain the loop on the needle; crochet 8 ds. in the same manner; then 5 ds., 1 p., 1 ds., and last 5 ds., so that there are altogether 5 loops on the needle (Fig. 11); then throw the thread around the needle as usual, and draw it through the 5 loops. Join the ring by 1 sc., taken under the connecting thread as shown by a point in fewer picots.

Fig. 14.—Lace. This consists of rings linked into each other. Crochet 30 ds. and draw the thread through *. Join in a ring by pulling the needle under the working thread, which is thrown around and drawn through in a loop. The working thread must now lie inside the ring. Then crochet 6 ch., putting the needle through the loop; shove the finished ring on the needle so that it lies back of the chain stitches; make 30 ds., draw the thread through all the loops on the needle; then draw half the length of the row of loops through the first ring, and repeat from *. The next row consists of 1 dc. (double crochet stitch) in the middle of the 5 ch. of the preceding row; alternate with 4 ch.

Fig. 15.—This lace is finished in one round. Crochet a ring consisting of 5 ds.; 7 p., each separated from the next by 2 ds.; 5 ds. Close to this a second ring; 6 ds.; take up the last p. of the former ring; 5 p., each separated from the next by 2 ds.; 1 p., 6 ds.; finally, a third ring like the first; instead of the 1st p., however, take up the last p. of the 2d ring. Crochet now 8 ch.; take up the last p. of the 3d ring; 2 ch.; take up the p. before the last of the 3d ring; 6 ch.; 1 ch. p., the same length as the other picot stitches. This chain-picot is made by drawing the loop on the needle somewhat longer than usual, then taking the needle out and inserting it in the previous stitch, and continuing to crochet so that the loop is fastened and forms a picot.

After this 3 ch.; again 1 ch. p., 8 ch.; then 3 leaf-figures like the former. In the first ring, however, instead of forming the 1st 4 picots, take up the 2 ch. p. and then the 2 p. of the 3d ring of the former figure. Having finished the figure, work 5 ch., and join to the chain stitches preceding the first leaf.

Fig. 18.—CROCHET TATTING EDGING.

Figs. 16 and 17.—Two designs for covers, antimacassars, etc. These can be used for work of any size desired. The figures of the design, Fig. 16, consist of 4 rings linked together, which are formed in the same manner as the rings in Fig. 14; these, however, count each 34 ds., and no sc. stitches are made after joining—the finished ring being simply shoved back on the needle, and the double stitches of the next ring commenced. In Fig. 16 the order of the rings is denoted by numbers in the first figure. The last ring is joined to the first by cutting off the thread, on the needle is sufficient to form a ring; then throw the thread around the needle about one inch from the end of the row (Fig. 2); hold the stitches between the thumb and forefinger of the left hand, and draw the thread through all the stitches, holding the hook of the needle downward and forward. Fig. 3 shows the stitches on the thread. Next make the thread firm, so that the loop on the needle lies close to the other row of stitches, and fasten it into a ring by drawing the thread through the loop; then crochet a slip stitch, putting the needle through the upper part of the last double stitch. Fig. 4 shows this point by an arrow. Crochet a few chain stitches to connect the rings, and proceed with the next precisely in the same manner as the first. The picots are made by leaving the thread of any length desired between any two double stitches (Fig. 5). The rings are also joined by means of the picots. To do this put the hook through the picot, draw the thread through into a loop, and retain this on the needle.

Fig. 15.—CROCHET TATTING EDGING.

Fig. 6.—This lace is made of rings, connected by 5 ch. (chain stitches) between each. Each ring consists of 5 ds. (double stitches), 1 p. (picot), 8 ds., 1 p., 5 ds. The picots serve only as a means of joining the rings.

Fig. 7.—Lace. These rings are joined like those of Fig. 6. Each ring consists of 6 ds., then 7 p., each separated from the next by 2 ds., 6 ds. In every ring except the first take up in place of the 1st p. the last p. of the former ring.

Fig. 8.—Lace. * make 21 ds.; join into a ring; crochet 5 ch. Then follows a figure composed of 8 plain loops, joined like the stitches of the large rings; crochet again 5 ch. Repeat from *. Each following ring is joined to the preceding after the first 5 ds. Finish above by a row of 6 ch. alternately with 1 sc. (single crochet) in the connecting stitches of the figures.

Fig. 9.—Insertion. Crochet a ring as follows: 5 ds., 7 p., each separated from the next by 2 ds.; 5 ds.; then 17 ch. At the end of this a ring like putting the needle through the 1st ring, and drawing the thread through the loop on the needle. The row of stitches for the 1st ring of the next figure is drawn through the last ring of the former figure before joining.

Fig. 17.—The figures of this design consist each of 4 rings of 28 ds. After each ring 1 ch. The figures are joined by putting the 1st row of stitches of each new figure through a ring of a finished figure. The 2 rings which are linked in each other may be fastened where they cross by a few stitches.

Fig. 18.—For this lace, which is worked in 3 rounds, crochet for the 1st round the three-leaved figures as follows: * a ring of 16 double stitches (ds.); a second ring of 20 ds.; a third ring of 16 ds.; then 10 chain stitches (ch.); a figure of 9 plain stitches (see Fig. 18); 10 ch. Repeat from *. The first ring of the next figure must be fastened to the middle side stitch of the last ring. 2d round. 1 single crochet stitch (sc.) in the 4th chain stitch of the former round, *; 6 ch.; 1 figure of 9 plain stitches; 6 ch.; sc. around the thread which joins the little figure of the last round. Repeat from *. 3d round. Alternately 1 sc. around the joining thread of the next figure; 9 ch.

Figs. 19 and 20.—2 rosettes suitable for trimming linen, or for putting together to form covers, antimacassars, etc.

Fig. 19.—Begin this rosette with a foundation of 8 chain stitches (ch.). Crochet * 1 double crochet stitch (dc.) in the 1st chain stitch; then 3 ch. From * repeat 4 times; lastly work 1 slip stitch (sl.) in the fifth of the first 8 ch. 1st round. Immediately on the sl. * a ring of 18 double stitches (ds.) 1 ch., 1 sl. in the next dc. lying to the right; this slip stitch is worked from left to right. From * repeat 5 times. 2d round. 8 ch., which serve as a long treble crochet stitch (lrc.); 11 ch.; 1 lrc. in the single ch. between 2 rings. From * repeat 5 times; lastly 11 ch.; 1 sl. in the last of the 8 ch. at the beginning of the round. 3d round consists of three-leaved figures; for each figure work 3 rings, each of 20 ds.; between each 2 rings 1 ch.; in every chain stitch of the last round 1 sl.; all the slip stitches are worked from left to right, so that the long treble crochet stitches form the stalk of the 3-leaved figures.

Fig. 20.—This rosette is worked of twisted crochet cotton No. 150, and tatting cotton No. 60. The working together of fine and coarse cotton gives a pretty appearance. Begin the rosette in the centre with the coarse cotton, and form a figure of 6 times 6 double stitches (ds.) (in the manner given in Figs. 10-12). The 6 loops on the needle are, however, in this case taken off singly as in Tunisian crochet stitch; then join the figure in a ring (in the manner of Fig. 12). Now join the fine cotton by taking a loop of it on the needle, and drawing it through the loop already on the needle (leaving the coarse cotton here) and working with the 6 chain stitches (ch.) which serve as a treble crochet stitch (tc.); then 10 ch.; 1 tc.; next the last single crochet (sc.); * 8 ch.; 2 tc. separated by 10 ch. around the next connecting thread between the next two 6 ds. From * repeat 4 times; then 8 ch.; 1 slip stitch (sl.) in the last of the first 6 ch. of this round. 3d round. 12 sc. around the arch formed by the 10 ch.; in working this use the coarse cotton as foundation thread; 4 sc. around the next arch and the foundation thread; then leave the fine cotton, and crochet with the coarse a figure of 5 times 3 ds. (similar to Fig. 12); join this in a ring by drawing the thread through all at once, and crochet further 4 sc. around the same arch, using the coarse thread as foundation. From * repeat 5 times in the round and then cut off the coarse thread. 4th round. 6 sl. in the next 6 sc.; 10 ch. * 1 sc. around the upper part of the first ds. of the 2d row of loops of the next figure; 8 ch.; 1 sc. around the first ds. of the 3d row of loops; 8 ch.; 1 sc. around the 1st ds. of the 4th row of loops; 5 ch.; 1 tc. on the middle sc. of the next arch; 5 ch. From * repeat in the round; lastly 1 sl. in the 5th of the first 10 ch. 5th round. Now join again the coarse cotton and crochet a figure (similar to Fig. 12) of 3, 4, 5, 4, 3 ds. Then work a suitable number of sc. around the chain stitch arch of the last round, again using the coarse cotton as a foundation thread. The next figure must come over the figure of the third round, which is easily managed by reference to the pattern. The sixth round consists only of chain stitches, and can also be executed by means of the pattern. The scallops must count enough chain stitches so that they shall not be stretched.

Fig. 21.—This cover is formed of single rosettes joined together. It may be used as cover for a toilette-cushion, or may be made large enough for larger covers by increasing the number of rosettes. In the pattern the middle rosette is somewhat larger than the others. The rosettes which form the outer row count 2 rings fewer, but are formed precisely as the first. Crochet for the larger rosette—1st round. * 13 double stitches (ds.); 1 picot (p.) of $\frac{1}{2}$ inch in length; 13 ds.; join this row in a ring; then 10 chain stitches (ch.). From * repeat 11 times. Each following ring must be fastened at the 8th stitch to the finished ring, at a corresponding distance from the end. The last chain stitch is fastened to the first ring by means of a slip stitch. 2d round. 5 single crochet (sc.) in the next 5 ch. Turn the work so that the left side lies above; crochet a figure of 9 plain loops; then 5 sc. on the next 5 ch. From * repeat in the round. The picots which form the star-like middle point of each rosette are joined by means of a single crochet stitch; draw the picot of the last ring through the picot of the first ring; crochet in this a single crochet stitch; the following picot, as also the one in the ring before the last, is then drawn through the picot in which the single stitch was worked. Continue till the picots are used; then sew the rosettes together.

THE SNOW.

The clouds are gloomy and heavy and gray,
As the clouds in the east at the break of day
Before the morning's sun;
While out of the steely skies the snow
In delicate flakes begins to flow,
Dropping down one by one.

The air is white with a countless swarm
Of tiny snow-stars of exquisite form,
Wandering here and there;
Shrouding the earth in a winding-sheet;
Muffling its cold wool round the feet
Of the trees in the frosty air.

Gently and slowly, silent and slow,
Falleth the fleecy, feathery snow,
Whitening the hills around;
Down from their birth-place the snow-flakes glide,
Finding their grave in the river's tide,
Or heaping the bare, brown ground.

Far out on the ocean falls the snow,
And over the bay where the fishers row,
And down by the rocky shore;
While out on the dreary, lonely plain
Thicker and faster the snow-stars rain
Till they cover the dead grass o'er.

The fields are carpeted thick and deep,
While still the snow-flakes eddying sweep,
Swiftly they whirl through the air;
Wrapping the earth in a velvet pall
For the dying Year; while they seem to fall
With love for his infant heir.

A LEAF FROM KEZZIE GRISWOLD'S LIFE.

"I CAN'T, Robert; not now. You must let me think of it first."

There was a touch of impatience in the girl's voice. She took her hand from the gate, and busied herself in picking up pieces of the flower she held.

"Time to think? Ah, Kezzie, I have no need to stop and think whether I love you or not; though it may take time to show how much I love you—a lifetime, indeed."

Her manner softened at his tone, and she answered in a gentler way, with the rich color coming to her face:

"I did not say I needed time to decide that, but if I would be your wife—that is what you asked me, Robert."

"Well, it is the same thing, is it not? Will not answering one question answer both?"

"I do not know that. When I answer you it is, as you say, for a lifetime. Yet you would have me do it in a moment." Then catching his glance she turned away, half laughing, yet with the hot tears starting to her eyes. "Don't look at me so! I can't help it if I'm not very sensible, or civil either, to-day. I'm tired—a little bit cross, too, maybe. Be good, as you always are, Robert, and don't ask me any thing now. You must let me have my own way in this."

"When did I ever do any thing else? You have surely a right to take what time you will; but Kezzie, little one, don't let it be long."

"No; I will answer you to-morrow," she said, slowly. "Go now, Rob. Good-by."

He watched her as she passed up the garden walk, and then turned away, with a shade of pain and disappointment on his bronzed, handsome face.

The doors and windows of the large kitchen were all wide open, and the sun streamed in over the yellow floor, and danced on the rows of shining tin, adding to the uncomfortable warmth thrown out by the great stove. Into this heated room Kezzie Griswold came, feeling its discomforts more keenly than ever before, and casting a weary, disconsolate look at the huge basket of unironed clothing that was patiently awaiting her return.

She was so tired of all this weary round of work; of spending so much time, thought, and care on all these trifling things, that would have to be done over again to-morrow. Never one step gained, one single advance made; always doing that others might undo—and such petty, unmeaning things, too! What were sweeping and dusting, sewing and ironing, that people should waste their lives so? taking as much thought about the number of eggs required for a cake or custard as if mind and thought were given for nothing else. There were other things in the world—but not in her world, it seemed. There were great, noble, glorious lives that were worth the living; rich in blessing to themselves and all around them. But the beauty and enjoyment of life did not come to her.

This old home was comfortable enough so far as common things went—common things! what else ever came to her? There was plenty of food and clothing; plenty of distasteful tasks too: she was tired of it all—this dull, monotonous level—she wanted change and rest. She had always thought that she would sometime make a new life for herself. She did not know what or how; but she had dreamed bright, vague dreams—poor little Kezzie!—of a world where the wearing, tormenting commonplaces should not creep in. But now there seemed a new chain forged to bind her—Robert Kensett's love for her, or rather hers for him. She did not need to question her love; the sure knowledge of it was that which made her so impatient. In her strange, paradoxical mood she was almost ready to hate him because she loved him.

Wearily she bent over the pretty pink muslin, her cheeks flushed to almost the same color, as she pressed out ruffle and tuck. Usually Kezzie prided herself upon her skill and quickness in this sort of work; but to-day there was a subtle poison-drop at her life's very fountain-head, and it tainted all the streams.

"Kezzie! Kezzie!" piped a shrill voice from the stairway.

The name grated harshly on the girl's ears. Why couldn't they have called her something else? she wondered, when there were so many pretty, musical names. "But no, it must be Kezzie—coarse and common, like every thing else," she said to herself, going slowly to obey the call.

High up on the stairs stood Master Josey Griswold, leaning over the railing, and dangling a long string.

"I say, Kezzie, I'm a-fishin', an' I want you to hitch a piece of gingerbread on to my hook so I can draw it up. I've got to stay here, 'cause I'm on a desert island and hain't got no boat."

"Oh, Josey! what have you been doing?" she cried, discovering that the young gentleman had purloined several yards of velvet ribbon for his "line," and bent her shawl-pin double for a hook.

"You naughty, naughty boy!"

"No, I ain't neither," said Josey, defensively. "I got wrecked, I tell you, an' I couldn't go down stairs for no string. I had to take what I could find on my island, like Robinson Crusoe."

"You might have got wrecked somewhere else than in my bureau drawers, I think! Put the things where you found them, and come down stairs, Josey," and Kezzie went back to the hot kitchen again. She had scarcely resumed her work before the ringing voice came once more.

"Kezzie!"

This time Josey was on the upper landing. He had replaced borrowed property, and so felt particularly self-complacent.

"Kezzie, if I've got to come down stairs an' be a good boy, I must have some gingerbread. I'm goin' to slide down the barristers, an' I'll be there quicker'n wink, an' I want the gingerbread just as soon as I get to the bottom."

"Well," said Kezzie, impatiently, yet she complied with the conditions of peace that were offered. After all, Josey was no more troublesome to-day than other days, only she was so weary. Tiresome work and more tiresome interruptions, she wanted to be free from them all.

Josey, having disposed of his lunch, and scattered the crumbs in as many directions as possible, wandered out into the garden in search of other occupation, and the girl was alone again. The sunlight fell hot across the little portico, and the vegetable garden beyond looked dry and parched; but afar off were green hills, cool and shadowy, and her glance turned toward them longingly. If she were only there, and could press her flushed face to the cool moss, and, closing her eyes, think quietly for a little while! But instead the tall old clock in the corner struck eleven, and it was time to be making preparations for dinner.

Presently came a sound of quick steps, and Aunt Rachel bustled in, depositing her armful of bundles, and sinking into a chair beside them.

"Dear a me! but I do say for't this is a warm day! Goin' a tradin' tires me clean out; does seem as if the shop-keepers delighted in makin' a body look at every thing they have got in their stores afore they'll show em jest what they ask for. Quarter past 'leven? Well, I didn't think I'd been gone so long! Have you got the potatoes on, an' the dinner a goin', Kezzie?"

"Kezzie," said a dreary little voice in the doorway, "I don't know what I'd better do next."

"Dear a me! what in the world have you been a doin' last?" exclaimed Aunt Rachel, in astonishment. "Jest look at the child, Kezzie!"

Kezzie did look, and saw face, hands, and apron woefully soiled.

"I've been a diggin' up the back-yard with this 'ere shingle, tryin' to find Captain Kidd's money, what he buried; but I didn't find none," said Josey, disconsolately, "an' now I don't know nothin' more to do."

Something in the wistful voice touched the sister's heart. Poor little Josey! he was restless and dissatisfied, too, wanting he did not know what. She coaxed him into having face and hands washed, and lying down for a nap.

Then her father came in from the field—"just to eat his dinner, and hurry back to the same dreary work again. How could he be contented with such a life?" Kezzie wondered, watching his cheerful face. But contented he seemed, grateful, too, as he bowed his head at table, and fervently, though in few words and plain, asked a blessing upon "this portion of God's common bounty." "Common indeed!" said Kezzie's rebellious heart; then, shocked at the thought, she tried to crush it.

The early dinner cleared away Aunt Rachel began to display her purchases, and comment upon them.

"That's for Josey's aprons. 'Tain't very fine, but he does tear 'em to pieces so, I thought I'd try to get something 'twould wear well. An' here's the calico for our dresses, not very pretty, neither of 'em; but we only want 'em for common, an' these'll wash well, and—Oh, here's the stuff to jine that quilt when it's done."

"Oh dear! I wish it were finished now," said Kezzie; "I'm so tired of it."

"Why, I thought you liked to make patch-work," said Aunt Rachel, looking over her spectacles in surprise. "I'm sure it's easy enough."

"But it is such common work."

"Well, I s'pose it is," said Aunt Rachel, reflectively; "but the most things that has to be done in this world is common things. Folks' lives—most folks', any how—is about like that patch-work quilt, made up of a little piece of this, an' a little piece of that, an' all of it common goods."

The girl looked up at the peaceful face, and the good, honest eyes that were peering over the spectacles.

"You don't look as if you cared in the least," she said.

Aunt Rachel laughed, a little cheery laugh.

"Why should I care? The common things has got to be done just as much as the uncommon, an' it don't make any difference which a body does, as I know of."

"But some people can do so much good, Aunt Rachel; founding hospitals, and—"

"Where did they find 'em?" interposed Master Josey. "Did they dig for 'em?"

"No, that they didn't!" answered Aunt Rachel, emphatically; "mind you don't get another apron dirty tryin' to dig up one in our back-yard. I tell you what it is, Kezzie, more'n half the folks that gives away great sums to that kind of thing is them that has held tight on to their money, an' kept it all to themselves while they lived; an' when they're dyin', an' can't carry it no farther, they will it to some great charity concern. It's a leetle too much like the man in the parable that had the one talent. He covered it up an' kept it all to himself, an' wouldn't let it do nobody no good as long as he could help it; an' then, when his lord come, an' he knew he couldn't keep it any longer, he lays it down, an' says, 'Take that which is thine.'"

Kezzie fitted her thimble to her finger, took up her sewing, and began to stitch away resolutely. She did not feel like talking much, but she tried by steady, hurried working to drown the tormenting question that kept whispering itself over and over again. She was no more ready to answer it then than she had been in the morning, and she longed to forget it for a little while. Vain effort! It would not be put aside. Kezzie gave it up at last, and when the sun had dropped lower in the sky, and the maple-tree at the door was flinging a long shadow over the grass, she threw down her work and went out, wandering down through the garden, and beyond it into the orchard until she reached a favorite seat under an old apple-tree.

Should she be Robert Kensett's wife? They had known each other from childhood, and his kindness, care, and love had made much of the sunshine of her life. Every body liked him—her father, Aunt Rachel, and even little Josey, and she—yes, she liked him too, dear Rob! But then—Kezzie paused there. A world of ambitious thought was in that girlish head. She had dreamed vague, grand dreams of a brilliant future that was possible for her somewhere: of a life—she scarcely knew what—but something entirely different from the steady, commonplace existence of this quiet little village. Her life had been stupidly peaceful and even so far; she wanted change. She was not willing to bind herself here; to settle down to the old weary round, not even for Robert Kensett's sake; and he could offer her nothing else, she knew.

How those dark eyes would look when she told him! How could she ever bear to meet them with such words on her lips? She covered her face with her hands, and leaned her head against the trunk of the old tree, as if already she saw the glance she so dreaded.

She did not know how long she had been sitting there when she caught the sound of little feet, and a voice called "Kezzie!"

"Oh dear! can I never be left alone?" were her first impatient words.

"Oh Kezzie!" repeated Josey, in a strange, breathless tone that made her drop her hands and look up quickly.

"What is it?" she asked, in sudden alarm at the child's startled face.

"It's caved in, Kezzie, it has! that new well they was diggin' down at the mill! It's all tumbled in on the man that was makin' it, an' Robert Kensett, too; he's all buried up, an' can't get out! They can't see him at all, an' Bill Jones says he don't spect he'll ever get out!"

"Oh Josey, don't!" she cried, in a quick, sharp way, her face growing very white. "That is not so; it can't be! Some one has told you wrong, dear."

"No, they didn't, neither," said Josey, growing indignant at being doubted.

"At least Robert Kensett was not there," she continued, with trembling voice, speaking more to herself than to the child; "he could not have been there; he had nothing to do with the well." But she turned and walked toward the house so rapidly that Josey's little feet could not keep pace with her. On the piazza she met her father, and the blood seemed to settle cold about her heart at his pitying glance.

"What is it, father?" she asked, in a voice that fell strangely even upon her own ears. "Josey told me something, I hardly know what."

"That new well they were digging at the mill," he answered, watching her face; "it caved in suddenly a little while ago and buried two men."

"It was not?" she began, her eager eyes fixed upon his face as he paused; but she could not finish the sentence.

"There was only one man working in the well at the time," said her father, slowly and hesitatingly, "and a stone fell first on his limb and fastened him down. Robert Kensett was near, heard him call, and went down to help him—it wouldn't have been like Robert to do any thing else! He had just succeeded in getting the old man loose, when some men above called to him to come up at once. But it was too late; they had scarcely spoken before the whole thing tumbled in. I'm going down there now."

"Come in, Kezzie, child," said Aunt Rachel, tenderly; and the girl obeyed, sinking down on a chair by the stove, cold and shivering on that warm August evening.

She was not one of those fortunate ones upon whom unconsciousness falls easily, shutting out for the time all sense of pain and terror. Keenly alive were reason, thought, and memory as she sat there, her head upon her hand. Aunt Rachel moved about quietly, stealing a pitying glance now and then at the averted face, longing in some way to lighten the terrible burden of sorrow, which her woman's heart told her she must calmly understand, not speak of. Her own heart was sore too—that kind, motherly heart that had long ago opened to give Robert Kensett a place; that had seen into what the childish intimacy was ripening, and had grown to look upon the brave, noble-hearted Robert as Kezzie's husband of some day, long before the girl herself had dreamed of such a thing. She longed to tell her this now; to let her know how well she understood and sympathized with her great anguish. But the sorest pang that rankled in that young heart she did not even guess. She could not hear the words that sounded so plainly in Kezzie's ears—

"You called his love a chain to bind you here; you wanted to be free, and God has given you your wish!"

She had never thought of this. In all her selfish dreams of pleasure and pride she had still planned that they should be friends in the olden way. What would her life be to her with Robert Kensett gone out of it forever? What to her was a world that did not hold him any where? Empty—desolate! Oh, if she could only forget the wild, foolish—nay, worse than that—the mad, wicked thoughts that she had been cherishing all day! She felt like a murderer now, with just their burning memory.

Slowly the gray of twilight deepened and darkened, and the stars came out. It was so terribly quiet; no one came to bring them any word, and the suspense grew intolerable.

"Let us go down to the mill, Aunt Rachel, just for a little while, to see if we can learn any thing," she pleaded. "It seems so dreadful staying here."

And glad to have her speak at last, Aunt Rachel consented. There were many there before them. Men digging steadily and rapidly, while others stood by ready to take their places as fast as they grew exhausted, that the work should not stop for a moment. There were women, eager and anxious, gathered in little groups, and talking in low voices. A little apart from the others Kezzie saw the wife and daughter of the old well-digger, and, just beyond them, the pale face of Robert Kensett's mother. She did not go to her—what could she say? She sat down upon a large stone, where she could watch the busy workmen, only hoping that no one would notice or speak to her.

The whole scene seemed so strange and unreal—the old mill lying in grim, dark shadow on the river bank; the steady workers bending to their toil, as for life or death; and the circle of men around them holding up lanterns and flaring torches—she might have thought it all some terrible dream but for the crushing weight at her heart and that mother's white, still face. Poor mother! Something in her look brought back that other face, a little like hers, as Kezzie had seen it that morning—only that morning! Was she blind, mad, that she had parted from him so coldly, speaking not one tender word? She had promised to answer him to-morrow—to-morrow! She might answer as she would, he would never, never hear her!

After a time the moon showed its glittering rim above the hill-tops, on the opposite side of the river, rising higher and higher until its light took, in part, the place of the torches. Aunt Rachel had gone to speak with Mrs. Kensett, and Kezzie, with no one to watch or question her, arose and walked away. She gained the side of the mill, and, concealed by its shadow, paced slowly to and fro. The spot was familiar to her. It was a pretty, quiet place, the river-bank around the old mill, and had been a favorite walk of hers always. She had been there often with Robert, too. Only the other day they had stood together a little farther up the bank by the old well, and he had pointed out the new one to her.

She started then with a quick thought. He had told her something of a pipe that connected the two—the old well and the new one. She turned and walked rapidly to the spot where they had stood. There was no one to notice; all were too busy at a little distance from her. She knelt down by the opening, that was partly covered with boards, and bent her ear to listen. All was still for a moment; then she heard, or fancied she did, a low moan.

"Oh, Robert, are you living? Can you hear me?" putting her mouth close to the opening. "Speak to me, darling, just one word!" she cried, in the passionate way in which we say such words over new-made graves.

Again she listened, long and eagerly, but there was no answer, no sound, and she turned sadly away. Aunt Rachel was looking for her.

"Where have you been, Kezia?" she asked. "Haden't we better go home now? We ain't of no use here."

"True, it is of no use to stay," Kezzie replied, sadly. There was nothing to wait for or to hope, she thought, as they walked slowly homeward.

The long hours wore wearily away. Kezzie sought her room, and pressing her aching head upon its pillow, waited, sleepless and tearless. With the first gray dawn of morning her father came. She heard his step and ran to admit him. He met her eyes and answered their question before she could put it into words.

"Yes, they have found them. Robert is living."

"Not dead! But he is hurt—dying?" she questioned, the pallid calm of her lips suddenly breaking into a quiver.

"Not dying, no; he is hurt, but not dangerously. He will live, Kezzie. But poor Millman must have been killed instantly. I shall never forget how his wife looked when he was taken out. Poor creature! She never left the spot the whole night through." The farmer turned away with a sudden moisture in his honest, kindly eyes.

Aunt Rachel had heard his voice, and came down; and leaving them together, Kezzie stole back to her own little room. Of that hour's thoughts and feelings, its penitence, gratitude, and solemn awe, who can write? When the sunlight, streaming in at her window, aroused her, it was with a thankfulness too deep for words that she remembered it was upon the old, sweet life, with its quiet home duties and pleasures, its peaceful, even ways, that she was to enter; not the new, strange, terrible life that might have been, but for the tender mercy which she had so murmured against but yesterday.

"Suppose we go down to Miss Kensett's a few minutes, Kezia; 'twouldn't be no more than neighborly," said Aunt Rachel, divining the girl's unspoken wish.

Robert's face, paler than its wont, but with its bright smile unchanged, greeted them.

"It seems wonderful that I should have escaped with nothing more serious than a broken limb and a few bruises," he said, while his mother and Aunt Rachel were discussing lotions and poultices apart. "But my face was close to that pipe that connects with the old well—you remember my telling you about it once?—and in that way I could breathe. I was perfectly conscious for a time, but afterward my mind must have wandered. I thought I heard your voice once." After a moment's pause he added, thoughtfully, "It would have been all right either way, but I am glad to live for poor mother's sake."

"And for mine," said Kezzie, softly. "And for yours, my darling. It is to-morrow now, Kezzie," coaxingly.

So Kezzie gave him his answer.

The two ladies paused for a moment, on their homeward way, at the house of mourning, where a bruised and disfigured body lay awaiting its burial; and Kezzie came away with grateful wonder that the joy should have come to her while the shadow fell so heavily upon another.

"I say, Kezzie," said Josey, "Bill Jones says truth is in the bottom of a well, did Robert find any?"

"I don't know," answered Kezzie, softly, "but I did."

PARISIAN FUNERALS.

EVERY visitor to Paris, rambling along the Boulevards, has probably seen a funeral procession pass. The black hearse is decorated with tall black plumes, and its horses are entirely covered with black cloths spangled with stars. The sides of the hearse, which are open, are festooned with black cloth, and expose the pall which is thrown over the coffin. All the carriages are covered with cloth which conceals the varnish of the wood under a dead surface of black, and the coachmen's boxes are enveloped in broad folds of the same material. The drivers all wear black cocked-hats, and the horses are all black. The only bright surfaces to be seen in the cortege are the varnished wheels of the vehicles, and the tarpaulin tops of the crape-bound hats worn by six attendants, who walk by the hearse.

As this sombre train moves toward the cemetery of Père la Chaise, the gay throngs on the sidewalk slacken their pace and turn toward it. Most of the gentlemen among the spectators stand still and raise their hats as it passes, in token of respect for the grief of unknown mourners. In a moment more the shadow has gone by, and the brilliant scene which it interrupted sparkles again with accustomed gayety.

This universal token of respect shown through mile after mile of the busy Boulevards, as the procession passes on, discloses to the stranger an unexpected trait of serious feeling in the light-headed world who throng the pavement. It seems to deserve a higher name than that of decorum or politeness. It is an act significant of a reverent and sympathetic recognition.

Nor is it an homage paid only to the obsequies of the rich and great. The same silent acknowledgment is made by the pedestrians in the narrow by-streets, when the little coffin of a child, covered with a white pall, is borne past by four young men, and followed by a sad group of men and women dressed in their working costume.

The funerals of Paris, like many other things in France which would seem to us matters of merely personal concern, are regulated, and we might almost say administered, by the Government. The Prefect issues a volume of instructions covering the whole subject. Nine classes of these "Pompes Funèbres" are established, and a tariff is promulgated by him, declaring what are the essential requisites of each class, and the prices. "A first-class funeral" costs 2555 francs, besides the expense of draping the interior of the church, which varies according to the height of the edifice, and besides the expense of the coffin, in respect to which the family have their choice of four or five different sorts at fixed prices. The second-class funeral costs about 1200 francs, besides the same items. The eighth-class costs about 20, and the ninth-class 3 francs, the only additional item in these and other lower classes of funerals being the coffin. For a funeral at 2555 francs one has hangings of cloth and a little lighted chapel for prayers, at the house of the deceased; a hearse surmounted by a dome, and drawn by four horses; ten draped carriages, and hangings of cloth at the portal of the church and within; and a grand and rich catafalque. For a funeral at 3 francs one has—a pall. The compensation of the priesthood for religious services, and for music, if desired, constitute an additional charge. The prices fixed for a first-class funeral are often exceeded by adding many other accessories.

In the medium classes of funerals the "chapel ardente" at the house of the family is dispensed with, and instead of it there is made what is called an exposition of the remains. The draping or hangings consist of black cloth hung in front of the door and around the walls of the porte cochère, or the vestibule; and some time before the hearse is sent the coffin is brought down to the door, and there lies covered with a pall and watched by an attendant. The front curtains of the shrouded vestibule are parted, so that the coffin is visible from the sidewalk. At its foot is placed a silver vessel containing "holy water," with the brush used for sprinkling. Any friend of the deceased, who passes, steps in, and with a devout prayer sprinkles the pall.

The funeral is not notified through the daily press, but letters of invitation, which are written or lithographed, are sent out, and at the appointed time the hearse moves from the house to the church, followed by the friends who have assembled.

In the case of a funeral of the first-class, the entire front of the great portico of the main entrance of the church is covered with black drapery, hung upon a frame of wooden bars so fitted as to be very quickly put up. To the centre of these hangings is affixed a large black shield trimmed with white, in the middle of which the initial of the deceased appears worked in white, or his coat of arms painted in colors. At the sides of the doorway the hangings are looped up just enough to admit of passing into the church.

In the interior the entire walls of the nave, the transepts, and the choir are covered with heavy black drapery, hung from a great height to the floor, and entirely concealing the pillars, aisles, and side-chapels; and the little daylight which struggles in through the arched tops of the loftiest windows suffices only to illumine the frescoes on the vaulted ceiling. The dark body of the church below is lighted by scores of tall candles. Over the high altar a huge white cross is worked in the black hangings, and far up toward the arches of the roof are seen, at equal distances all around the church, the shields with initials, alternating perhaps with the armorial bearings.

In the centre of the church is erected a large catafalque, which, although in the form of a pedestal decorated with shields and surmounted by a funeral urn, is in reality a tent of black cloth stretched upon a wooden frame-work. On the steps upon which it is raised stand forty or fifty lighted candles in lofty silver candlesticks.

Into the church thus prepared the coffin is borne, and left resting just within the door, while the mourners and friends pass up to the seats in the body of the church, on each side of the catafalque and behind it. Immediately from the sacristy at the other end of the church issues a procession of priests and boys in robes of black and white, bearing holy water, a lofty crucifix, and many lighted candles, who pass down to the coffin, preceded all the way by two beadles in cocked hats and black gloves, who smite the stone pavement at every fourth step with their heavy staves. After prayers and sprinkling of the coffin the procession moves, escorting the coffin up the middle aisle, where it is thrust into the interior of the catafalque to rest there during the service. A master of ceremonies sits in front, distinguished by white neck-tie and black gloves, and rises and bows to the congregation when it is proper for them to stand up or to resume their seats.

The music as well as the devotions offered by the priests at the altar are more or less extended and elaborate according to the expenditure authorized by the family. When the arrangements are very imposing a requiem mass is sung, consisting of solos and choruses, some of the singers being at one end of the church and some at the other, and some perhaps in a remote chapel behind the altar, where their voices are enchantingly mellowed by the distance.

The following simple but beautiful chant is a great favorite upon these occasions, and it is used even in the course of the most elaborate musical service. The tenor may be taken by boys' voices an octave above the written notes:

It is often sung responsively; the priests, standing before the coffin, sing two cadences, and the choir, with organ and orchestral accompaniment, or four voices concealed in the distance, sing the other two; and thus it is repeated many times, softer and softer, until the final "Amen" dies away like an echo in the dome above.

In the middle and lower classes of funerals, there being no chapel prepared at the house of the deceased, it is the custom for the female relatives and friends to unite in the procession and attend the services at the church, the men and women invariably keeping in separate groups and occupying opposite sides of the aisle.

At the conclusion of the service the whole congregation, following the example of the chief mourners, pass in a file before the catafalque, and each one, as he approaches the holy water, makes the sign of the cross with it, and then hands the brush to the one behind him. The procession thus formed passes down the aisle toward the door, where the family of mourners range themselves on either side of the way while the friends and acquaintances pass through. During this sad ceremony the chief mourner stands returning the salutations of those who pass.

In the cemeteries of Paris many of the graves are covered by stone platforms, about four feet by six, bearing an iron railing around the outer edges, and the monumental stone at the head contains a number of inscriptions in its panels. These erections are hung with many wreaths of immortelles or chaplets of bead-work, with here and there a picture in a metallic frame, or a plaster image. To protect such perishable tokens a little glass screen is placed across from rail to rail, and under it hang, in some cases, fifteen or twenty wreaths, which, by the different degrees of preservation in which they appear, from the fresh yellow one, with black letters at one end of the row, down to the faded and drooping one at the other, mark the successive visits of the mourning survivor. Some of the tombstones covered with these memorials are sheltered from wintry storms by huge screens of tin, which, shaped to conform to the outline of the monument, look like cloaks and hoods concealing some ghastly figure.

The more wealthy families cause to be erected over the graves, which are in fact vaults of masonry, little chapels in which prayers may be said for the peace of the departed. The chapels are about the size and shape of sentry boxes, just large enough for one person to enter and stand before a narrow altar at the back. The floor forms a trap-door, covering the mouth of the vault below. A dim light from the roof suffices to disclose to one who peers through the latticed door the altar with its crucifix and flower-pots, and the wreaths and pictures hung upon either wall. Over the door of each is an inscription which may be Anglicised thus: "The Williams Family," "The Jones Family," etc. These little structures, which are seen in every direction, give a singular expression to the place.

On the occasion of an interment the marble slab constituting the altar is removed, the floor is taken up, and after the coffin is deposited in its place the priest comes from his carriage to perform the final rites.

As the members of the company present step down from the terrace into the path again to go away, each in turn approaches the widower or bereaved father, and with uncovered head grasps him by the hand, and says a word of sympathy, of comfort, or of simple farewell.

The grounds surrounding the approach to these cemeteries are not, as is too often the case in this country, a mournful wilderness of marble yards. The street of stone-cutters' shops looks quite as much like a flower-market as like the mart of tombstones; for the front of almost every shop is hung full of a profusion of chaplets, wreaths, evergreens, crosses, pictures, little mirrors, and similar decorations; and in the midst of this display, which conceals the monuments and railings in the shop within, a young woman sits in the doorway, greeting cheerily every one who passes, with "Look, Monsieur; will you not have something?"

The white wreaths are made of shreds of tissue paper, bound in form by winding with a covered wire or a white cord. Wreaths are covered in black by winding with bare, or in white and blue by alternate strips of paper of those colors. Little mirrors, having mottoes, flowers, and ornamental devices worked in white glass beads attached to the surface, are framed and covered with a glass. Wreaths and disks of bead-work are made upon wire frames. These articles vary in price from ten sous to five or six francs.

In observing these customary expressions of mourning it is difficult to draw the line between what is due to spontaneous feeling and what is the result of the dictates of usage. Both these elements seem singularly mixed in the Parisian fashions of mourning, as they must be called. Three styles are established; grand mourning, ordinary mourning, and half-mourning. The great or full mourning, admits only of black cloths and woollen; the ordinary mourning admits silks; the half-mourning other stuffs in black, gray, white, and violet.

The oracles of propriety upon this subject are equally definite in respect to the proper periods of wearing these styles. For a husband eighteen months is required, six for full, six for ordinary, and six for half-mourning. For a wife, father, or mother, six months, and so on with successive degrees, down to three weeks for an uncle or aunt, and fifteen days for a cousin.

It seems to be understood that in making visits of condolence one should not name the deceased unless the bereaved speak of him, but nevertheless should not fail to speak some words of sympathy.

But the function of the rules of etiquette is not to serve as laws of conduct, but as suggestions for the judgment, embodying what is supposed to be the common usage of the best-bred people acting in ordinary circumstances. In this aspect such rules have a value which should not be ignored.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

CARLOTTA.—A new kind of stamp for marking patterns, made of wire, can be purchased at $2 per dozen, for patterns of various designs. Solid blocks, for the same purpose, are $4 per dozen. An economical coloring preparation may be made of ultramarine blue, mixed with a little mucilage and water, for light colored cloths. For dark goods substitute white lead for ultramarine.

A SUBSCRIBER.—Squares of English crape, with a deep hem all around, are thrown over the bonnet, with a point in front, behind, and at the sides, and are fastened at either side with a square jet brooch. If worn with a string in the end, they should be a yard and five-eighths long.

Crape collars and cuffs for the first six months of mourning are simply English crape doubled, according to whatever shape the wearer may prefer. Small folds are worn after these, and at the end of a year, fancy fluting and piping. White tarlatan, crape, and organdy are then admissible.

The length of mourning dresses is the same as of the colored ones described in the Bazar. Bands and folds of corded silk without lustre are used for trimming deep mourning. Folds of bombazine, instead of crape, look well on bombazine dresses. A gored skirt with long sweeping train, with but little trimming, perhaps bordered on the edge, is most suitable for indoor toilette. The handsomest dresses made by our most fashionable dress-makers are two yards and an eighth or a quarter long in the train, from the belt to the edge of the skirt. We would refer "A Subscriber" to Harper's Bazar, No. 12, for further information respecting mourning dresses.

LOTTE.

OUR readers will doubtless be gratified with the reproduction of Kaulbach's beautiful and popular engraving of Lotte, the heroine of Goethe's "Sorrows of Werther." The artist has seized the moment of Werther's introduction to Lotte, when, going with his friend to conduct her to a ball, he pushes open the door and discovers her in her white ball-dress, with her head crowned with roses, cutting bread and butter for her hungry little brothers and sisters. The little fellow in the high chair, at whose birth his mother died and left Lotte to care for the flock, has been first served, and is munching his slice, which he grasps with both hands, while his feet are employed in divesting each other of shoes and stockings, in which he has nearly succeeded. The eldest boy has also been served, and, having filled his own mouth, is thrusting his bread and butter into that of his second sister Sophie, who, though but eleven years old, with her old-fashioned cap and knitting-work in hand, looks ready to take Lotte's place in case of need. The next boy, regardless of the bread, is hesitating whether to seize the fruit on the table or mischievously to pull the golden lock falling down his sister's neck, while the three hungry ones yet unsupplied are grasping at the dress of Lotte, who, with her black loaf clasped to her breast, pauses and casts her brown eyes on the group, as if to say, "Who shall have the next slice?" The cat and toy-horse in the fore-ground finish the picture. The whole scene is so fascinating that we can not wonder that it deeply impressed the poetic Werther; so deeply, indeed, that when the beautiful Charlotte became his friend's bride, after a long struggle between love and duty, he rushed unbidden to that bourne whence no traveller returns.

A COUNTESS AND HER FRIENDS.

A DAME, who is of the very cream of the cream of English society, the Countess of Brownlow, who modestly confesses to seventy years of age, has revived for us her recollections of the great men and women of Europe, whose skirts she has brushed in the course of a long life with her courtly robe. The touch of her ladyship, as becomes so stately a personage, is very light; but though we might have wished a closer intimacy and a warmer greeting, the formal bow and stiff courtesy we share in her distinguished company are something to be grateful for.

When the peace of 1802 brought many French people to England the celebrated Madame Récamier was among them, "who created a sensation, partly by her beauty, but still more by her dress, which was vastly unlike the unsophisticated style and poke bonnets of the English women. She appeared in Kensington Gardens à l'antique, a muslin gown clinging to her form like the folds of a drapery on a statue; her hair in a plait at the back, and falling in small ringlets round her face, and greasy with huile antique; a large veil thrown over her head completed her attire, that not unnaturally caused her to be followed and stared at."

At Spa the aristocratic child was frightened by a sight of a live revolutionist, with hands still dripping with the blood of a king, "the odious Barras! I fancy I see him now," says the Countess, "with his ignoble figure, and his lowering, bad countenance—as far as my recollection goes—always alone, and looking as if he felt that every one knew who he was, and what he was." The next memorable sight of the Countess in her youth was of Bonaparte. "He was then thin, and his figure appeared to be mesquin; but how grand was his face, with its handsome features, its grave and stern and somewhat melancholy expression! A face, once seen, never to be forgotten. It fascinated and acted upon me," writes the Countess, "like a rattlesnake; for though a mere child I felt all the English horror of the man, and yet could not look at him without admiration mixed with awe." Her woman's eyes, though charmed with the brilliant and terrible French viper, could yet turn to take a glance at the prevailing ladies' fashion of the times: "a gown très décolletée, and extremely short-waisted, with apparently only one garment under it; this gown they held up so as to discover one jambe, a shawl hung over the shoulders, the feet chaussés, in their slippers, no bonnet or cap, and the curls on each side of the face greasy with huile antique."

Back in England in 1805, the impressionable dame was overwhelmed with the intelligence of Nelson's death at Trafalgar. "I fell down as if I had been shot," she says. Among her distractions in those early days was an occasional visit to the House of Commons, where she saw Pitt, Sheridan, Whitbread, and Fox, whose complexion struck her as very peculiar, having "the color that yellow crape would have stretched over black."

Her father, being one of the early friends of the persecuted wife of George IV., the Princess Caroline, the Countess saw a good deal of her, and thus sketches her portrait: "Her figure was fit and somewhat shapeless; her face had probably been pretty in her youth, for her nose was well formed; her complexion must have been good, and she had bright blue eyes, but the expression of them was bold, which, however, might be partly caused by the quantity of rouge she wore. Her fair hair hung in masses of curls on each side of her throat, like a lion's mane." Her dress was "of a showy turn; her gowns were generally ornamented with gold or silver spangles, and her satin boots were also embroidered with them. Sometimes she wore a scarlet mantle, with a gold trimming round it, hanging from her shoulders, and as she swam so attired down an English dance, with no regard to the figure, the effect was rather strange." The Countess confesses that the Princess's parties were by no means exclusive. While there were some good people, there were others "very bad." She on one occasion twiggled a parson in small clothes among them, no less a person than the witty and Rev. Sydney Smith, "who," says the Countess, "I thought looked out of place there."

The Countess of Brownlow, being the niece of Lord Castlereagh, accompanied him to Paris, where he went as representative of England, after the abdication of Napoleon at Fontainebleau. Passing through Holland on their slow journey in the rear of the allied armies, the Countess had a glance at the interior of the empty palace of the fugitive king. In one apartment "were two little beds in which King Louis's children (one the present emperor, Louis Napoleon) slept, and the hurry of their departure was evident from the fact that the beds were unmade, and some silver tea-spoons were left about the room." Arrived at Paris, the Castlereagh party had an early visit from Alexander, the Emperor of all the Russias. "He was very civil and courteous, and a handsome man, with fair complexion, but without really good features. He had little grace or ease in his movements, in consequence of the make of his uniform, which was padded on the chest and shoulders, and so tight round the waist and the arm-holes that he could not stand upright, and his arms hung straight, and did not touch his body."

The Countess gets another glance of the French viper, Napoleon, who with his sting taken out and his rattles torn off had less power to charm the Countess. He was so afraid, she says, of the Bourbonists that "he actually rode as courier ahead of his own carriage, with a round livery-hat and a white cockade on his head."

"What strange people the French are!" we echo with her ladyship, who saw still remaining upon a house sufficiently distant for safety from the battle-field where the last struggle took place before the Allies entered Paris, a notice stating, Ici on voit la bataille pour deux sous (The battle can be seen here for two sous).

Paris, though in full bloom of white lilies and white cockades, was by no means in good humor with the Bourbons thrust upon them and their English backers. The poor Duchess D'Angoulême, whose juices of life had been wrung out of her by her long imprisonment at the Temple, and her heart compressed by the load of tragic memories of a murdered mother and brother, had naturally no very cheerful aspect. Elle est maussade; elle n'a pas de grâce; elle est mal mise (She is dull; she has no grace; she is badly dressed), was the common remark of her heartless countrywomen, who never forgave a wry face or an ill-fitting gown.

The Duke of Wellington, though most of his countrymen had but scorn and insults for their share, seems to have awakened a chivalrous enthusiasm among his French enemies. "The Duke was in plain clothes, without any decoration to attract notice, and sat in the back of the box; but he was almost immediately recognized by some one in the pit, and a voice cried out 'Wellington!' The cry was taken up by others, and at last the whole pit rose, and turning to the box, called out, 'Vive Wellington!' nor would they be satisfied till he stood up and bowed to them, when he was cheered and applauded. At the end of the performance, on opening the door of the box," writes the Countess, who was with Wellington and the Castlereaghs, "we found the passage crammed, and my poor aunt was nervous and frightened and shrank back; but the Duke, in his short way, said 'Come along,' and drew her on. Mr. Planta and I followed. While doing so, I heard one man say to another, Mais pourquoi l'applaudissez-vous tant? il nous a tou- jours battus (But why do you applaud him so? he has always beaten us)."

At the state dinners given by her uncle, Lord Castlereagh, the Countess was often seated by the side of notable personages. Of Talleyrand, a frequent guest, she says: His "revolting person and face in some respects did him injustice, for the bad qualities were evident; but his half-closed eyes and heavy countenance gave no indication of his talents and wit." Fouché, another official acquaintance, "was small in stature and spare in make, with a narrow, pinched face, and when unknown might have passed unnoticed. On further observation, there was an expression of shrewd and decided cold-blooded good sense and reflection, without a ray of warmth of feeling. . . . I could fancy him," adds the Countess, "giving his vote, 'Mort sans phrase,' against the unfortunate Louis XVI. with as much sang froid as he ordered his carriage to take him to dinner."

Lord Castlereagh having a diplomatic mission could not be choice of his society, which was accordingly very miscellaneous, and extorted from his wife the remark to her niece, "Emma, I am afraid we live in very bad company." This was the reflection after a dinner at Talleyrand's, where they became acquainted with the Princess, "whose antecedents would not bear very close inquiry." Countess Brownlow says she was either English or Scotch by birth, and had been known in India as Mrs. Grant. A writer in the last Quarterly Review declares that she was an American, who was as remarkable for being a beauty, as for not being a wit. She once seriously asked a Sir George Robinson after his man Friday. Talleyrand vindicated his choice of this pretty fool, saying: "A clever wife often compromises her husband; a stupid one only compromises herself." Napoleon once asked him how he could have married her. He replied, "Ma foi, Sire, je n'ai pu trouver une plus bête" (Indeed, Sire, I couldn't find a greater fool). The Countess Brownlow says she "was a quiet-mannered, respectable-looking pâte de femme."

The Countess was again in Paris after the hundred days and defeat of Napoleon at Waterloo. We again, in the formal company of her ladyship, get some slight glances—as all her well-bred glances are—of a few notabilities. Canova was there to reclaim in behalf of his beloved Italy her stolen works of art; and when he succeeded, "his dark Italian eyes and expressive face were lighted up with enthusiasm, and he wept from emotion." David, the painter, appears among the nude heroes and heroines of his would-be classical canvas. He himself "was a sight, as well as his pictures, but not a pleasing one in any way. Unlike the smoothness, and high finish, and unmeaning faces which characterized his heroes, his face was remarkably coarse, and the expression of the countenance decidedly bad."

With a glimpse, at his trial, of Ney—"a strongly-built man, above the middle height, fair complexioned, with yellow hair and eyebrows, short nose, and long upper lip; nothing distinguished or even French about him"—and of his judges, Jourdan, Massena—"a spare, dark, ill-looking man, with only one eye"—Augereau, Mortier, Marin, and others, "all of whom, with the exception of Mortier, were certainly not a prepossessing set"—we take leave of the Countess Brownlow, in whose company we might have lingered longer had she possessed a little less of the haughty reserve of the great lady, and more of the freedom of the gossiping woman.

PRACTICAL EDUCATION.

AN English essayist in Blackwood, who has a clearer idea of the educational system and attainments of the American people than have most of our English cousins, thus sensibly discourses of the practical education of Americans:

It is because the Americans are such a busy people that they become such a generally educated people. The immensity of the task before them, in bringing their wide domain into cultivation, and in building up what promises to be the most powerful nation in the world, appeals so strongly to their imagination and their sense of responsibility, as to give them an air of sadness and thoughtfulness that strikes every stranger who resides even for a short while among them. They have the education of the mariner, the farmer, the miner, the explorer, the hunter, and the adventurer, as well as that of the trader, and sharpen their faculties in a thousand ways that are not and can not be open to the poor Englishman, in a country where the day's subsistence often costs more than the day's work. The scarcity of labor in America, and the difficulty of procuring help in the work of the farm, the mill, and the forge, develops the intellect of the people; and far away in the backwoods many an acute pioneer of civilization invents and patents some ingenious machine for rendering men and women independent of the hired service, so costly and so difficult to obtain in a new country. The mechanical skill of the Americans is unequalled in the world, and never likely to be rivaled in the old countries of Europe, where labor is cheap. The Patent Office at Washington—that marvelous repository of contrivances, from the simplest to the most elaborate machine that the cunning hand and the busy brain can construct—and all devoted to the one great end of facilitating work, and economizing manual and other bodily exertion—is sufficient proof of the assertion, and of the practical and material, as distinguished from the scholastic, education of the American people. Book-learning and the common-school system have no doubt done something for them, but however great that something may be it would have been less, if it had not been for the fertile soil, the favorable climate, the immense extent of territory, and the gigantic and not half-developed resources of the continent. In fact, book-learning and what we thoughtlessly call "education" is about the smallest of the agencies which have made the United States so powerful. They owe their position, first of all, to their race and blood; and, secondly, to possession of the best portion of a continent, and the unrivaled opportunities thus presented, and by which they have known to profit. Their school education, which enables them to read the newspapers, has certainly not impeded their progress; but without possession of such a glorious domain as that which their forefathers wrested from the Red Indians, their "education" in the common schools, which they have so lavishly established, would never have received half the laudation which they, as well as foreign admirers, have been eager to bestow upon it. The school "education" bestowed upon the children of Scotland, and introduced long before the Puritans founded the colony of Massachusetts Bay, is greatly superior to that bestowed upon the Americans; but it has not made an America out of North Britain, though it has certainly given America some of its best immigrants, in the persons of the well-instructed and "go-ahead" Scotchmen, who are ever to be found among the leading and most influential citizens in every part of the United States and Canada.

INFANTS' WARDROBES.

IT is a common complaint that while fashion journals elaborately describe all the details connected with ladies' toilettes, they neglect the subject of infants' clothing, which is equally desirable. We are constantly in receipt of letters asking for information in this respect, in answer to which we give the following hints. Beginning with the underwear, may be the first article noticed. There is no garment that is so generally unwisely made as this one. One of the most prevalent errors is to gore the shirt under the arm after the style suited to older persons, who differ a great deal in form from infants. It may add to the symmetry of the garment, but certainly not to the comfort of the wearer. The same may be said of yoked shirts; both making unnecessary folds about the form.

A pattern which we have recently seen exhibited to a remarkable degree the fault of ignoring the knowledge of anatomy. It was of a little shirt intended to fit a perfectly straight body of the tenderest structure, gathered very full into a deep yoke buttoning with three buttons, the sleeve full into a band. Indeed, it was an exact copy of what the mother might be supposed to wear. All fullness in infants' shirts should be avoided; it not only adds to the discomfort of the wearer, but it complicates the making, and nearly doubles the amount of material actually required.

A good, plain pattern is as follows: Take of the material twenty-two inches in length and eight in depth; fold to open in front; cut slits three inches in length for arm-holes, making sleeves to suit the taste—cut with or separate from the shirt, the latter being the most economical of material. Several made after this pattern are convenient for first wear. Another simple pattern is shaped in the neck and buttons on the shoulders; another is cut body and sleeves in one with no seam on the shoulder. Ten inches is a good width for a shirt, not including the sleeves.

Below is a diagram of a very pretty shirt and one easily made. Take of material eleven inches in width and twenty in length; fold to make the ends meet at the bottom of the garment. Beginning at a point three inches from the top of the arm-hole, cut the slits a d and c d two and a half inches in length, which should reach nearly half-way down to the bottom of the sleeve and to within an inch of the arm-hole; then cut out the point a b c. It will now be seen that there is a point on each shoulder which turns back over the sleeve, and two in front and two behind; these should be neatly hemmed, and finished with narrow Valenciennes edging. The sleeves are cut to suit the fancy, and sewed in instead of being cut with the shirt. The dotted lines are to be followed in cutting; the black ones represent the appearance after the cutting and turning down of the points. It would be better to try the pattern on paper before cutting the material. The points can be worn outside the dress, or as the taste may suggest.

The trimming of infants' shirts should be exclusively of lace; Valenciennes is by far the handsomest, and wears well, though a fine linen edging is pretty, and durable besides, being cheaper than the other laces. Tattling, ruffling, and heavy embroidery are out of place on these little under-garments. The next thing to be considered is of which there is the muslin-flannel and what is commonly called the "foot-blanket." The latter is very simply made: one breadth of flannel, three-fourths of a yard in length, is gathered into a band, which, beginning about under the arms, is tapered down into a point (both sides alike), to which is attached a tape that passes around the body through a slit under one arm and ties—thus doing away with pins in one garment at least. The skirt is left open in front, and is tied or buttoned at intervals. For ordinary flannel skirts one yard is sufficiently long. The best trimming for everyday wear is embroidery in white silk floss. A pretty trimming is two rows of fluting of white silk ribbon an inch in width. Something still prettier is a facing of white silk four or five inches deep, the upper edge being cut in waves or deep points, and headed with either narrow silk braid, or embroidery in small design.

Muslin skirts, like dresses, can be trimmed in an infinite variety of ways. Tucks running straight round; tucks inserted diagonally, and bordered on each side with insertion, the skirt terminating with embroidery; tucks inserted in a diamond shape, separated by puffs, the skirt edged with a ruffle, are among the most elaborate styles of trimming.

DRESSES.

Baby dresses, like those for their mammas, can be made almost in any style, and still be in fashion, with the difference that a train in the former is always indispensable. A dress gored all the way up with no fullness about it, with jacquet insertion running up every seam, the neck, sleeves, and skirt finished with embroidery, is very pretty.

A comfortable slip, and one easily made, is gored only on the side breadths, the seams of which are edged with narrow Coventry ruffling; the sleeves are cut with the dress. Another slip is made full, and confined at the neck by several shirrs, through which are run small tapes. Inch-wide tape should form an inside belt, reaching half-way round, to all dresses made after this pattern. The tape is sewed on the seam of the dress the length of a finger below the arm-hole, and, extending round the front, buttons under the other arm. The back of the dress can be confined by broad sashes of the same material as the dress, edged with lace or embroidery; or a half-belt, edged with the same and buttoning under one arm. For a young baby these slips are much more suitable than the richly-trimmed robes.

A woman who is so disposed can make the richest of robes at a small cost compared with what they are generally sold for. And for the benefit of that class who for various reasons plan and make up these little garments at home this article is expressly designed.

By following the directions given below a very pretty and inexpensive robe can be made with little or no trouble. Of three and a half yards of fine mull take one-third of a yard for waist and sleeves, a yard and an eighth for the back breadth, which is left whole, and the remainder for the front breadth, which, beginning about three inches from the selvedge at the bottom, is tapered up to the width of a quarter of a yard. The front breadth is then tucked in "clusters," the lower cluster containing thirteen tucks an eighth of an inch deep, the next twelve, the next eleven, and so on, until the front is made the same length as the back; the latter has but one cluster of tucks, matching the lower one on the front breadth. Between every cluster leave a space on which to stitch insertion. (It will look better stitched on if it matches the dress in thinness.) After this is done take enough of the gores that were cut from the front breadth and cord them on again so as to make two full straight breadths of the same width. The skirt is then finished by embroidery three inches in depth, to match the material of the dress. The waist is gathered into a belt of embroidery, the front being cut and made after the style of the skirt, the top corded into a narrow band. The sleeves are tucked, and both neck and sleeves finished with narrow embroidery. Two yards of wide embroidery, half a yard of narrower for the sleeves, a yard of still narrower for the neck, and four and two-thirds yards of insertion is the amount required. This robe can be trimmed beautifully with Valenciennes edging and insertion.

Another style of dress is made open in front and elaborately trimmed in tucks and lace or embroidery up the fronts and around the bottom. The front breadth of the white skirt worn under this should be handsomely trimmed.

THE CLOAK,

when tastefully made, is the crowning beauty of a baby's wardrobe. They are made up in cloth, cashmere plaids, French merinos, and flannel in checks or plain colors.

A very handsome shawl-shaped cloak, with a cape of the same shape, is made of scarlet cloth, with a facing of heavy white silk three or four inches in depth, the upper edge cut in regular points, matching the shape of the cloak, and either stitched or headed with silk cord or braid. The hood is lined and the edge bound with white silk, with a bow of narrow white ribbon on the top, and loops with ends attached to the back of the neck. Embroidery, braiding, and swans-down are very much used in the trimming of cloaks. Ermine is much handsomer, and, of course, very much more expensive.

Something cheap can be made of merino or flannel, with a facing or folds of white merino. Merino cloaks should always be lined; while flannel cloaks with a cape will do without a lining. Plaids are generally finished with heavy cord to match.

SACQUES.

Much taste can be displayed on little sacques for indoor wear. They are beautifully made in zephyr, though flannel or merino prettily trimmed are good for a change. A pale-buff flannel, finished with a crochet border in white zephyr, is neat; machine embroidery also looks pretty and washes well.

BLANKETS

are made almost exclusively of white material, colors sometimes being used in the trimming, though generally not in good taste. A flannel blanket of the finest quality, embroidered delicately in a pale golden color, is quite pretty. Another one is finished with a deep crochet border of scarlet wool, while some are simply faced with white ribbon. They are more generally embroidered in white silk floss, and are certainly much more to be admired.

BIBS.

These little articles are needed by the dozen by some babies, and not at all by others. They are made of Marseilles, heavily braided and lined, sometimes quilted—in this case they are not braided. They are very pretty finished with lace or a needle-work edge.

NIGHT-GOWNS.

No woman need perplex her brains over a garment of this kind; the simpler they are made the more convenient they are. A good pattern is cut with sleeves and body in one. Another is cut in the sack form. They are made of muslin, brilliant, and jaconet, with a little trimming of lace or ruffling.

The number of articles necessary for the completion of an infant's wardrobe differs in different households, depending in a measure upon one's means. But it should be the privilege of every woman to expend as much of her husband's fortune (if he possess any) as she may choose in the preparation of the first wardrobe of this kind; for she will not fail to see the folly of it before there is occasion for a renewal.

A very respectable wardrobe, however, would be from eight to ten shirts, ten to twelve dresses, four to six muslin skirts, four of flannel, three "foot-blankets," six bands (which should be of the finest, softest flannel), eight night-gowns; and of linen diaper forty yards, more or less, as you have other material. Canton flannel is much used for the same purpose, and is to be recommended. Twenty-inch linen is a good width; canton flannel is generally too wide.

A very unwise custom, and one universally indulged in, is the shortening of the long white dresses so daintily and carefully made. They are too soon outgrown to repay one for even the short time spent in altering them. For babies that are beginning to "creep," it is much better to make another set of dresses, of a good size, that will allow free motion to the limbs. Woolen goods, Marseilles, or brilliant, as suits the season, are becoming.

THE FATAL VALENTINE.

I.

MR. MORTIMER KUTE was a man of few words, Yet he cut quite a dash in those regions of "ton" Where, thinking fine feathers betoken fine birds, Dame Fashion so oft takes a goose for a swan. So, Mortimer Kute Was a man of repute: His toilette was faultless from castor to boot; He got himself up with elaborate care, Giving most of his mind to his whiskers and hair. His manners were mild, and his morals thought good, And the tide of his fortunes appeared at the flood; For a rumor had spread That, ere long, he would wed With the belle of the "ton"—worth a million, 'twas said.

II.

Now it chanced, on the eve of St. Valentine's Day, From his bachelor club coming home rather late, Kute bethought him of two little debts he'd to pay: One to Love, which he trusted might settle his fate; But the other was—whew! Far more dreadful—to sue For a further delay on a grim I O U! With a bottle of wine, then, he sat himself down, And a volume of extracts from bards of renown, First, to plead at the shrine Of Saint Valentine, And then fling to Mammon the bait of a line.

III.

He found just the thing for his belle millionnaire (It said that true hearts by no bribes could be won); Then finished the bottle to banish dull care, And scrawled these few lines to his foeman, the Dun: "It's needless to say I am anxious to pay This paltry five thousand; but can not, to-day. But I'll tell you a secret: I'm safe for the prize! A million! All hers! Don't that open your eyes? Mind; a Million, I say! In three months from to-day Your five thousand greenbacks in bullion I'll pay, And lend you a cool hundred thousand to boot, As sure as my name is—Yours—Mortimer Kute!"

IV.

These two precious documents, folded with care, Did Mortimer Kute then contentedly slide Into two little envelopes, dainty and square, And left them a moment there, side by side, While he trembled to think How close to the brink He had been of the stream where so many folks sink; Then he wrote the address on each separate square, To the Dun this, and that to the belle millionnaire, And retired to bed With a pain in his head, But soothed by the thought that his missives were sped.

V.

Saint Valentine's morning broke coldly and clear; The postmen went merrily each on his way. 'Twas the heaviest mail-bag of all the new year, And to Mortimer Kute 'twas the weariest day. His pulses beat high As the hour drew nigh When a call might be made with propriety. His toilette he altered a dozen times; He cursed as he counted the loitering chimes From the bell's brazen throat; But, at length, his dress-coat He was just putting on, when there reached him—a note.

VI.

'Twas a note—bless the Saint! in her own dainty hand; Addressed, "Mr. Mortimer Kute," and he read The words with astonishing self-command, Though he felt, to be sure, he had nothing to dread; For the prize, he knew, He had simply to sue; And—here the small envelope open flew, And, unliking the billet-folds one by one— Good Heavens! 'twas his own wretched scrawl to the Dun!

With—by way of device— This: "Your project is nice, But I'm sorry to say, I decline, at the price!"

VII.

It was useless to stamp or to torture his hair (Moreover, it hurt, for he wore a tight boot, And his head still ached); for the belle millionnaire Was thus lost forever to Mortimer Kute. He never could tell How the error befell, But swore 'twas the work of a mischievous "sell." It might have been so, though I rather incline To think it was due to the bottle of wine. But the moral is trite: When such notes you've to write, Don't postpone them till after club hours that night!

THE BRANDON MYSTERY.

CHAPTER XXVII.

JOURNAL OF PAOLO LANGHETTI.

WHEN Mrs. Thornton saw Despard next she showed him a short note which she had just received from her brother, accompanying his journal. Nearly two years had elapsed since she had last heard from him.

His journal was written as before at long intervals, and was as follows:

Hali-fax, April 10, 1847.—I exist here, but nothing more. Nothing is offered by this small colonial town that can afford interest. Life goes on monotonously. The officers and their families are what they are every where. They are amiable and pleasant, and try to get the best out of life. The townspeople are hospitable, and there is much refinement among them.

But I live for the most part in a cottage outside of the town, where I can be secluded and free from observation. Near my house is the Northwest Arm. I cross it in a boat, and am at once in a savage wilderness. From the summit of a hill, appropriately named Mount Misery, I can look down upon this city which is bordered by such a wilderness.

The winter has passed since my last entry, and nothing has occurred. I have learned to skate. I went out on a moose-hunt with Colonel Despard. The gigantic horns of a moose which I killed are now over the door of my studio. I have joined in some festivities, and have done the honors of my house. It is an old-fashioned wooden structure which they call the Priory.

So the winter has passed, and April is now here. In this country there is no spring. Snow is yet on the ground. Winter is transformed gradually till summer. I must keep up my fires till June, they say.

During the winter I have guarded my treasure well. I took a house on purpose to have a home for her. But her melancholy continued, and the state of mind in which I found her still endures. Will it ever change? I gave out here that she was a relative who was in ill health. But the winter has passed, and she remains precisely the same. Can she live on long in this mood?

At length I have decided to try a change for her. The Holy Sisterhood of Mercy have a convent here, where she may find a higher and purer atmosphere than any where else. There I have placed her. I have told nothing of her story. They think she is in grief for the death of friends. They have received her with that warm sympathy and holy love which it is the aim of their life to cherish.

O mater alma Christi carissima,
Te nunc flagrantem devota corda et ora,
Ora pro nobis!

August 5, 1847.—The summer goes on pleasantly. A bracing climate, a cool sea-breeze, fishing and hunting in the forests, sailing in the harbor—these are the amusements which one can find if he has the leisure.

She has been among the Sisterhood of Mercy for some months. The deep calm of that holy retreat has soothed her, but only this much that her melancholy has not lessened but grown more placid. She is in the midst of those whose thoughts are habitually directed to that world which she longs after. The home from which she has been exiled is the desire of their hearts. They aim after that place for which she longs with so deep a longing. There is sympathy in all those hearts with one another. She hears in their chants and prayers those hopes and desires, and these are but the utterances of what she feels.

Here they sing the matchless Rhythm of Bernard de Morlaix, and in these words she finds the highest expression that human words can give of the thoughts and desires of her soul. They tell me that the first time they sang it, as they came to this passage she burst into tears and sank down almost senseless:

O bona patria! lumina sobria te speculantur,
Ad tua nomina sobria lumina collacrimantur:
Est tua mentio pectoris unctis, cura doloris,
Conspiciuntibus aethera mentibus ignis amoris.

November 17.—The winter must soon be here again.

My treasure is well guarded by the Holy Sisterhood. They revere her and look upon her as a saint. They tell me wonderful things about her which have sunk into my soul. They think that she is another Saint Cecilia, or rather Saint Teresa, the Saint of Love and Longing.

She told them once that she was not a Catholic, but that any form of worship was sweet and precious to her—most of all, the lofty utterances of the prayers and hymns of the Church. She will not listen to dogmas, but says that God wishes only love and praise. Yet she joins in all their rites, and in this House, where Love is chiefly adored, she surpasses all in the deep love of her heart.

January 2, 1848.—I have seen her for the first time in many months. She smiled. I never saw her smile before, except once in the ship, when I told my name and made her mother take my place in the cabin.

She smiled. It was as if an angel from heaven had smiled on me. Do I not believe that she is one?

They all say that she is unchanged. Her sadness has had no abatement. On that meeting she made an effort for my sake to stoop to me. Perhaps she saw how my very soul entreated her to speak. So she spoke of the Sisterhood, and said she loved them all. I asked her if she was happier here than at my house. She said "No." I did not know whether to feel rejoiced or sorrowful. Then she told me something which has filled me with wonder ever since.

She asked me if I had been making inquiries about her family, for I had said that I would. I told her that I had. She asked what I had heard. I hesitated for a moment, and at last, seeing that she was superior to any sorrow of bereavement, I told her all about the sad fate of her brother Louis, which your old friend Courtenay Despard had communicated to his uncle here. She listened without emotion, and at last, looking earnestly at me, said, "He is not dead!"

I stood amazed. I had seen the very newspapers which contained an account of his death. I had read the letters of Courtenay Despard, which showed how painstaking his search had been. Had he not traveled to every place where he could hear any thing of the Brandons? Had he not written at the very outset wherever he could hope to hear any thing? I did not know what to say.

For Louis Brandon is known to have fallen overboard from the ship Java during a tremendous monsoon, several hundred miles away from any land. How could he possibly have escaped death? The Captain, whom Courtenay Despard found out and questioned, said he threw over a hen-coop and a pail. These could not save him. Despard also inquired for months from every ship that arrived from those parts, but could learn nothing. The next ship that came from New South Wales foundered off the coast of Africa. Three passengers escaped to Sierra Leone, and thence to England. Despard learned their names, but they were not Brandon. The information which one of them, named Wheeler, gave to the ship-owners afforded no hope of his having been found by this ship, even if it had been possible. It was simply impossible, however, for the Falcon did not pass the spot where poor Brandon fell overboard till months had elapsed.

All these things I knew, and they came to my mind. She did not notice my emotion, but after a pause she looked at me again with the same earnestness, and said,

"My brother Frank is not dead."

This surprised me as much as the other.

"Are you sure?" said I, reverently.

"I am."

"How did you learn this? All who have inquired say that both of your brothers are dead."

"They told me," said she, "many times. They said that my brothers had not come among them to their own place, as they would have had to come if they had left the earth."

She spoke solemnly and with mysterious emphasis. I said nothing, for I knew not what to say.

On going home and thinking over this, I saw that she believed herself to have the power of communicating with the departed. I did not know whether this intelligence, which she believed she had received, had been gained in her trance, or whether she thought that she had recent interviews with those on high. I went to see her again, and asked this. She told me that once since her recovery she had fallen into that state, and had been, as she called it, "in her home."

I ventured to ask her more about what she considered a communion with the departed. She tried to speak, but looked like one who could not find words. It was still the same as before. She has in her mind thoughts which can not be expressed by any human language. She will not be able to express them till such a language is obtained. Yet she gave me one idea, which has been in my mind ever since.

She said that the language of those among whom she has been has nothing on earth which is like it except music. If our music could be developed to an indefinite extent it might at last begin to resemble it. Yet she said that she sometimes heard strains here in the Holy Mass which reminded her of that language, and might be intelligible to an immortal.

This is the idea which she imparted to me, and I have thought of it ever since.

August 23.—Great things have happened.

When I last wrote I had gained the idea of transforming music into a language. The thought came to me that I, who thirst for music, and love it and cherish it above all things—to whom it is an hourly comfort and solace—that I might rise to utter forth to her sounds which she might hear. I had already seen enough of her spiritual tone to know what sympathies and emotions might best be acted upon. I saw her several times, so as to stimulate myself to a higher and purer exercise of whatever genius I may have.

I was encouraged by the thought that from my earliest childhood, as I began to learn to speak so I began to learn to sing. As I learned to read printed type so I read printed music. The thoughts of composers in music thus became as legible to me as those of composers in words. So all my life my knowledge has widened, and with that knowledge my love has increased. This has been my one aim in life—my joy and my delight. Thus it came to pass that at last, when alone with my Cremona, I could utter all my own thoughts, and pour forth every feeling that was in my heart. This was a language with me. I spoke it, yet there was no one who could understand it fully. Only one had I ever met with to whom I told this besides yourself—she could accompany me—she could understand and follow me wherever I led. I could speak this language to her, and she could hear and comprehend. This one was my Rice.

Now that she had told me this I grasped at the thought. Never before had the idea entered my mind of trying upon her the effect of my music. I had given it up for her sake while she was with me, not liking to cause any sound to disturb her rapt and melancholy mood.

But now I began to understand how it was with her. She had learned the language of the highest places and had heard the New Song. She stood far above me, and if she could not understand my music it would be from the same reason that a grown man can not comprehend the words of a lisping, stammering child. She had that language in its fullness. I had it only in its crudest rudiments.

Now Bice learned my words and followed me. She knew my utterance. I was the master—she the disciple. But here was one who could lead me. I would be the follower and disciple. From her I could learn more than in all my life I could ever discover by my own unassisted efforts.

It was mine, therefore, to struggle to overcome the lisping, stammering utterance of my purely earthly music; to gain from her some knowledge of the mood of that holier, heavenly expression, so that at last I might be able in some degree to speak to this exile the language of the home which she loved; that we, by holding commune in this language, might rise together to a higher spiritual realm, and that she in her solitude might receive at least some associate.

So I proposed to her to come back and stay with me again. She consented at once.

Before that memorable evening I purified my heart by fasting and prayer. I was like one who was seeking to ascend into heaven to take part in that celestial communion, to join in the New Song, the music of the angels.

By fasting and prayer I sought so to ascend, and to find thoughts and fit utterance for those thoughts. I looked upon my office as similar to that of the holy prophets of old. I felt that I had a power of utterance if the Divine One would only inspire.

I fasted and prayed that so I might reduce this grosser material frame, and sharpen and quicken every nerve, and stimulate every fibre of the brain. So alone could I most nearly approach to the commune of spirits. Thus had those saints and prophets of old done when they had entered upon the search after this communion, and they had received their reward, even the visitation of angels and the vision of the blessed.

A prophet—yes—now, in these days, it is left for the prophet to utter forth his inspiration by no other way than that of music.

So I fasted and prayed. I took up the words from the holy priesthood, and I said, as they say:

Munda cor meum, ac labia mea, Omnipotens Deus, qui labia Isaiæ prophetæ, calculo mundaisti ignito!

For so Isaiah had been exalted till he heard the language of Heaven, the music of the Seraphim.

She, my divinity, my adored, enshrined again in my house, bore herself as before—kind to me and gentle beyond all expression, but with thoughts of her own that placed between us a gulf as wide as that which separates the mortal from the immortal.

On that evening she was with me in the parlor which looks out upon the Northwest Arm. The moon shone down there, the dark, rocky hills on the opposite side rose in heavy masses. The servants were away in the city. We were alone.

Ah, my Cremona! if a material instrument were ever able to utter forth sounds to which immortals might listen, thou, best gift of my father, thou canst utter them!

"You are pale," said she, for she was always kindly and affectionate as a mother with a child, as a guardian angel with his ward. "You are pale. You always forget yourself for others, and now you suffer anxiety for me. Do not suffer. I have my consolations."

I did not make any reply, but took my Cremona, and sought to lift up all my soul to a level with hers, to that lofty realm where her spirit ever wandered, that so I might not be comfortless. She started at the first tone that I struck forth, and looked at me with her large, earnest eyes. I found my own gaze fixed on hers, rapt and entranced. Now there came at last the inspiration so longed for, so sought for. It came from where her very soul looked forth into mine, out of the glory of her lustrous, spiritual eyes. They grew brighter with an almost immortal radiance, and all my heart rose up till it seemed ready to burst in the frenzy of that inspired moment.

Now I felt the spirit of prophecy, I felt the afflatus of the inspired sibyl or seer, and the voice of music which for a lifetime I had sought to utter forth now at last sounded as I longed that it should sound.

I exulted in that sound. I knew that at last I had caught the tone, and from her. I knew its meaning and exulted, as the poet or the musician must always exult when some idea sublimer than any which he has ever known is wafted over his upturned spiritual gaze.

She shared my exultation. There came over her face swiftly, like the lightning flash, an expression of surprise and joy. So the face of the exile lightens up at the throbbing of his heart, when, in some foreign land, he suddenly and unexpectedly hears the sound of his own language. So his eyes light up, and his heart beats faster, and even amidst the very longing of his soul after home, the desire after that home is appeased by these its most hallowed associations.

And the full meaning of that eloquent gaze of hers as her soul looked into mine became all apparent to me. "Speak on," it said; "sound on, oh strains of the language of my home! Unheard so long, now heard at last."

I knew that I was comprehended. Now all the feelings of the melancholy months came rushing over my heart, and all the holiest ideas which had animated my life came thronging into my mind, bursting forth into tones, as though of their own accord, involuntarily, as words come forth in a dream.

"Oh thou," I said, in that language which my own lips could not utter—"oh thou whom I saved from the tomb, the life to which I restored thee is inkstone; but there remains a life to which at last thou shalt attain."

"Oh thou," I said, "whose spirit moves among the immortals, I am mortal yet immortal! My soul seeks commune with them. I yearn after that communion. Life here on earth is not more dear to me than to thee. Help me to rise above it. Thou hast been on high, show me too the way."

"Oh thou," I said, "who hast seen things ineffable, impart to me thy confidence. Let me know thy secret. Receive me as the companion of thy soul. Shut not thyself up in solitude. Listen, I can speak thy language."

"Attend," I cried, "for it is not for nothing that the Divine One has sent thee back. Live not these mortal days in loneliness and in uselessness. Regard thy fellow-mortals and seek to bless them. Thou hast learned the mystery of the highest. Let me be thine interpreter. All that thou hast learned I will communicate to man."

"Rise up," I cried, "to happiness and to labor. Behold! I give thee a purpose in life. Blend thy soul with mine, and let me utter thy thoughts so that men shall hear and understand. For I know that the highest truth of highest Heaven means nothing more than love. Gather up all thy love, let it flow forth to thy fellow-men. This shall be at once the labor and the consolation of thy life."

Now all this, and much more—far more—was expressed in the tones that flowed from my Cremona. It was all in my heart. It came forth. It was apprehended by her. I saw it, I knew it, and I exulted. Her eyes dilated more widely—my words were not unworthy of her hearing. I then was able to tell something which could rouse her from her stupor. Oh, Music! Divine Music! What power thou hast over the soul!

There came over her face an expression which I never saw before; one of peace ineffable—the peace that passeth understanding. Ah me! I seemed to draw her to myself. For she rose and walked toward me. And a great calm came over my own soul. My Cremona spoke of peace—soft, sweet, and deep; the profound peace that dwelleth in the soul which has its hope in fruition. The tone widened into sweet modulation—sweet beyond all expression.

She was so close that she almost touched me. Her eyes were still fixed on mine. Tears were there, but not tears of sorrow. Her face was so close to mine that my strength left me. My arms dropped downward. The music was over. She held out her hand to me. I caught it in both of mine, and wet it with my tears.

"Paolo," said she, in a voice of musical tone; "Paolo, you are already one of us. You speak our language."

"You have taught me something which flows from love—duty. Yes, we will labor together; and they who live on high will learn even in their radiant home to envy us poor mortals."

I said not a word, but knelt; and holding her hand still, I looked up at her in grateful adoration.

November 28.—For the last three months I have lived in heaven. She is changed. Music has reconciled her to exile. She has found one who speaks, though weakly, the language of that home.

We hold together through this divine medium a lofty spiritual intercourse. I learn from her of that starry world in which for a brief time she was permitted to dwell. Her seraphic thoughts have become communicated to me. I have made them my own, and all my spirit has risen to a higher altitude.

So I have at last received that revelation for which I longed, and the divine thoughts with which she has inspired me I will make known to the world. How? Description is inadequate, but it is enough to say that I have decided upon an Opera as the best mode of making known these ideas.

I have resorted to one of those classical themes which, though as old as civilization, are yet ever new, because they are truth.

My Opera is on the theme of Prometheus. It refers to Prometheus Delivered. My idea is derived from her. Prometheus represents Divine Love—since he is the god who suffers unendurable agonies through his love for man. Zeus represents the old austere god of the sects and creeds—the gloomy God of Vengeance—the stern—the inexorable—the cruel.

Love endures through the ages, but at last triumphs. The chief agent in his triumph is Athene. She represents Wisdom, which, by its life and increase, at last dethrones the God of Vengeance and enthrones the God of Love.

For so the world goes on; and thus it shall be that Human Understanding, which I have personified under Athene, will at last exalt Divine Love over all, and cast aside its olden adoration of Divine Vengeance.

I am trying to give to my Opera the severe simplicity of the classical form, yet at the same time to pervade it all with the warm atmosphere of love in its widest sense. It opens with a chorus of seraphim. Prometheus laments; but the chief part is that of Athene. On that I have exhausted myself.

But where can I get a voice that can adequately render my thoughts—our thoughts? Where is Bice? She alone has this voice; she alone has the power of catching and absorbing into her own mind the ideas which I form; and, with it all, she alone could express them. I would wander over the earth to find her. But perhaps she is in a luxurious home, where her associates would not listen to such a proposal.

Patience! perhaps Bice may at last bring her marvelous voice to my aid.

December 15.—Every day our communion has grown more exalted. She breathes upon me the atmosphere of that radiant world, and fills my soul with rapture. I live in a sublime enthusiasm. We hold intercourse by means of music. We stand upon a higher plane than that of common men. She has raised me there, and has made me to be a partaker in her thoughts.

Now I begin to understand something of the radiant world to which she was once for a brief time borne. I know her lost joys; I share in her longings. In me, as in her, there is a deep, unquenchable thirst after those glories that are present there. All here seems poor and mean. No material pleasure can for a moment allure.

I live in a frenzy. My soul is on fire. Music is my sole thought and utterance. Colonel Despard thinks that I am mad. My friends here pity me. I smile within myself when I think of pity being given by them to me. Kindly souls! could they but have one faint idea of the unspeakable joys to which I have attained!

My Cremona is my voice. It expresses all things for me. Ah, sweet companion of my soul's flight! my Guide, my Guardian Angel, my Inspirer! had ever before two mortals while on earth a lot like ours? Who else besides us in this life ever learned the joys of pure spiritual communion? We rise on high together. Our souls are borne up in company. When we hold communion we cease to be mortals.

My Opera is finished. The radiance of that Divine Love which has inundated all the being of Edith has been imparted to me in some measure sufficient to enable me to breathe forth to human ears tones which have been caught from en gold—unruffled—undisturbed in that dead calm.

My Opera begins with an Alleluia Chorus. I have borrowed words from the Angel Song at the opening of "Faust" for my score. But the music has an expression of its own, and the words are feeble; and the only comfort is, that these words will be lost in the triumph strain of the tones that accompany them.

She was with me, exulting where I was exultant, sad where I was sorrowful; still with her air of Guide and Teacher. She is my Egeria. She is my Inspiring Muse. I invoke her when I sing.

But my song carried her away. Her own thoughts expressed by my utterance were returned to her, and she yielded herself up altogether to their power.

Ah me! there is one language common to all on earth, and to all in heaven, and that is music.

I exulted then on that bare, blasted rock. I triumphed. She joined me in it all. We exulted together. We triumphed. We mourned, we rejoiced, we despaired, we hoped, we sung alleluias in our hearts. The very winds were still. The very moon seemed to stay her course. All nature was hushed.

She stood before me, white, slender, aerial, like a spirit from on high, as pure, as holy, as stainless. Her soul and mine were blended. We moved to one common impulse. We obeyed one common motive.

What is this? Is it love? Yes; but not as men call love. Ours is heavenly love, ardent, but yet spiritual; intense, but without passion;

"I DID NOT MAKE ANY REPLY, BUT TOOK MY CREMONA, AND SOUGHT TO LIFT UP ALL MY SOUL TO A LEVEL WITH HERS."

immortal voices. She has given me ideas. I have made them audible and intelligible to men.

I have had one performance of my work, or rather our work, for it is all hers. Hers are the thoughts, mine is only the expression.

I sought out a place of solitude in which I might perform undisturbed and without interruption the theme which I have tried to unfold.

Opposite my house is a wild, rocky shore covered with the primeval woods. Here in one place there rises a barren rock, perfectly bare of verdure, which is called Mount Misery. I chose this place as the spot where I might give my rehearsal.

She was the audience—I was the orchestra—we two were alone.

Mount Misery is one barren rock without a blade of grass on all its dark iron-like surface. Around it is a vast accumulation of granite boulders and vast rocky ledges. The trees are stunted, the very ferns can scarcely find a place to grow.

It was night. There was not a cloud in the sky. The moon shone with marvelous lustre.

Down in front of us lay the long arm of the sea that ran up between us and the city. On the opposite side were woods, and beyond them rose the citadel, on the other side of which the city lay nestling at its base like those Rhenish towns which lie at the foot of feudal castles.

On the left hand all was a wilderness; on the right, close by, was a small lake which seemed like a sheet of silver in the moon's rays. Farther on lay the ocean, stretching in its boundless extent away to the horizon. There lay islands and sand-banks with light-houses. There, under the moon, lay a broad path of golden light—molt-a burning love like that of the cherubim; all-consuming, all-engrossing, and enduring for evermore.

Have I ever told her my admiration? Yes; but not in words. I have told her so in music, in every tone, in every strain. She knows that I am hers. She is my divinity, my muse, my better genius—the nobler half of my soul.

I have laid all my spirit at her feet, as one prostrates himself before a divinity. She has accepted that adoration and has been pleased.

We are blended. We are one, but not after an earthly fashion, for never yet have I even touched her hand in love. It is our spirits, our real selves—not our merely visible selves—that love; yet that love is so intense that I would die for evermore if my death could make her life more sweet.

She has heard all this from my Cremona.

Here, as we stood under the moon, I thought her a spirit with a mortal lover. I recognized the full meaning of the sublime legend of Numa and Egeria. The mortal aspires in purity of heart, and the immortal comes down and assists and responds to his aspirations.

Our souls vibrated in unison to the expression of heavenly thoughts. We threw ourselves into the rapture of the hour. We trembled, we thrilled, till at last frail mortal nature could scarcely endure the intensity of that perfect joy.

So we came to the end. The end is a chorus of angels. They sing the divinest of songs that is written in Holy Revelation. All the glory of that song reaches its climax in the last strain:

"And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes!"

We wept together. But we dried our tears and went home, musing on that "tearless eternity" which lies before us.

Morning is dawning as I write, and all the feeling of my soul can be expressed in one word, the sublimest of all words, which is intelligible to many of different languages and different races. I will end with this:

"Alleluia!"

CHAPTER XXVIII.

THIS MUST END.

THE note which accompanied Langhetti's journal was as follows:

"HALIFAX, December 18, 1848.

"TERESUOLA MIA DOLCISSIMA,—I send you my journal, sorella carissima. I have been silent for a long time. Forgive me. I have been sad and in affliction. But affliction has turned to joy, and I have learned things unknown before."

"Teresina mia, I am coming back to England immediately. You may expect to see me at any time during the next three months. She will be with me; but so sensitive is she—so strange would she be to you—that I do not know whether it will be well for you to see her or not. I dare not let her be exposed to the gaze of any one unknown to her. Yet, sweetest sorellina, perhaps I may be able to tell her that I have a dearest sister, whose heart is love, whose nature is noble, and who could treat her with tenderest care."

"I intend to offer my Opera to the world at London. I will be my own impresario. Yet I want one thing, and that is a Voice. Oh for a Voice like that of Bice! But it is idle to wish for her."

"Never have I heard any voice like hers, my Teresina. God grant that I may find her!"

"Expect soon and suddenly to see your most loving brother, PAOLO."

Mrs. Thornton showed this note to Despard the next time they met. He had read the journal in the mean time.

"So he is coming back?" said he.

"Yes."

"And with this marvelous girl?"

"Yes."

"She seems to me like a spirit."

"And to me."

"Paolo's own nature is so lofty and so spiritual that one like her is intelligible to him. Happy is it for her that he found her."

"Paolo is more spiritual than human. He has no materialism. He is spiritual. I am of the earth, earthy; but my brother is a spirit imprisoned, who chafes at his bonds and longs to be free. And think what Paolo has done for her in his sublime devotion!"

"I know others who would do as much," said Despard, in a voice that seemed full of tears; "I know others who, like him, would go to the grave to rescue the one they loved, and make all life one long devotion. I know others," he continued, "who would gladly die, if by dying they could gain what he has won—the possession of the one they love. Ah me! Paolo is happy and blessed beyond all men. Between him and her there is no insuperable barrier, no gulf as deep as death."

Despard spoke impetuously, but suddenly checked himself.

"I received," said he, "by the last mail a letter from my uncle in Halifax. He is ordered off to the Cape of Good Hope. I wrote him a very long time ago, as I told you, asking him to tell me without reserve all that he knew about my father's death. I told him plainly that there was a mystery about it which I was determined to solve. I reproached him for keeping it secret from me, and reminded him that I was now a mature man, and that he had no right nor any reason to maintain any further secrecy. I insisted on knowing all, no matter what it might be."

"I received his letter by the last mail. Here it is," and he handed it to her. "Read it when you get home. I have written a few words to you, little playmate, also. He has told me all. Did you know this before?"

"Yes, Lama," said Mrs. Thornton, with a look of sorrowful sympathy.

"You knew all my father's fate?"

"Yes, Lama."

"And you kept it secret?"

"Yes, Lama. How could I bear to tell you and give you pain?"

Her voice trembled as she spoke. Despard looked at her with an indescribable expression.

"One thought," said he, slowly, "and one feeling engrosses all my nature, and even this news that I have heard can not drive it away. Even the thought of my father's fate, so dark and so mysterious, can not weaken the thoughts that have all my life been supreme. Do you know, little playmate, what those thoughts are?"

She was silent. Despard's hand wandered over the keys. They always spoke in low tones, which were almost whispers, tones which were inaudible except to each other. And Mrs. Thornton had to bow her head close to his to hear what he said.

"I must go," said Despard, after a pause, "and visit Brandon again. I do not know what I can do, but my father's death requires further examination. This man Potts is intermingled with it. My uncle gives dark hints. I must make an examination."

"And you are going away again?" said Mrs. Thornton, sadly.

Despard sighed.

"Would it not be better," said he, as he took her hand in his—"would it not be better for you, little playmate, if I went away from you forever?"

She gave him one long look of sad reproach. Then tears filled her eyes.

"This can not go on forever," she murmured

"It must come to that at last!"

THE LOST JEWEL.

THE LOST JEWEL.

WANDERING one day, I found
A diamond, Giovanna.
I had roamed the world around
For that diamond, Giovanna!
Worth a monarch's diadem,
Princes envied me that gem—
Princes!—Ah!—Who envied them?—
Not I, Giovanna.

How I prized that precious stone!—
Kiss'd it, Giovanna.
A few brief months and it was gone!—
Lost, my Giovanna!
On another's hand it gleams,
With its sparkle pleased he seems;
But, alas! he little dreams
'Tis a diamond, Giovanna!

Oh, how much I envy him—
Him, my Giovanna!
Let but aught a moment dim
Its lustre, Giovanna,
From him lightly 'twould be tost,
Not one heart-pang him 'twould cost,
He would never know he lost
A diamond, Giovanna.

PERIWINKLE'S PLAN.

EVERY morning, at nine o'clock precisely, a team of mice pulled up before the palace door, and there stepped down, in prodigiously high-heeled shoes and leaning on a crutch nearly as tall as herself, the fairy who belonged to the royal family.

Not a soul, from the king and queen down to the smallest pink page, but hated the tap of that crutch, for this was a positive, perverse, pragmatic old fairy. She had been present at all the royal christenings ever since the days of the great, great, great, great, great, great, grandfather of the present king, and had never shown the slightest hesitation in turning any of these princelings into poodles and clocks and things of that sort. She used to insist on advising the king, and when he differed from her she had a way of saying, "Ah! that is just like your great grandfather, who grew as a pumpkin ten years in my garden." She lectured the queen about her linen and her maids; and if the queen pouted—

"My dear," she would cry, with a malicious twinkle, "if I ever transform you it shall be into a fan; a lace fan with gold sticks and pink swan's-down; you are so pretty, my dear!" which made the queen hysterical and continually afraid that she felt herself turning into gold sticks; while she, that is, our fairy, used to rap the pages over the knuckles, and make little chills creep in their backs by telling them how she had whole papers of pins that were once pink pages like them—all of which was vastly unpleasant. But still the queen should not have laughed with her maids in the enchanted room; for when the fairy entered it again this is what she heard:

"With her hump
And her crutch
That goes thump, thump."

"What?" cried the fairy, stopping in astonishment.

"With her hump," repeated the snuffers, tittering.

"And her crutch," suggested the poker.

"That goes thump! thump! ha! ha!"

roared the fire.

"Always prying and meddling," twanged the harp.

"She should see herself as others see her," said the mirror.

"Turning people into pumpkins and expecting them to be grateful," cried the easy-chair.

"If I had my way I would turn her out of the palace," squeaked the door.

"Yes, indeed," answered the curtains, and the vases, and even the fine threads in the carpet.

All of which would have been intolerable impertinence, only the fairy's enchanted room was simply a chamber of echoes, which with its furniture repeated over and again whatever had been said in it till Periwinkle (that was the fairy's name) came to hear it.

"Mighty well," said Periwinkle, grimly.

"I shall be sure to be at the christening."

This was the christening of the king's only son, who laid in state in a golden cradle; and I dare say if you had seen him you would have said that he was ugly, for, being very young, he was as red as a tomato, and had no nose worth mentioning. But all the courtiers declared that he was the finest prince in the world, and every body came to see him. With the rest came Periwinkle.

She was so smiling that you could never have supposed that any thing was wrong. But She Wore Her Yellow Cap!

Now when she wore that, as all the world knows, she was in a frightful humor.

"Periwinkle has her yellow cap on," whispered my Lord High Fiddlestick to the queen.

"Dear me! what can have happened?" answered the queen, guiltily remembering what she had said in the enchanted room. "I hope she won't wish something dreadful for the baby."

"A very fine child!" pronounced the fairy, in a high, squeaking voice, stepping to the foot of the golden cradle. "And he shall always be prosperous, on condition that he is never improved or told that he has done any thing wrong."

"Always prosperous! Oh, you dear, good Periwinkle!" cried the queen, in rapture; and she could not thank the fairy sufficiently, although Periwinkle only answered her by leaning on her crutch and bursting into fits of shrill laughter.

All the wisest men in the kingdom were engaged as masters for the young prince as soon as he could learn. And, first, the man who wrote all the dictionaries in those days, and understood all languages, even to that of the birds, came to teach him his alphabet.

"A," said the wise man.

"A," said the prince.

"B," said the wise man.

The prince said nothing.

"B, your royal highness."

The prince ran away and began to chase the queen's lap-dog.

"Your royal highness must come back," the wise man was going to say, but the queen clapped her hands over his mouth.

"Good Heavens! my dear Mr. Dictionary, don't you know that the prince must never be reproved, or told that he has done wrong? You must wait till the prince chooses to come back."

The wise man waited till dark and then went away in a huff; and there was an end of learning the alphabet till, six months after, the prince said:

"I want to see the man who says 'A.'"

The wise man came at once, and repeated the alphabet, the prince repeating it after him. Then he began to ask the letters, one by one, till he came to "F."

"That is K," said the prince.

"Oh no!" the wise man was about to say, when he saw the king and queen and the Lord High Fiddlestick all beckoning to him in a great fright.

"Don't you know," they said to him, "that the prince must never be told that he is wrong?"

The man of dictionaries was silent, and the prince finished the alphabet in an hour, and went on to the spelling-book. This kept him busy only a week. It is true that he spelled dog cat, and book cow, and chair fool. But he reached the end while another child would have been puzzling over the first three pages; and surely you can not deny that here was fine getting on? Before you could think he was ready for geography, and they sent for the greatest traveler in the world, who had seen all the countries of the world himself.

He came at once—for he was charmed with the honor—and gave the prince a lesson. On the second day operations commenced in good earnest.

"Be pleased to bound China," commenced the traveler.

"China," answered the prince, "is bounded on the north by New York, on the south by Japan, on the east by the Alps, and on the west by the North Pole."

The great traveler opened his eyes and mouth wide; but the queen interrupted him before he could speak a word.

"You must not tell the prince that he is wrong," she whispered; and after that the great traveler became very silent, and the prince learned geography as rapidly as he had done spelling.

With arithmetic he got on even better. They brought the prince a man who was so clever that he actually thought in figures. But as he lived among his books he knew nothing of what was going on in the world; and when the prince told him that "twice two are five," he cried out bluntly, "Oh no! your royal highness!" which might have produced dreadful consequences if the Lord High Fiddlestick had not instantly twisted his handkerchief about old multiplication-table's mouth, and dragged him off before the prince could hear what he said.

As it was the queen fainted, and the shock to the whole court was so great that it was agreed that the prince should make no further attempts on arithmetic, but that his majesty should issue a decree ordering "that the prince should have a perfect knowledge of figures," which would answer quite as well, it was thought.

This method of education was an easy one for the prince, but you can hardly imagine in what continual trouble were his attendants and instructors. He was the most disagreeable boy in the world. He had never been instructed in civility, because no one could say to him, "You must not do that." He howled, sang, stamped, whistled, and ran up and down in the church itself. He danced on the table if he had a mind. He threw the gravy in the king's face if he had a mind. He jumped into the water when he pleased, and people were obliged to fish him out, for of course he could not be taught to swim, as no one could say to him, "No; it must be done in this way." For the same reason he could never learn to sing or to dance or to drive. There never was such an oaf, such a block-head, nor yet such a destroying fire! such a whirlwind of mischief!

One day he imagined that it would be fine to build a bonfire in the audience-room of the palace, and began to pile the furniture together. His guards ran for the queen.

"My stars!" cried the queen, when she saw what he was about; "send for the king."

"Good gracious!" roared the king; "call the council!"

"Oh, what shall we do!" exclaimed the queen.

"He will burn up the palace, but nobody must tell him that he is doing wrong."

The councilmen wagged their long beards, but said nothing—for what could they say?

The prince lighted the fire.

"Send for the fire-engines," shouted the king, as the smoke began to roll through the palace.

"Oh, my boy! he will be burned!" screamed the queen, and running to the prince she began to coax him to come out.

"Won't! won't!" said the prince. "Want to see pretty bonfire!" For, though naturally clever, having never learned that he could hurt himself or any body else, this prince was little better than an idiot. And he sat there laughing, while the flames crackled over his head, and the queen and council screamed at him, and the councilmen lost their beards, and the prince his eyebrows, and the palace burned down with all its treasures, and the royal family stood shivering in the snow; and they do say that Periwinkle was peeping at them from a chimney near by, and laughing till the tears ran down her face, though I never believed it myself. But however that may be, you see that such a proceeding was highly inconvenient; and there were plenty of people who hinted that it was a pity that the prince should have lost nothing but his eyebrows.

Now in a neighboring kingdom lived a princess who was said to be so clever and so beautiful that our prince fell in love with the mere report of her accomplishments, and sent her the following letter:

"dere princes—I an goin to marry you nex weak so pleas com to my palos es sun es you kan."

"Prince-To-To."

This note he sent by a magnificent train of one hundred ambassadors, and, though the king and queen were sorry and ashamed enough, they dared not interfere. Accordingly it was brought with all due solemnity to the princess, who on reading it laughed heartily. But when on questioning the ambassadors they assured her that the prince had always been favored with the best masters, and when she heard that Mr. Dictionary had taught him the alphabet, and the greatest traveler geography, and that he had finished his spelling-book in a week, and learned arithmetic in an hour, and every accomplishment that could be mentioned in a year, she concluded that there must be some hidden meaning in this ridiculous note which she was not clever enough to find out, and decided to go and see the prince herself.

When the queen heard that the princess had actually returned with the ambassadors she was so much astonished and in such a flurry that she could not get her crown straight, and was obliged to go down with it very much over her nose, so that it tumbled off as she embraced the princess. She had hardly recovered from the confusion of this unlucky accident when dinner was served, and as the princess was hungry they sat down at once.

"But where is the prince?" asked the princess, looking about her.

"Booh!" squeaked somebody near her, and the prince, who had been creeping about on his hands and knees, sprang up, laughing.

"My love, this is the princess," said the queen, turning very red, and the princess got up, and made him a fine courtesy.

"Ess, I know! Come, marry me," returned the prince, sitting down, and commencing to carve at once.

The princess sat down also, blushing as red as the queen had done, and thinking to herself, "Marry you, indeed! Why he talks like a baby, and behaves like a savage!"

"Bring water! Don't want wine," exclaimed the prince, suddenly, and before any one could reach him he threw his glass filled with wine across the table. This, as you know, was an everyday matter, and certainly not so bad as a boat full of gravy, but then it came full in the princess's face. Her hair was dripping, her dress was ruined. Every body cried out, and the princess sprang to her feet.

"What's matter?" asked the prince.

"Matter!" cried the princess, spluttering and crying. "You are an idiot, Sir. You know nothing at all."

"She has done it! She has done it!" screamed all the courtiers together. "She has reproved him, and his prosperity is at an end."

The queen fainted, the princess ran away, and the court went into mourning.

Then every body asked "why the court was in mourning."

"Because," answered the wise ones, "the strange princess has reproved our prince."

"But why did she reprove him?"

Then followed the story.

"But how did she reprove him?"

Then the wise ones whispered that she had called him an idiot.

"Idiot! Why, bless me, so he is," answered every body. "I have always thought so, only I never put it in words before."

And by-and-by every body said to his neighbor: "The king and queen should have known from the beginning that a boy that was never corrected must be as ignorant and mischievous as an idiot. We will not have him for our king. Send him to school or to an asylum."

And then it was all over.

"ALL THE WISEST MEN IN THE KINGDOM WERE ENGAGED AS MASTERS FOR THE YOUNG PRINCE."

MY BRAHMAPOOTRA MANIA.

I AM about to make a confession, and that one of weakness. When a woman deliberately writes that she is weak-minded, and unfolds in the pages of Harper's Magazine her absence of strength, it is accounted a glory to her sex. How much more, then, should I be distinguished when a beautiful, and, let me add, exceptional, humility impels me to delineate for the good of mankind my Brahmapootra mania. It is with a feeling of regretful longing that I commence this sketch, which of necessity recalls to me the rainbow-hued months of my lost happiness—now, alas, empty egg-shells, without even a chirp of encouragement!

I am emphatically a tender-hearted man. From my boyhood a lame dog or sick cat was always sure of a hospital in my nursery, and a portion of my dinner. But it was unto chickens that my heart went out with a fullness of sympathy known only to those who have felt the same, and many a time have I responded with an inward crow of friendship to the exultant clarion of the morning chanticleer, while my arms beat the air in accordance with the flapping of his wings. The alarms of war never moved me as did his ringing note; no fair lady's eye beamed upon me like that of the little white bantam hen who looked knowingly up to my window; and the prettiest baby's charms faded into insignificance when compared with the soft yellow brood the aforesaid hen gathered under her wings. Not only were my nightly visions of the noble feathered race, but in my day-dreams I saw poultry-yards instead of the ordinary vulgar castle in the air, while, lord of their chivalry, strutted the kingly Brahmapootra rooster on which my heart was bent.

At this period of my existence I chanced on that most excellent notice which advises every young man in doubt about his future career to apply to that far-sighted being the phrenologist. Need I say that the advice was acted upon? A few scientific thrusts and passes betrayed to the savant my early tendency, and to my inexpressible joy he pronounced me chicken-hearted.

It was enough. The next day I went to survey places in the country with a special view to the erection of poultry-yards and coops, and was fortunate enough to find a broken-down shanty with an acre of ground, which I eagerly seized upon—I mean rented. The moving accomplished—and being a bachelor, with only a few dependencies of boys and dogs, it was not a work of time—I resorted to my pocket-companion, "The Poulterer's Complete Guide," on the plan of "The Youth's Letter-Writer," for my next step. It recommended a proper and comfortable residence before any inmates could be introduced, and to the fitting up of my new domicile I now turned my attention.

Not being affluent, and, moreover, somewhat cramped in my income by employers who had no sympathy with my enlightened views, it was necessary to proceed cautiously. I therefore devoted my evenings to the beautiful bower—in prosaic language, poultry-yard, I designed for my family. It was connected with the house by a private entrance, of which I carried the key, and which was tastefully decorated with nests suspended from the ceiling after the fashion of hanging baskets. Within doors, also, apartments were arranged for winter use, including a fine bath-room as well as a nursery for invalid and juvenile chickens. The walls, I should mention, were neatly papered in bright, cheerful colors, while appropriate chromos and engravings were hung to remind the hens, in the language of the immortal Nelson, that I expected every one to do her duty. A spacious piazza afforded them exercise in unpleasant weather, and a swing of the latest style tempted to gymnastic development.

And now that their home was completed I must have attendants to understand the wants of my pets, as well as the art of fattening them. I therefore inserted a thrilling advertisement in the Public Dodger, and awaited applicants. They came—a motley crowd, of all ages, sizes, and nationalities. I had never faced so many females before, and naturally felt diffident, but was much impressed with the ability of a decayed physician whose sands of life had nearly run out, but who nevertheless spoke so scientifically of the approved method of stabbing chickens in the ear for market that I was on the point of engaging his services. But fortunately recollecting that tenderness should mingle with the care of my family, I returned to my first intention, and accepted a Hibernian couple, who had been parents themselves, and would therefore be proper and affectionate ministrants.

On referring to the "Poulterer's Guide," the next recommendation was to set about forming a family, and I accordingly inserted notices in all the sporting papers, naming my place of business as the rendezvous. Two days after, when I arrived from the country, I found the bewildered gentlemen who had the honor of my services immersed in a crowd of hen-coops, amidst cluckings and crows innumerable—the sweetest music ear ever heard, but which, singular as it may appear, seemed totally unappreciated by the mercenary beings who listened to it. To explain was the work of a moment, and I then turned to my new acquisitions, hailing lustily from all quarters—North, South, East, and West. Having made the Brahmapootra rooster a specialty in my advertisement, I was happy in discovering that, although they were fearfully scarce, two fine specimens of that majestic race greeted my entrance with a note of recognition.

Expense was a secondary item—the chickens must and should be forwarded to my country seat, regardless of cost. All day long over my ledger I drew the little tracks of their innocent feet, and instead of greenbacks saw in imagination the glitter of innumerable golden eggs. What a petty thing seemed my city business when contrasted with the expanding, elevating influences of country life! I at once resolved it should become a secondary matter, and in course of time yield to the production of those noble creatures to which my existence should henceforth be devoted. What happiness on returning to the Hencoop, as I styled my residence, to be greeted by the chirping and cackling of three hundred fine birds! I no longer deferred the execution of a project I had for some time had in contemplation, but applied to the Legislature for permission slightly to alter my name. It was granted, and instead of the vulgar Adam R. Russia (R. standing for Robertson), by which I had so long been known, I rejoiced in the appellation of A. Rooster Russia, thus combining fashion with distinction. A Rooster Russia—The Hencoop. So my visiting cards were engraved, beautiful as suggestive.

Meanwhile I studied the "Poulterer's Complete Guide" with redoubled diligence, fed my family by its directions, and looked for great results. But the hens would not sit. Threats and persuasions availed not—the most comfortable nests were prepared, lined with small feather-beds, in order to render it easy for them, but they continued obstinate. They were evidently averse to taking upon themselves the responsibilities of maternity, and I knew not what to do. Beguiled by the porcelain eggs, in which I had largely invested, they were willing to lay, but further than this their infusion of Black Spanish blood would not be overcome. I almost regretted my discharge of the only man who had been able to hatch a brood of chickens, and whose secret of success I had accidentally discovered in a hen tied down to her business. But coercion could not be countenanced, and sooner than insist on their sitting I would give up my little chickens.

While reflecting on the subject a new and brilliant idea suddenly occurred to me. With my vast accommodations for their comfort, why not buy up the unfortunate ill-fed creatures throughout the country and fatten them for the hotels? They would thus enjoy a season of the flesh-pots of Egypt before the culmination of their inevitable fate, and at the same time that I bettered their existence I should make my own fortune. No sooner said than done. Hand-bills were printed setting forth the advantages of the Hencoop as a sanitarium for delicate chickens, and soliciting their attendance. At the same time I wrote to all the large hotels within a radius of a hundred miles, offering to supply them daily with as many thousand pair as they could digest, and requesting instant attention. Of course the answers were favorable and terms liberal, whereupon I purchased a cart and pair of mules, and traveled about gathering up my broods.

The Hencoop was filled to overflowing, and the Brahmapootras stalked about more majestically than ever, literally monarchs of all they surveyed.

I began to enjoy gay little suppers enlivened with chicken salad in all its forms, and made my dinners entirely off my farm, being especially partial to fricassees, which seemed to annihilate the pre-existence of the dish before me. In my breakfasts also I economized, faring by turns on boiled eggs, omelet, and scrambled eggs.

In a few days my first lot of chickens, for which I had paid twenty cents per pound, were fattened, killed, packed in the mule-cart, and sent off. My tender feelings would not suffer me to accompany them, and I therefore employed the day in sorting the feathers and drawing plans of the magnificent six-story building I intended to erect. Of course they would sell at an advance of at least ten cents on the pound, which, on a thousand pounds, would be one hundred dollars, and my mansion would soon be completed. The first-floor should be devoted to a grand hatching oven that the hens might no longer be compelled to exert themselves. By easy flights the little ones would then progress on the plan of our educational institutions to the completion of their course, until being perfectly fattened, guillotined, and dressed, they would delight the palates of the epicures and the pocket of A. Rooster Russia. I had just designed a neat hospital for the sick and afflicted when the mule-cart returned. But what news! The chickens were too late for any of the hotels, and after vainly scouring the city my faithful Isaac had disposed of them to a produce dealer for eighteen cents per pound.

This was totally unexpected, and I especially regretted the disappointment of the hotel keepers, but concluded to console myself by a visit to the poultry-yard.

Horror of horrors! Could I believe my eyes? Not less than ten chickens staggering, while three were in the last agonies of dissolution! Yes, it was the cholera! Some of the new-comers must have imported it. The chickens were identified, and I at once rushed to the residence of the wretch who had sold them to me. He had the impudence to deny it. I abused him. He reprimanded. I challenged him. He professed peace principles. I knocked him down; whereupon he threatened a lawsuit, and I returned in disgust to my family. The disease made sad ravages, and the nursery was full. I doctored them with alum, according to the "Poulterer's Guide;" they made faces as if it were bitter, kicked up their heels, and fell over. I sent for the physician whose services I had formerly declined, and whose sands of life were two months nearer running out than before. He charged ten dollars for coming into the country; said if I had summoned him at the outset he could have saved them, and gave me no hope. It became necessary to fence off a portion of the ground for a cemetery, and the funerals at which I officiated as chief mourner were continual.

But thus far the Brahmapootras had escaped. Every morning I visited them, noted the color of their legs, and the brightness of their eyes. They were my sole happiness. I no longer dared send my chickens to market, and my business friends declined seeing me in town for fear of infection.

So matters went on until a month ago, when the culminating point was reached. I entered their humble home to find my noble Brahmapootras stretched on the floor, side by side, in the last agonies of collapse. Their eyes rolled up at me; but alas! what could I do?

They are dead, and I am a broken-hearted man; broken, not only in spirit but in purse. The small remainder decrease daily, my six-story asylum has crumbled into ruins, innumerable bills for the poultry-yard and fixtures are pressing me, and the lawsuit comes on to-morrow. My wings are clipped, and I know not whither to fly, since my creditors obstinately refuse to consider it a philanthropic investment, and demand their money. The old women will not buy my feathers for their beds, because they declare them unhealthy, and I can not overcome their absurd scruples. I am sorry for the hotel-keepers, who will now be deprived of their eggs and chickens; but it is no fault of mine. If I only had the capital—but I am not the millionaire I expected, and my last resource is to start a gift-concert for the propagation of my noble end. I have always heard that crops are uncertain, but it seems to me none are more so than crops of chickens.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

FEBRUARY is not so bad a month after all, though few poets have sung its praises. To be sure, it is not the loveliest time of all the year for promenades; the bleak winds still whistle, and "snow-showers, far and near, drift without echo to the whitening ground." But then the lengthening days give pleasant promise of spring's approach, of birds and blossoms and grateful warmth; yet the nights are long enough to make February just the "season" for every kind of evening entertainment—balls, parties, masquerades, concerts, and operas, oratorios, readings, and lectures.

And here comes to mind a question which certain newspapers are discussing in an uncertain sort of way, namely: "Ought a lady to invite a gentleman to places of entertainment, such as theatres, concerts, lectures, etc.?" Without entering into an elaborate argument on the subject, we would simply say it is Leap-Year, and, according to an old and time-honored custom, ladies may propound any question they please to the gentlemen. Let them improve their privileges! But it is only fair to assure young ladies that if they take advantage of the unusual rights given by custom to them during this year of 1868, probably scores of billets, daintily written on tinted note-paper, will, when opened, read something like the following, which purports to be the mournful experience of a certain young man, whose name, for obvious reasons, shall be unmentioned:

"My income is $20 a week. My average expenses are for board and room, $7 60; clothing, $6; billiards, $2 50; drinks, $1 50; horse hire, $5; newspapers, 10 cents; washing, 25 cents; church contributions, 5 cents; total, $23. For the balance I draw on the old man. My washing bill last year was $48, but as my necessary expenses were so high I was able to pay only $13 of it. I would like to marry, but I can't support a wife."

Evidently in the above list of expenses cigars are accidentally (?) omitted. Of course they are! Why, even in a ladies' club which has recently been formed somewhere in Kentucky, knitting, billiards, croquet, cards, sewing-machines, liquors, and smoking are permitted. [N. B. Gentlemen are excluded from this club.] Consequently, it would be a strange anomaly to find a gentlemen's club destitute of cigars—and do not young men generally belong to a club?

Appropos, a certain lady who has little reverence for the inspiration drawn from Havana, writes in the following style:

"May never lady press his lips, his proffered love returning,
Who makes a furnace of his mouth, and keeps its chimney burning.
May each true woman shun his sight, for fear his fumes might choke her;
And none but those who smoke themselves have kisses for a smoker."

If any patron of the weed should vouchsafe an answer to such an implied rebuke it would probably be in a resigned and even cheerful strain, as:

"Farewell! I've yet one solace left which cheers my lonely hearth,
And in that thought a thousand hopes are springing into birth:
How beautiful the vision comes amid life's gathering cares,
In shape—a Champagne bottle and a box of fine cigars!"

Inventions are becoming more and more wonderful every day—or perhaps we should rather say discoveries. Chemistry has just revealed a new and cheap method of supplying smokers with an excellent imitation of meerschaum from potatoes. We should not venture to give this fact publicity in the columns of the Bazar except that by a similar chemical process carrots may be changed into a capital imitation of coral, which is just now a fashionable ornament.

The young ladies of Berwick, Maine, have performed a novel feat. Twenty of them went to a store, purchased a barrel of flour and other groceries, put them upon a hand-sled, and drew them to the house of their minister, greatly to the amusement of the people, and to the complete surprise of the pastor.

It is said that a gentleman in Springfield, Massachusetts, has (whether it is his own invention or not report does not relate), a wonderful machine which cuts meat and vegetables, sifts flour, kneads bread, works a grater, slices fruit, churns, works over butter, and scours knives. It is simple in construction, and has but four wheels, and yet does nearly every thing in the house-keeping line except scolding the servants and waiting on the table. It is certainly unfortunate that this gentleman does not give more definite information about his "machine." Other gentlemen might like a similar one if there are any more in the market; or does it cost too much to keep one?

Among the numerous blessings which are promised to us through the Pacific Railroad, when it is completed, is an abundance of fruit. Grapes of every variety are produced in California, and can then be sent East, early in the season, and at a moderate cost. It is expected that the demand will be enormous when the quality of the grapes becomes known. Figs, plums, peaches, pears, and quinces, also flourish there; and Oregon, it is stated, has not a rival in producing the apple and pear. So we may expect, in future years, to have our tables supplied with many kinds of fruit in the early summer months, before Eastern crops have matured.

The latest fashion from Paris is a nose-protector, lined with fur, for ladies. This novelty does not seem so strange and uncalled-for as we might at first suppose; for Parisians have been suffering the rigors of a semi-Siberian winter. Some declare that such a season has not been known there since the days of Julius Cæsar; others say that it was nearly as cold in 1840. At any rate, the turbulent little Seine has shown itself a miniature Arctic Ocean, cold and silent. Skating and sledging have been "all the rage" among the fashionables of Paris, who, from the Emperor and Empress downward, have thronged around the lakes of the Bois de Boulogne. For a while the Seine itself was the place of fashionable rendezvous, but one or two luckless individuals having fallen in and drowned themselves in spite of the ice, the authorities prohibited all further sporting there.

A miserable martyr, writing from Paris, gives a most forlorn account of the Parisian method of making, or rather of receiving, New-Year's calls. His experience may have been unfortunate, but he was ushered into exceedingly cold rooms, grand but cheerless, without a semblance of a fire. Here he sits shivering. Presently in comes a bonne, who bears with her two Lilliputian sticks, or rather splinters of wood, and proceeds to kindle them in an enormous fire-place; this was just for appearance sake, for no possible warmth could come from the sickly glare. Then comes in the mistress of the house and her daughters, wrapped up in heavy shawls, with blue-cold noses peeping out over them; and there all sit shivering, passing "the compliments of the season," and sadly watching the sickly and diminutive flame in the huge fire-place. No refreshments are offered, and altogether "calls" in a freezing Paris parlor are not attractive entertainment.

"I have noticed," remarks some unknown writer, "that a well-bred woman never hears an impertinent or vulgar remark." This art of not hearing at certain times is very conducive to one's personal and domestic comfort. Some people are very anxious to hear every thing that will annoy them. If they have a hint that any one has spoken ill about them they immediately begin to ferret out the particulars. They hear all the cross and scolding words that are uttered in the household; they take in all the tattle and scandal that is afloat abroad; they are ostensibly shocked by rude and vulgar sayings and innuendoes in various places. A discreet deafness saves one from much annoyance; shut your ears when something comes along that is not worthy to enter them; and when a tattling acquaintance insists upon dribbling out unacceptable scandal by hints and innuendoes, a moderate assumption of mental obtuseness will nip the thing in the bud. The retailer will regard you as hopelessly "dull," and let you alone.

Dr. Hays gives a pleasant picture of domestic life in a missionary's family in Greenland, and also a hint of Esquimaux fashions in dress. After finding his way to the parsonage he says: "I tapped at the door, and was ushered into a cozy little apartment by the oddest specimen of womanhood that ever answered bell. She was a full-blown Esquimaux, with coppery complexion, and black hair, which was twisted into a knot on the top of her head. She wore a jacket which extended to her waist, seal-skin pantaloons, and boots reaching above the knees, dyed scarlet, and embroidered in an astonishing manner. The room was redolent of the fragrant rose, and mignonette, and heliotrope, which nestled in the sunlight under the snow-white curtains. A canary chirped on its perch above the door, a cat was purring on the hearth-rug, and an unmistakable gentleman put out a soft white hand to give me welcome. It was the Rev. Mr. Anton, missionary of the place. Mrs. Anton soon emerged from a snug little chamber adjoining. Her sister came in immediately afterward, and we were soon grouped about a home-like table.

There are in Philadelphia six ladies who practice medicine, and have incomes varying from $2000 to $10,000. The highest income of a lady physician in New York is $15,000.

We have received by private letter a detailed account of a "masquerade" party recently given in Burlington, Iowa, which was pronounced "one of the happiest, pleasantest, and most complete ever enjoyed west of the Father of Waters."

The party was composed of the élite of the city, and among the spectators were several noted individuals, also visitors from abroad. The entertainments of the evening were various, and some of the performances decidedly unique. Among other celebrated characters Harper's Bazar was represented by a fashionable suit made from a part of each number since its publication. The most prominent fashion plates, specimens of needle-work and hair-dressing, cloaks, mantles, etc., and several of the largest pictures were so displayed as to make the suit very comical. The words "Harper's Bazar" were displayed on the hat and collar.

An adventurous young lady in Ohio lately captured a beaver, and also the man who was carrying it about on his head. Young ladies are given to such tricks.

RISE AND FALL OF CRINOLINE.

THE RISE AND FALL OF CRINOLINE.

VIII.

CRINOLINE IN THE COUNTRY.—“Only think!” exclaimed an old peasant one day, “my girl must be mad! I was up in my barn yesterday, and saw her in the middle of the yard take up a hen-coop, put it round her, and then stare round as proud as possible!” Whether the girl in question actually wore the hen-coop, or only tried it on, I do not know; but this much is certain, that in the country people sometimes wore home-made crinolines, constructed of reeds and osiers. It is probable that these did not fit quite so well as a patent hoop-skirt; but crinoline is the fashion, and Polly in the country will not be a whit behind her sister in town. Once she went about, to church or to the fair, as free and lively as possible: her neat woolen gown hung closely, and she could enjoy herself. Two years ago she appeared, as it were, stuck in the middle of a barrel, and walked up the narrow village street in perfect agony lest she should upset something on one side or the other. Her dress was too small for the hoops, and so it assumed the wildest shapes, and provoked her usually contented Jack to say, “You don’t look nice to-day!” And when she sat down, or rather tried to—for she generally had to give it up after sundry vain attempts—when, however, she succeeded in sitting, she probably broke her heart and crinoline at once, and had need of all her wit to avoid being laughed out of the room. Such were the troubles of crinoline in the country; and all arose, like the troubles of the frogs, from envying the superior dimensions of their town-sisters. But these huge skirts have now contracted, and the hoops of to-day only serve as a comfortable support to the clothing, without endangering all about them.

FACETIE.

A MINISTER, travelling through the West in a missionary capacity several years ago, was holding an animated theological conversation with an old lady upon whom he had called, in the course of which he asked her what idea she had formed of the doctrine of total depravity. “Oh,” said she, “I think it is a good doctrine, if people would only live up to it.”

A man from the Auburn prison says he left there all his admiration for auburn locks.

“Well, Pat, how goes your watch, does it keep good time?” said his employer to a native Hibernian, who sat gazing in admiration upon the face of a ten-dollar watch which he had won the previous night in a raffle. “Ah, faith, Sir, it’s the grandest thing I’ve e’er,” was Pat’s reply; “it bates time altogether. I regulated the sun by it this morning, and it was half an hour past it at sunset.”

AN ANIMATED MINERAL.—Dr. Living-stone.

The man who sang “O breathe no more that simple air,” went into the smoking car, where the air was more mixed.

A BORE.—The man who persists in talking about himself when you wish to talk about yourself.

1. The one who made It.

2. The one who sold It.

3. The one who bought It.

4. The one who carried It and others.

5. The one who received It.

6. What came of It.

A petite blue-eyed maiden, who was nursing her fifth Christmas doll, and listening to her mother and some female friends talking about domestic broils and divorces, created rather a sensation by remarking, “Well, ma, I’m never going to marry! I’m going to be a widow!”

A PLANT IN SEASON.—Now is the time of year when managers of theatres show a botanical taste, for there is not one of them who does not do his best to have a great rush at his doors.

“Ah, Jimmy,” said a sympathizing friend to a man who was just too late for the train, “you did not run fast enough.”

“Yes, I did,” said Jimmy; “but I didn’t start soon enough.”

PROVERBIAL PHILOSOPHY.—There is no place like home. Fallacious. If your home is in a row of houses, it is probable that the home of your neighbors will be very like yours.

FARM NOTES.

How to Winnow Corn. 1st Method.—Get some corn. Get somebody who knows how to winnow it. Let him do it.

2d Method.—If you know all about it, do it yourself.

3d Method, for Beginners, given in Agricultural Terms.—Place a steward near the blower, and let him drive the blower while the hopper is filled with a large wecht. (This is called the system of Hop-eration.) Then let a woman with a small wecht slide down on a wheel crushing the blower with her shoes. This should be done in a neat, cleanly way until the scum has been swept with a besom through a wire screen, while another lot goes on riddling, when it is the duty of the fauner to answer each riddle as it comes out. The fanner’s chief work is, however, to prevent any laborer becoming too hot. When a laborer is very warm, he sits down before the fanner, who soon restores him to coolness.

Treatment of Fowls in Winter.—Roast them.

Breakfast.—Always visit your poultry-yard before breakfast. If unable to find a fresh egg, go to the cattle-sheds. Remember that, where eggs can not be obtained, a yoke of fine ox(h)en beaten up with a cup of tea is most invigorating.

A HARMLESS DEATH.—Drowning in tears.

A pert little girl boasted to one of her little friends that her father kept a carriage. “Ah, but,” was the triumphant reply, “my father drives an omnibus!”

An editor says he has given 20,000 dollars for a race-horse in order that he may catch defaulting subscribers. Another, having heard that drowning men remember every event of their lives, advises his subscribers to bathe in deep water.

CAUTION TO TRAVELERS.—As every body in France nowadays is able to converse fluently in English, the best thing that our countrymen can do when they don’t want to be understood by Frenchmen is to speck in French!

A clergyman being much pressed by a lady of his acquaintance to preach a sermon the first Sunday after her marriage, complied, and chose the following passage in the Psalms as his text, “And there shall be abundance of peace—while the moon endureth.”

General Phil. Sheridan’s engagement to Miss Grace Hilton is called a Grace-Phil alliance.

WANTED TO KNOW.—What kind of ropes are used by a thimble-rigger? How many knots an hour can a parson tie? The difference between minding the train and training the mind? Whether the lion of a party has any thing to do with the dandelion? Whether a funeral carriage is an inky-bus? Whether one is (h)unted who receives daily visits from his mother’s sister?

DYING PRAYER OF A DOG.—Guide my bark.

A genius out West, who wished to mark a half-dozen new shirts, marked the first one John Jones, and the rest ditto.

Of what trade is the sun?—A tanner.

A girl, presenting herself for a situation at a house “where no Irish need apply,” in answer to the question where she came from said, “Sure, couldn’t ye perseeve by me accint that it’s Frinch I am?”

THE ONLY SAFETY MATCHES.—Rich marriages.

A gentleman fond of using high-flown language sometimes made very laughable mistakes. He had the honor of presiding at a Sunday-school celebration, and, after one of the speeches, he addressed the audience, telling them that they would now have “some vocal music on the brass band!”

What can you not name without breaking it?—Silence.

A German applied to Judge Stroud to be relieved from sitting upon a jury. “What is your excuse?” said his Honor. “I can’t speak English,” was the reply. “You have nothing to do with speaking,” said the Judge. “But I can’t understand good English.” “That’s no excuse,” replied the Judge. “You are not likely to hear good English at this bar.”

One Jeames Flaherty was brought up before a magistrate for marrying six wives. The magistrate asked him, “How he could be so hardened a villain?” “Please your worship,” says Jeames, “I was trying to get a good one.”

A couple in Louisville celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of their wedding a few days ago. During all that time they had never spoken crossly to each other. They are both deaf and dumb.

A Portuguese mayor enumerated among the marks by which the body of a drowned man might be identified when found, “a marked impediment in his speech.”

DINNER PARTIES.

THE following hints on the art of dining may be valuable to the dinner-giving portion of the public:

The dining-room should be cheerful. The candelabra should hold the light well above the heads of the guests. The curtains should be rich and ample. The table should be a picture of bright, well-adjusted colors. The glass should be light as bubbles.

The rule has been laid down that there should invariably be four glasses to the right of each diner; the Madeira glass nearest to the table's edge, then the Bordeaux glass to the right, the water glass to the left, with the Champagne glass for the crown of the array. Special glasses appear, of course, with particular wines. Finger-bowls are handed by the servants after the fish and the dessert.

There are two, and only two, modes of serving a dinner, viz.: in the pure French style, or à la Russe.

The French style is the best when the guests are few, and are close friends. The dishes to be consumed appear in three services, or relays, upon the table. This method entails great responsibility on the host; let him be a poor carver and the dinner is spoiled. Dinner served in the French method is divided into three categories or services. The first service comprises the soup, hors d'œuvres, relevés, and entrées; the second the roasts, vegetables, and sweet dishes; the third is the dessert. All the dishes appear upon the table.

A la Russe means a table tastefully adorned with flowers and fruits, and the triumphs of the confectioner's art—indeed, all the cold dishes. The hot dishes are served, carved apart, to the guests.

The French régime is the more comfortable, under the foregoing conditions, when the party is a small, friendly one; but à la Russe is the régime when a banquet of state or ceremony is to be served.

The Order of Service.—1. The soups. 2. The hors d'œuvres. 3. Relevés of fish. 4. Relevés of meat. 5. Hot entrées, of meat, fowl, and game. 6. Cold entrées. The punch, or sorbet Romain, is invariably served immediately before the roasts. 7. Roasts of fowl and game.

8. Salad. 9. Entremets of vegetables. 10. Sweet entremets.

After the confectionery the table is swept clear, and the dessert follows, and is served in the following order: 1. Cheeses. 2. Fruits. 3. Cakes. 4. Sweetmeats. 5. Ices.—Coffee and Liqueurs.

Wines.—After the soup: Madeira, Sherry, Vermouth (with the oysters, if they open the dinner, Chablis), Sauterne, accompanying the hors d'œuvres. Bordeaux and Burgundies with the relevés and hot and cold entrées. Between the cold entrées, and at the moment for serving the sorbets: Château d'Yquem, and very lightly iced Rhenish wines. With the roasts, and thenceforth to the disappearance of the vegetables, Burgundies (Romanée-Conti, Chambertin, etc.) and Bordeaux (Lafitte, Margaux, Haut-Brion, etc.). With the sweets: Sherry. With the dessert: white and red Muscat, Constantia, Tokay, etc. These wines should be carried round in glasses. Champagne may appear at intervals through the banquet.

HOME AND EVENING DRESSES.

FOUND DEAD IN THE STREET.

I.

THE labor is over and done,
The sun has gone down in the west,
The birds are asleep every one,
And the world has gone to its rest;
Sleepers on beds of down,
'Neath cover of silk and gold,
Soft, as on roses new-blown,
Slept the great monarch of old!
Sleepers on mother's breast,
Sleepers happy and warm,
Cozy as birds in their nest,
With never a thought of harm!
Sleepers in garrets high,
'Neath coverlet ragged and old;
And one little sleeper all under the sky,
Out in the night and the cold!
Alone in the wide, wide world,
Christless, motherless he:
Beggings or stealing to live, and whirled
Like waif on an angry sea.

II.

The daisy looks up from the grass,
Fresh from the fingers of Night,
To welcome the birds as they pass,
And drink in fresh rivers of light.
Sleepers on mother's breast,
Waken to summer and mirth;
But one little sleeper has gone to his rest,
Never to waken on earth—
Dead—found dead in the street,
All forsaken and lorn;
Damp from the head to the feet,
With the dew of the sweet May-morn!

III.

Dead—for the want of a crust!
Dead—in the cold night-air!
Dead—and under the dust,
Without ever a word of prayer;
In the heart of the wealthiest city
In this most Christian land,
Without ever a word of pity,
Or the touch of a kindly hand!

DANCING.

THE English philosopher Locke, in his Treatise on Education, says: "Dancing, being that which gives graceful motion to all our limbs, and, above all things, manliness and a becoming confidence to young children, I think, can not be learned too early. Nothing appears to me to give children so much confidence and behavior, and so to raise them to the conversation of those above their years as dancing."

Dancing is the harmony of motion, and there seems no good reason why the modulation of the limbs shall not be indulged in as well as that of the voice. King David not only sang but danced in praise and thanksgiving. Some learned Biblical commentators hold that each psalm had its appropriate choral dance as well as music; and in most religions the feet have occasionally united with the voice in the performance of worship.

No one, we suppose, in these liberal days, strenuously opposes dancing if properly regulated, which it seldom is. Our young folks, encouraged by their genteel mammas, cultivate it as diligently as if they thought, with the dancing-master in Molière's comedy, that, though philosophy might possibly be something, there was nothing so necessary to mankind as dancing. It is well, perhaps, that our little masters and misses should subject their flexible feet and limbs to a course of lessons under the fiddle-bow of the dancing-master, and keep themselves in training by an occasional quadrille or waltz. They may thus learn to walk their genteel parts in life with a more assured ease and grace. We can not, however, see the necessity of dancing the German from midnight to four o'clock in the morning, six days out of the seven of each week. On the contrary, it is quite apparent to us that this is an excess which is wholesome neither for body or mind. It is debauchery, not social enjoyment, and while it may be favorable to freedom of communion and ease of manners, is conducive neither to a graceful address nor a decorous behavior. The want of respectful reserve between our young people of both sexes, their interchange of slang phrases, their audacious and dangerous flirtations, and their defiance of the prudent restrictions of home, are some of the vicious results of this prevalent abuse of dancing.

The ill effect upon the physical health of this debauchery is no less apparent. In our working community there are but few if they dance all night can sleep all day, for most of the gay cavaliers of the evening are the busy drudges of the morning. Our youthful damsels, it is true, by the mistaken indulgence of their parents, can, if their excited nerves will let them, doze away as many of the twenty-four hours as they please, but their partners can not, for they are wanted for the most part at the shop and counting-house. The mere loss of sleep, whose recuperative influence is especially necessary to youth, must be a serious damage to the health of the young gallants who strive to comply with the requirements both of fashion and business.

Dancing is a gentle exercise, favorable to the health and graceful development of the body, but, like all physical exercises, must be pursued at seasonable times and under such circumstances as are dictated by nature, or it will become hurtful. With every additional movement of the limbs the respiration is increased, and the lungs take in a larger supply of air; and this, if not pure, will act upon the system with the virulence of a poison. We need hardly say, what must be obvious to every one who has breathed it, that the atmosphere of the crowded ball-room is not in the condition suitable to health. The apartment is necessarily closed to the severe cold of the winter, and each one of the dense throng which usually gathers at these fashionable dancing-parties is breathing fast under the general agitation of the dance and excitement. The pure air which may have at first existed is sucked up at once, and all having eagerly consumed the vital element of oxygen it possesses send it back with the poisonous constituent of carbonic acid gas. The whole room thus soon becomes filled with an atmosphere so vitiated that to breathe the least of it is injurious, and certainly the less of it taken in by the human lungs the better. The dancers, however, by their quickened motion and necessarily increased respiration, are absorbing the most of the poison, while at the same time each one is adding to its virulence. When the air is impure the greater safety is in repose than in movement. Better no exercise at all than exercise in a poisonous atmosphere, such as must be breathed by our party-going beaux and belles six nights of the week out of the seven.

The exercise of dancing under these circumstances becomes a source, as we all know, of prostration and ill-health. No frequenter of the crowded ball will pretend that he or she, after a long night's indulgence in its debauchery, sleeps more soundly, awakes more refreshingly, and resumes the duties or labors of the day with a lighter step and a livelier spirit. Whatever, therefore, may be said in favor of fashionable dancing as a social element, it can not be justified as a healthful exercise.

LADIES IN THE CARS.

ONCE upon a time a lady neglected to thank a gentleman for giving her his seat in the car, and the whole generation of ladies have had to suffer for it ever since. The newspapers took up the offense; articles were written and sermons preached on its enormity; ladies hastened to disclaim their erring sister; and from that time forth gentlemen have felt it their duty to vindicate their rights and keep their seats, painful as it has been, with the spectacle before them of fragile women, young and old, with and without babies and bundles, frantically clutching at the greasy strap beyond their reach, and tottering and even falling at every stoppage of the car, but who perchance might fail to thank the giver for a seat if it were offered to them.

Now there is another side to the picture, as the gentlemen who have thus sacrificed their feelings to maintain their dignity will probably be glad to know. The ladies have accepted the present state of affairs to such an extent that, for the most part, if to their astonishment a seat is offered them, they are either overwhelmed in their expressions of gratitude, or hesitate so long in accepting it, that some ill-mannered fellow slips into the place and leaves both parties out in the cold. But if by chance a lady so far forgets that she is a lady as not to return thanks for a service rendered, should a gentleman therefore forget that he is a gentleman? What we think of this class of ladies we have already said; it is time to say something on the other side.

As a rule, a lady is not so well able to stand or to keep her balance in a jolting car as a gentleman, which fact gives her a prior claim to a seat. "But ladies have no business to get into a crowded car," it is said. Yet as from seven to ten in the morning, and from three to six in the afternoon, every seat in the city cars is usually taken within two blocks from the terminus, what else are the unfortunate to do who live beyond these fortunate limits, and are obliged to go abroad at hours so unseasonable for women?

"First come, first served; those who take the seats have the best right to them," it is said. Beggings your pardon, they have not. The cause of the evil is that the railroad companies swell their profits by running only half enough cars to accommodate the traveling public. Now, as the government of the country is in the hands of men, if they fail to make these companies fulfill their contract they should pay the penalty. When women share this responsibility they will be on an equal footing; but till that time they have the first right to seats in the cars by justice as well as by courtesy, while those who have the power, but dread the trouble of compelling the directors of the railroads to furnish the accommodations which they have promised, and for which they are paid, should have the obligation to do so enforced on them by bearing the consequences.

The courtesy for which American men have been so remarkable seems passing away without any equivalent. The demand for new rights for women, instead of bringing them new privileges, is made a pretext for taking away those already accorded. But as American men are of all others those who most truly respect and appreciate women, we are persuaded that these shortcomings arise only from want of due reflection, and merely need to be discerned to be corrected.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

A Letter to Augustus Edward, at Stewart's.

MY YOUNG FRIEND,—Did you observe an elderly gentleman who stood last Tuesday near the counter at which you were waiting upon Mrs. Tilbury? He was, I believe, what is called a quiet-looking gentleman, and he watched you closely for some time. I suppose, however, that you may not have remarked him, for his dress was not indicative of a promising customer; he had merely bought a pair of woolen gloves suitable for the season, and he had the air of one who did not move in the same social circle with Mrs. Tilbury. My dear Augustus Edward, that gentleman was your present correspondent.

As he stood there studying that illuminated chapter of human nature which is opened every pleasant morning at Mr. Stewart's noble warehouse—for no milder word seems to be properly descriptive—he saw many of the ladies whom, notwithstanding your natural suspicions founded upon his appearance, he does sometimes know, at least by name, and at a respectful distance. Any bright morning you may see them, as he might say, like beautiful birds moulting. They are changing their brilliant plumage. They are refining upon the rainbow. They are dainty and curious in gorgeous raiment. They are imagining future splendors and composing glittering triumphs. It is a pleasing occupation for an old bachelor to step in to Stewart's—to make little occasions for stepping in, and then, lingering and loitering, to see the lovely throng, and to behold the rustling of costly stuffs, and to behold the superb work of Lyons looms and of all the factories where airy stuffs are woven.

My dear Augustus Edward, I wish there were nothing else for the loiterer to see. I do not mean, just now, the poor women and children who hang around the door and wait to beg a penny of the sumptuous dames who step from cushioned carriages and sweep in to devise a softer and more ravishing attire—no, not these; but there are sights within, and it is to those that I propose to call your attention. It is a great temple of haberdashery, my good friend, and a very famous, in which you are a priest. Every body has a vague feeling that every kind of dry-goods which the human being may desire is to be found there. Moreover, there is a general conviction that not only is there every thing, but that every thing is in the fullest variety and of the lowest price. I hope this is so. I am sure it ought to be so; but however it be, the consequence of the belief is that every body, even an Old Bachelor, repairs to Mr. Stewart's to repair his wardrobe.

Now it makes very little difference how you and the other priests treat me. You may be as lofty and disdainful behind the counter as suits your fancy, and I will struggle with my mortification; I will endeavor not to be cast down, but will buy my gloves and stockings as meekly as be seems so unimportant a customer. But when a quiet, modest woman, who does not arrive in a carriage, but walks, and who does not wear a velvet cloak, but a very plain and cheap dress, steps to your counter and asks for some plain and cheap stuff—then, Augustus Edward, beware! Your manhood is upon trial! You are put to the proof. You will show whether your soul is dwarfed to the yard-stick or whether you are a gentleman.

Do you remember in Doyle's delightful "Mr. Pips his Diary or Manners and Customs of ye Englishe," the scene of the fashionable haberdasher's shop? Do you recall those superlatively elegant gentlemen in dress suits who are unfolding and illustrating the charms of dry-goods to the carriage company? Didn't it seem to you a dreadful fate, to become only a smirker behind a counter? Doesn't an honest clown who smirks in the ring seem a happier fellow? Well now, do you know, Mr. Augustus Edward, that the manner in which you waited upon Mrs. Tilbury showed that you are in great danger? You bowed down to Tilbury's bank account, not to Mrs. Tilbury, who is a silly, little, fashionable woman. You metaphorically knelt to the fortune which she represented, and it was a mean thing for you to do.

When she had swept along to the cloak department you had scarcely an eye or an ear for modest little Mrs. Trim, who wanted to see some little things; for you knew that Mrs. Trim is only the wife of Tom Trim, who is one of Tilbury's clerks. You treated her, you wretched little counter-jumper, as if you had been a condescending deity. It seemed to me, as I watched you, as if Mrs. Tilbury had thrown the refuse of her bad manners over you as she left, and you strutted like a lackey in his master's worn-out old clothes. What are you, that you do not treat every customer with equal politeness? I hereby inform Mr. Stewart that you drive custom from his doors. There are scores and hundreds of Mrs. Trims who never darken them, because they do not choose to endure your insolent manners. You care for nobody who is not what the vulgar call "carriage company;" but it is not from carriage company that the great fortunes in your business are made. They are made by the multitude of pennies, not by the occasional gold eagle. You are, therefore, not only no gentleman, but you are no business man; and when I thus mention your name to your employer, and state what I saw, he, I am sure, is good business man enough to send you about your business.

Your manners show what man you are; and the surly indifference with which you reluctantly answered every question of Mrs. Trim, and the half-contempt with which you showed her a piece of simple something as if it were intolerable to you to show any thing but brocade or marvelous lace, were insults. I saw the cheek of that dear young woman color. I knew the resolution she was taking in her heart never to expose herself to the insolence of such a coward again, and I should have liked to take you by the nape of the neck, friend Augustus Edward, and have walked you Spanish-fashion out at the door, and have dumped you in the mud and snow in the street.

Let me urge you to remember that some of the seedy people upon whom you wait—like me, for instance—have eyes and minds, and understand you perfectly. Don't be fine! You are a clerk, like Thomas Trim; but he keeps accounts of great transactions, while you, my friend, are hired to sell a yard of tape and a pair of thread gloves. Do it like a man, and it is an honorable business. Do it like a pop-injay, and every sensible person despises you. Being a clerk, don't you know that an intelligible free-masonry should bind you to Tom Trim and his charming wife? What is Mrs. Tilbury to you, or you to Mrs. Tilbury? You have a foolish fancy that you get some kind of reflected glory from serving so fashionable a woman. Indeed, and if her daughter Stella were grown would you be a suitor of hers? It is a free country—but would you be? What would your friend Mrs. Tilbury say of it? You have twelve hundred dollars a year, and Mrs. Tilbury's carriage and horses cost four thousand. I hope yours may cost five thousand some day, if you wish; but meanwhile you know that Mrs. Tilbury would as soon expect her daughter to marry the dustman as you. Show the brocades and satins and silks to her like a man, but don't show them like a toady and a ninny; and show the cheaper stuffs to Mrs. Trim with the same courtesy.

If you knew the value of good-manners you would be worth thousands of dollars every year to Mr. Stewart. You would make your counter so pleasant to every body that Mrs. Tilbury's Biddy would prefer to come to you, as well as her mistress; and you would discover that you cared very much less for purple and yellow scarfs with a large pin, when your kind words and ways proved you to be truly a gentleman. I beg you to try it. When you have read this letter—in which I hope I have made myself understood—and have reflected a little whether you do remember the elderly gentleman in rather well-worn attire, resolve that the next person who comes before you shall be treated as if he or she were Mr. Stewart walking through his vast house in disguise, like Haroun Alraschid through the streets of his capital.

Do this, and when Mrs. Tilbury comes remember that Tilbury's money came from his grandfather, and that his grandfather was of the kind who turn over with their cane bits of paper that they see lying upon the sidewalk. "Thrift, Horatio." And remember that all his money, and his house, and his vast expenses do not make him a gentleman nor his wife a lady. It will be of the greatest service to Mrs. Tilbury if she feels that one young man, at least, is not imposed upon by her magnificent pretension. It will help her to remember how much of her position she buys at Stewart's; and to consider in what way she may procure what can not be bought, and can therefore never be sold under the auctioneer's hammer when Tilbury may happen to fail. Augustus Edward, if you will do this, I shall see so pleasant a sight when I stroll in at Stewart's that my grateful heart will be sure to prompt me to drop a bright five cents into the hand of the little boy who lies in wait at the door of your temple.

Your true friend,
AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

BONNETS.

THE evening bonnets made by our leading milliners are of lace, of feathers, and of beaded tulle, made in very simple styles. Rows of point lace, with a cluster of flowers in front, are mounted on small frames. Lace medallions of various shapes, oval, diamond, and triangular, are prettily displayed over velvet of any light shade, such as pearl-gray, pink, and lavender.

Ornaments are placed directly over the forehead in the point formed by the curved diadem which is added to the Fanchon. Velvet and lace bows with ends are arranged high up on the back of the bonnet.

An elegant opera bonnet has a tulle foundation over which is a diamond-shaped medallion of point lace with long barbes at the back. A wreath of tea-roses of a pale, delicate shade forms at once a coronet and face trimming. Buds and tendrils droop at the side. A small spray nestles in the lace bow on the crown. Lace strings.

A Fanchon of tulle and marabout bands is adorned with scarlet coral on the forehead.

A pretty bonnet for a blonde is of beaded lace over tulle. A wreath of green berries and leaves frames the face, and is deeply pointed on the top. A wide fall of lace is caught under the chin by a bunch of leaves.

A bridal bonnet, made by the celebrated Madame Virat of Paris, is Fanchon shape, with a flaring coronet band pointed à la Marie Stuart. A wild-rose with frosted foliage is placed in the point of the coronet. Wide blond-lace falling from the back is wound in a careless twist at the sides, and fastened with a cluster of flowers similar to those on the forehead.

A bonnet of pearl-gray velvet is exceedingly small, scarcely three inches across the top. The veil, once considered an accessory, is really the principal part of this coiffure. It is mantilla-shaped, and of Chantilly lace. It is sewn on full at the back, falling down to the collar. The barbes forming the strings are in one piece with the fall. Velvet leaves surround the front.

A garnet velvet is Trianon shaped. Blond-lace of the same shade encircles the front. A gold and steel band for face trimming.

VELVET AND SATIN HOODS.

Fur-trimmed hoods are prettily made up for prices varying from $6 to $10. Those for evening wear are of white or blue or amber satin, quilted in small diamonds, with pearls introduced in the stitching, and bordered with ermine or swan's-down. Traveling hoods of black velvet are usually made in the Fanchon shape, with long lappels at the throat. They may be trimmed with Astrakhan, chinchilla, or mink. A pretty one of gray satin is bordered with gray Persian. These are found at the furriers instead of the milliners.

Fur gauntlets are now worn by ladies, resembling those used by gentlemen when driving; and are large enough to be drawn over a kid glove. Seal skin and white otter are most in favor for these. A hood, gloves, and boa of chinchilla are pretty suits for sleighing and traveling.

WALKING DRESSES.

Walking suits, with a single skirt simulating two, have given place to those with double skirts. Imported suits have the upper skirt formed into a small train which is to be looped up disclosing a gay petticoat beneath. The loops make heavy puffed festoons. Four buttons and loops are the simple accessories, or machinery, if you please, for festooning the long upper skirt: Black velvet dresses are worn over scarlet, blue, or green satin petticoats. Passementerie, jet, fringe, and satin piping ornament the velvet skirt. The satin may be either left plain or bound with velvet of the same shade, cut bias. Two or three narrow ruffles of satin are also used. Striped petticoats of very handsome materials, gros grain, alternating with velvet stripes, are fashionably worn. They are without trimming. Full suits of velvet are trimmed with fur. The Marie Antoinette mantle that we have before described is the newest style of wrapping. The redingote or Polonaise is still very popular. Short loose paletots have wide flowing sleeves, lined with satin like the under-skirt. Parisian ladies loop the velvet skirts of their walking dresses with a sash fastened at the middle of the back. Very gay colored sashes are worn, but those of black velvet are in better taste.

An entire suit of purple velvet has the under-skirt gored to fit plain. The upper skirt has more fullness, and a demi-train, but is quite short in front. This skirt is open at the sides, with wide sashes trimmed with netted fringe between the front and the back widths. A gored paletot, with closed sleeves, is bordered with bands of sable. Bonnet and muff of velvet also trimmed with narrow bands of fur.

A very elaborate walking dress is made with a petticoat of black velvet, untrimmed, and reaching below the ankle. A tunic-shaped over-skirt of black satin falls to the floor behind. The trimming is thread lace, sewn above the edge of the tunic, and headed by a beaded passementerie and cord-like folds of satin. In the house this skirt is left flowing, but is festooned for walking to form deep scallops. A tight-fitting velvet jacket, trimmed with passementerie and lace, has coat-sleeves and a long hood with two points that fall to the end of the jacket. Black velvet Fanchon, with a gilt band enameled in a Greek pattern. Folds of satin on the edge and front of bonnet. Mantilla veil of thread lace. Light tan-colored gloves striped with black.

A pretty dress of violet gros grain is worn with the new Marie Antoinette mantelet. This is a round cape in the back, with long, square tabs for ends crossing in front, and drooping at the sides. Bands of satin of a darker shade trim the mantle and the double skirts of the dress. Plain, high corsage and tight sleeves.

A Mentana red suit has a petticoat of satin, under a short skirt of gros grain of the same shade. This skirt is open at the sides, forming an apron front, and is caught together with rosettes. A loose sacque of velvet has a wide satin sash, tied behind. Trianon bonnet of velvet, with simple folds of satin for trimming. Kid gloves of Mentana red, with gilt studs on the back. A rich dress of black velvet has a plain skirt and long redingote, bordered with fine mink. Another, similarly made, is of black and gold plush, trimmed with satin bands, with points inserted on the lower edge.

VARIETIES.

A pretty domino, worn at one of the masquerades now so fashionable, is of blue satin. A square yoke is made to fit smoothly over the evening dress worn beneath. The rest of the garment falling from this yoke is gored in such a manner that it may be afterward worn as the skirt of a dress. It is loose, with a slight train, and is confined at the waist by a belt and sash. A ruche of white satin surrounds the yoke, sleeves, and skirt. A white satin hood attached to the neck is large enough to disguise the wearer most effectively.

A dinner dress of black moiré, with gored trained skirt untrimmed, has a low corsage with bertha and sleeves formed of puffs of black tulle, dotted with white. Folds of bias velvet separate the puffs. The waist is lined with buff silk.

Another of black corded silk at $10 a yard has a founce on all the widths but the front, headed by a trimming of black velvet embroidered with white beads. A tablier of the same, with fringe attached, ornaments the front width. Medallion of velvet leaves at the back and on the bosom. Epaulets and cuffs of velvet. Waist-lining of gray silk.

A mantilla paletot to be worn at a wedding reception, over a solid-colored silk, is of white guipure lace. It has scarf-like fronts and is very short at the back.

A ball dress in the pretty Pompadour colors is of blue tulle puffed and sprinkled at intervals with tiny buds of the tea-rose arranged in diamonds. The long tunic entirely formed of puffs is festooned at the sides with a vine of rose-buds and leaves beginning at the belt. Bertha and sleeves of puffs and rose-buds.

A new sash worn in Paris is made of gimp in which jet beads are interwoven. The sash hangs from the sides, is festooned into a sort of basque, and then falls almost to the edge of the skirt, where the ends cross and form a bow with long tassels. Bretelles for the shoulder accompany the sash.

Loose, square breakfast jackets are giving place to bodices with tight-fitting sleeves and a sash worn at the side. Another style has a small basque attached to the waist instead of a sash.

For courtesies rendered, thanks are due to Mesdames DIEDEN; FLAMMÉ; BAILLARD; MARCHAL; and FERRERO; and to F. W. LASKER'S SON.

PERSONAL.

THE QUEEN OF PRUSSIA has held a caucus of seventy ladies, chiefly the wives and daughters of commercial men, to consult with her respecting the best way to aid necessitous people. They finally settled down upon a bazar. That is precisely what the ladies of this country are doing—settling down upon THE BAZAR.

Mrs. JAMES ROBB (wife of Mr. R. of New Orleans), who recently died in this city, was the daughter of Rev. Dr. CHURCH, President of the University of Georgia. She was a woman of fine mind, fine heart, graceful and winning in manner, highly cultivated, and was blessed with all that could render life desirable. The gentlemen who acted as pall-bearers were ALEXANDER T. STEWART, General ROBERT ANDERSON, ROYAL PHELPS, WILLIAM REDMOND, General JAMES LONGSTREET, General ROBERT C. WOOD, and the Hon. JOHN E. WARD.

Mons. PAUL DU CHAILLUS is in such demand, both as author and lecturer, that there are efforts to counterfeit him. One publisher, on the back of a circular which laudably explains how people can cheat in making adulterated wines and liquors, advertises a book of "Discoveries in Africa, by the celebrated African explorer, M. de Chailue." The attempt to foist such a work on the public is a transparent swindle. There is no "celebrated African explorer named DE CHAILLUS;" nor would such a name be assumed were it not that the recent work of M. DU CHAILLUS, published by the HARPERS, is having a very extensive sale, and that his services as a lecturer are eagerly sought from all parts of the country.

Professor WHEATSTONE (och hone!) is about to be knighted in consideration of his great scientific attainments and of his valuable inventions.

When the Empress EUGENIE skates she leans on two gentlemen, adepts in the art. Recently she leaned half on Mr. RIGGS (of New York), and half on a member of the ERRANZ family; which was very nice for all three; at all events it was so regarded in Paris.

The Rev. Dr. BELLINGS, in one of his letters, soon to be published by the HARPERS, says that in Vienna the theatre is an institution of incredible importance, and the performances are the most familiar topic of conversation. "I was kept waiting to-day," he says, "while the manager discussed the merits of GOUNOD and WAGNER with a trio of earnest German visitors. The Court Theatre, a wretched place under the imperial roof, has a most refined and accomplished company, who act on the whole better than any company I have ever seen. The parquette is open to the public—but the boxes are all bought by the aristocracy, and they assemble as if at a family-party, to meet always the same people and enjoy society without any domestic trouble or expense. There is no extravagance of costume and no excess of beauty in these boxes."

Of the great French statesman, GUIZOT, much has been heard and written, but comparatively little has come to us of his personal history. His father was beheaded during the Reign of Terror; but the son was carefully trained by his pious and intelligent mother. He made his debut as a tutor in Paris. There he met Miss MENLAN, a young lady of rare worth and great distinction, who supported her family by her pen. In this task M. GUIZOT aided her in the most delicate manner, sending articles under her name to the journals in which she used to write. Some years later she became his wife. He is small in stature but noble in appearance. He has always been an early riser and an indefatigable worker, and though now eighty is as enthusiastic as ever. He lives at a beautiful country home, surrounded by his loving and admiring children and grandchildren. He is almost as famous for his oratory as for his writings.

Let opulent widows and spinsters emulate the action of Mrs. BRADLEY, of Peoria, Illinois, who has endowed a Home for the Friendless in that city with $60,000. Good interest of the heart will she receive for that investment.

The Archbishop of Vienna is the only person who day or night has the privilege of entering the Emperor of Austria's presence unannounced.

The Rev. Dr. MACLEOD, of Glasgow, one of the Queen's personal friends, who was sent out in some semi-official capacity to India by the British Government, has been listened to with great interest by his own countrymen, and, what is very unusual, by Parsees, Hindoos, and Asiatics generally.

Bishop SIMPSON, of the M. E. Church, recently delivered an address to the students of Mount Pleasant, Iowa, and pointing to Dr. ELIOTT, who was on the rostrum, said that nearly forty years ago he had walked eighty miles, carrying a little bundle of clothes, to become a student with the Doctor when he was President of Madison College.

This is the way they get together off in Maine. It was in North Ellsworth, at the house of Mr. DOLLIVER. First, was Mrs. CHASE, aged 90; then Mrs. WILSON, daughter of Mrs. CHASE, aged 66; then Mrs. BONZEY, daughter of Mrs. WILSON, aged 45; next Mrs. HASTINGS, daughter of Mrs. BONZEY, aged 24; and, last of all, the infant daughter of Mrs. HASTINGS—making five generations in a direct line.

Sir MORTON PETO, who is going through the English Court of Bankruptcy, proposes to resign his seat for Bristol on the reassembling of Parliament. The most expensive private dinner party ever given in this country by one gentleman, was that given at DELMONICO's by Sir MORTON some two years ago. The heavens above, the earth beneath, and the waters under the earth, were ransacked by CHARLES DELMONICO to make a feast for the Baronet—a wheel-baro-net, as some one remarked, alluding to his great railway exploits in the Crimea, for which the Queen laid her sword on his shoulder and said, "Arise Sir MORTON PETO."

Editor TILTON, of the Independent, was in Washington the other day, and exploited the following simple remark to a rather dull member of the House who, elevating his glasses to the gallery, said: "What would you do, Mr. TILTON, if you could not distinguish your friends in the gallery?" "Why, Sir," replied Mr. T., "I would try to distinguish myself on the floor!"

CHARLES KEAN, recently deceased, was a descendant of that Marquis of Halifax who, in the reign of the STUARTS, was "gifted with eloquence and a conversation overflowing with thought, fancy, and wit; an intellect fertile, subtle, and capacious; and the most brilliant and far-seeing man of his age." He left a natural son, HENRY CAREY, a successful dramatic writer, and the author of that song which for over a century has been sung by more persons than any other song ever sung—"God Save the King." The great versatility of genius which made Halifax seem an actor cropped out at last in making two of his descendants—both men of mark in their walk—real actors.

Mr. BLACQUE BEY, the new Turkish minister at Washington, is of English descent. His father entered the service of Turkey, and married a Greek lady. Mr. BLACQUE himself is a Roman Catholic, and was educated in Paris. His first wife was a daughter of the late Dr. VALENTINE MOTT, of this city. "Mr." BEY is a tall, fine-looking man, and a well-educated, polished gentleman; has an exalted opinion of our country, predicts for it a glorious future, and thinks the ladies of America "unexcelled in any part of the globe." That is "talking Turkey," at all events.

The young King of Greece begins his reign modestly. On the first Sunday after accepting the throne he surprised the Athenians by walking on foot to church, accompanied only by an officer. The ministers came out in their carriages with men in livery, but beholding the king on foot they descended and walked to church. A throne had been prepared for him which he refused to occupy, saying he wanted no parade in the House of God. He is unostentatious, and lives very plainly. He is only twenty-two, has chestnut hair, blue eyes, and a face expressive of amiability and good-humor rather than force of character. His queen, OLGA, is seventeen, plump, pretty, and very economical in her habits.

The French Emperor is becoming copious in person. At the last state ball he talked much with Minister DIX. And the style in which the Empress was dressed is concisely thus: "A dress of somewhat bizarre fashion, of white satin crossed with yellow bands of the same"—a costume which effectually distinguished her from all others by its extremely original though somewhat "loud" effect.

A notable man has just died in Paris—Père COQUEREL, for thirty years pastor of the Reformed Church in that city, and the head of its Presbytery. He was 73. He was elected to the Chamber of Deputies in 1848, when the celebrated heretic LAMENNAIS, and the equally celebrated Dominican LACORDAIRE were returned. The French Protestant clergy were not greatly attached to him on account of his leaning to Unitarianism, and his willingness to abate from principle for the sake of expediency.

Miss OLIVE LOGAN is to make her first appearance as a lecturer in New York previous to going West; subject, a theatrical one, of a humorous character. She will appear, we understand, in a costume unique and splendid, a novel feature in the lecture-room.

It is stated in private letters from Chicago that Mrs. LINCOLN's mind is so seriously impaired that her friends contemplate placing her in an asylum, where repose, kind words, and an effort to turn her thoughts into new and pleasant channels, may work a complete mental restoration—"a consummation most devoutly to be wished."

A young person of the name of CRAWSHAY has just come into a little property amounting to thirty-five millions of dollars. His father was the largest individual holder of the Three-percents in England. The young man has made liberal provision for all the relations not remembered by the old gentleman, who had recognized claims upon him.

Father HYACINTHE has got behind the scenes in Paris, and is agitating the minds of the artistes. Mlle. THUILLIER, one of the most celebrated actresses of that city, is about to take the veil at the Convent of the Carmelites, and Madame ARNOLD PLESSY is likely to follow her example. The former is remarkable for her graceful manner on the stage, and the peculiar distinction of her appearance. She has a charming voice and most pleasing intonation. The Church has made a conquest worth acquiring.

The Rev. Dr. HALL, a very eloquent clergyman from Dublin, who has recently become pastor of the Presbyterian church at the corner of Fifth Avenue and Nineteenth Street, was walking down town a few days since with the Rev. Dr. ROGERS. It was on Friday. As they were passing the church in University Place Dr. R. said, "Let us go in here a moment; this was Dr. PORTS'S." The sexton, a stalwart Irishman, happened to be sweeping and arranging the church for Sunday. Dr. R. said to him: "Well, I hope you have good congregations now."

"Not so large as we used to have, Sir," replied the sexton.

"Ah! I'm sorry to hear it. Why so?" "Why, you see, Sir, they've got a big Irishman up here at the corner of Nineteenth Street preaching to them, and he's running away with the folks; but they'll get tired of him before long, and then they'll all come back."

The parsons smiled a little smile at each other, and forthwith commenced talking of something else.

A noted Parisian wit, Baron R—, is just married. On returning from church he began to weep. "What is the matter?" anxiously asked his young bride. "I am a believer in predictions," he replied, sobbing. "Well?" "Well, a gipsy has foretold that I shall marry twice, and the idea of losing you fills my breast with sorrow!"

Mr. HENRY WARD BEECHER hit close to the bull's eye when he said: "Some people regard their pastors as they do their grooms—they are good to rub down their souls."

Something very odd about the HALL family in Patten, near the Vermont and Canada line. HALL has five children, and all have six fingers upon each hand and six toes upon each foot. The two youngest are twins, four years of age, and are ever so fat!

Excellent Mrs. TANKS has given some two cords of Dutch, French, and Latin books to the Wisconsin Historical Society—in all 4812 volumes. Society said: "Tank you, ma'am."

Mr. DOUGLAS TAYLOR has become associate editor and proprietor of the Sunday Courier. Mr. T. is Commissioner of Jurors, a Tammany Hall expert, shrewd, wise, and waggy, and one of the joys of the Manhattan Club. His ancestors were distant relatives of Bishop JEREMY TAYLOR, the "Holy Living and Dying" bishop, who had rather a rough time of it in the days of CHARLES I.; of TOM TAYLOR, the London diamondist; of "Old ZACH," and General DICK T., son of ditto—to say nothing of BAYARD, the traveler, Moses, the millionaire, and other great and notable TAYLORS, who by "brawn and brain" have fought their way to the front of personal, political, pecuniary, prose, poetical, or publishing prominence.

BISMARCK writes droll letters to a friend up north in Pomerania. A Conservative Society asked the Count for an explanation of his conduct, first, in abandoning the Conservative party; second, in allowing himself to be photographed with Mlle. LUCCA; and third, in having ceased to go to church. The Count replied bluntly to the first question; in reference to the second he says, alluding to very long delays that had occurred in certain negotiations: "At one time matters came to a dead lock, and life became so insufferably tedious that I did not know how to kill time. I went for a walk, met Mlle. LUCCA, whom I knew, and suggested to her that she should relieve the tediousness of our existence by giving a concert. 'Perhaps I will,' she answered; 'but only on one condition.' 'And what may that be?' 'That your Excellency will allow yourself to be photographed along with me.' 'With pleasure,' I answered; and this was the origin of the picture. I now leave it to you to judge whether you should cast a stone at me on this account." As for the Count's non-appearance at church, he explains that his doctor forbids him to attend divine service, as he has become so exhausted through working night after night that he is not equal to the effort. He adds that he feels this to be a great privation, and often prays in his own room for guidance as to what is best for the fatherland.

There are countries other than our own where the strangest "personals" find their way into print. The following has recently attracted the gossip of Paris. It is of an action now going on which must certainly find a place among future causes célèbres. A cab-driver named SCHUMACKER, 63 years of age, partially infirm, married to a woman who, though an invalid, helps him in his business, and, in particular, washes his cab, and occasionally grooms his horses, demands from his daughter and son-in-law the means of subsistence. Cab-driving has of late been a losing trade with him; which, as he is almost totally deaf, and in bad weather suffers great pain from the effects of accidents in which he has twice had a leg broken, is not astonishing. The daughter is the Marquise d'Orvault, and lives with her husband, the marquis, in an apartment of which the annual rent is 11,000 francs, and which is said to be magnificently furnished. The marquis has horses which the marchioness does not groom, and carriages of the latest make which she naturally does not wash down. When CATHERINE SCHUMACKER married the marquis a year ago her fortune consisted of upward of a million francs in money and securities, besides 325,000 francs in jewelry and personal property of various kinds. She was then 36 years of age—less than half the age of her husband, who was 83. If the daughter of the cab-driver was, at the time of her marriage, neither poor nor respectable, the marquis, at least, did not resemble her in one respect; he was decidedly poor. An annuity of 2700 francs allowed him by his relations, and a pension of 2500 francs from the Emperor, was all he had to live upon; and he had luxurious tastes. CATHERINE SCHUMACKER'S £50,000 tempted him, and it no doubt suited her very well to become the wife of a marquis, 83 years of age. The bridegroom's life had already been an eventful one. The importance of his very ancient family is strikingly shown by the fact that during the Reign of Terror no less than twenty-two of its members were guillotined. The cause for the defense is said to be that the father-in-law had some 40,000 francs, but that he gambled it away on the Bourse—a proceeding which shocks the delicate morality of the Marquis d'Orvault.

Rush Head-Dress.

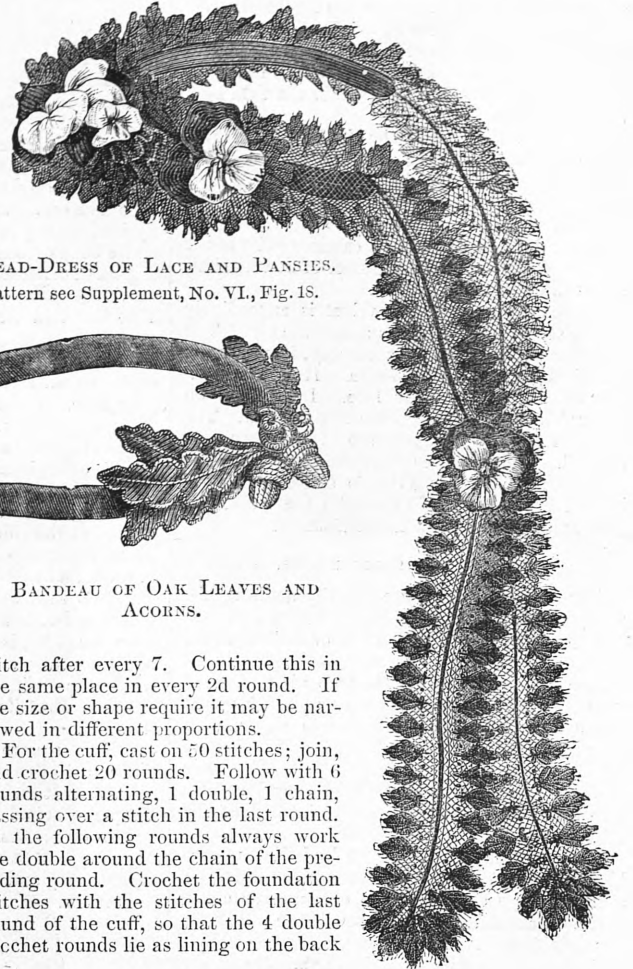

This head-dress is composed of leaves of different lengths, designed to simulate rushes. These leaves are made of black silk lace, on a foundation of stiff lace, and are wired round the edge and through the middle. An accompanying illustration shows a leaf of the full size, ornamented with jet bugles. The head-dress is composed of five long leaves, graduating in length, the top of which is fastened to a piece of stiff lace, on which smaller leaves are set in the form of a bow. The head-dress is worn a considerable distance in front, so that the long leaves fall over the chignon.

Wreath of Blackberry Blossoms.

This head-dress is formed of a small wreath of blackberry blossoms, blackberries, and leaves, which encircles the head, with a long spray depending behind.

character of knitting-work, but the right side is on the wrong side of the mitten. In the 11th round begins the gore for the thumb. Widen two stitches in one place in this round by taking 3 stitches in one of the last round. In the 12th round work 2 stitches in one, and 3 in the 3 which were worked in one in the preceding round. The widening continues in the same proportion for the next 12 rounds, increasing 1 stitch each round, first on one side of the gore and then on the other, till it has a width of 16 stitches. With these 16 stitches continue the thumb; after joining, crochet 8 rounds without narrowing. In the 9th round crochet every 2 stitches as one, and so continue till the thumb is tapered off. Then begin again at the place where the thumb commenced, at the last widened round, and crochet 16 rounds without widening or narrowing. With the 17th round begins the tapering of the hand by narrowing 1
